Schubert's symphony, which fortunately was not finished, so that the hearer is left with the thought of the charming lyricism of the slow movement, is well contrasted with Franck's, in which the anxiety and doubt expressed in the opening allegro are answered by the jubilation of the finale. There are two ways of understanding Ravel's "Waltz": one of a Viennese waltz, with introduction and coda; one as a symphonic poem with the chief motif in waltz rhythm, but with slackening and accelerating the pace. Mr. Koussevitzky prefers the second manner, and thus gives more importance perhaps to the music than it deserves if it simply is taken in the Viennese manner, or as a parody, as has been suggested by some. The orchestral performance was brilliant throughout.

TWO NUMBERS FILL SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bloch's 'America,' Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony

GLOBE JAN 26

Patriotic Close of Bloch's Prize Composition Wins Applause

Two numbers filled the program of yesterday's Symphony concert, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and Bloch's "America," the prize composition first performed at these concerts Dec 21 and 22 last. Mr Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges in the contest arranged by Musical America, has several times publicly proclaimed his belief that Bloch's score is a masterpiece.

Reviewers in Boston, as in the other cities where the work was given simultaneously last month, for the most part expressed disappointment with the music. Yesterday, as at the first performance, the audience, stirred by the patriotic climax on a new national anthem which closes Bloch's "epic rhapsody," applauded loud and long. Next week Mr Koussevitzky will conduct "America" in New York, where some dissatisfaction seems to have been felt with previous performances conducted by Mr Damrosch.

There is no need to say more about Bloch's music than that the second hearing strengthened the unfavorable impression of its musical value explained at length in the Globe of Dec 22. Whether Mr Koussevitzky and the judges, or the reviewers for leading newspapers in most American cities boasting symphony orchestras, are right about the merits and demerits of Bloch's Rhapsody, only time will tell. What really determines the place in musical history of a new composition is whether it can stand the test of repeated performances. The 20th rather than the second hearing of Bloch's "America" will give occasion for prophecy as to its ultimate place in history.

Mozart's C major symphony, usually called, nobody knows quite why "Jupiter," is one of the few symphonies which by common consent rank with the best of Beethoven's. It is even possible that in another 50 years this and the G minor symphony written in the same year, 1788, may put Mozart's fame above that of Beethoven. Certainly there are now many young modernists who worship the Mozart of these symphonies, of the operas "Don Giovanni" and "Le Nozze di Figaro," and scoff at the Beethoven of the "Eroica" and the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony.

When they become austere, bald-headed authorities, they will no doubt worship Mozart still, and dislike Beethoven even more. Then perhaps a new generation of young modernists will rediscover Beethoven, and feel that to exalt him they must disparage Mozart. Less supercilious persons will no doubt continue to do as they now do, and enjoy both Mozart and Beethoven without seeking to compare them.

After the doors of the hall had been closed at the beginning of yesterday's concert and the audience had settled down, the orchestra rose as one man. There was a dramatic pause. Then Mr Koussevitzky, bowing and smiling, made his way amid the plaudits of his men and of the audience, to his place at the conductor's stand. One wondered for a moment why his entrance was so dramatic. Then one remembered that he had been absent at the last two concerts in this series on his midseason vacation. But when he conducted last Monday in the Monday series there was no unusual demonstration.

This little incident was characteristic of the man. Given the slightest pretext for dramatizing a situation or a piece of music, it is his nature to emphasize whatever theatrical quality can be found in it. His success as a conductor is bound up with this histrionic instinct. It has been said of many celebrated actors that whatever spot they occupied became the center of the stage. Mr Koussevitzky is always in the center of the stage at the concerts he conducts, and nobody in the audience can ignore him.

In Mozart's symphony he felt the dramatic intensity of the first movement, the pathos of the slow movement, the grace of the minuet, and the brilliance of the finale, and made his audience feel these qualities. His reading was not in accordance at all points with the score. He found in the music things that no other conductor before Koussevitzky had detected there. He was not especially concerned that every player should play exactly the right note at exactly the right instant, tolerating slipshod details of performance that would have brought down on the careless players the wrath of a Toscanini or a Muck.

But to the vast majority of the audience, who care only for generalized emotional impressions from music, who do not notice small details, who do not particularly heed traditions, who come to the Symphony concerts because of Koussevitzky rather than because of Mozart, yesterday's performance was undoubtedly stirring and delightful.

With Bloch's rhapsody music better suited than Mozart's to Koussevitzky's talents and method, he was even more successful in wringing from the score the last drop of emotion. Here his only error was failure to bring out clearly some of the American tunes quoted, as, for instance, "Old Hundred" and "Dixie," which those listeners who read the analysis in the programs were listening for, and which no native American would fail to recognize.

There are no Symphony concerts in Boston next week.

P. R.

671
1 Herald

Jan 26 MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky, returning from his vacation of a fortnight, conducted yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall the 14th concert (48th season) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America."

The symphony, a flawless work of art and beauty was played in flawless manner. The performance was the first under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction at these concerts.

What is more to be said? Yet one may ask if "The marriage of Figaro" was not in Mozart's head when he wrote the second section of the opening Allegro. One can hear Susanna roguishly singing, mocking the court, or arousing Figaro's jealousy Has there not too much been said about the marvelous display of science in the construction of the Finale? The wonder of it is that this display does not impress the hearers unduly. To him it is merely gay and charming music. It ravishes his ear without his taking interest in the technical devices, even if he could recognize and understand them. If the title should be "Symphony in C major with the fugue," the word "fugue" would not fill his soul with dismal foreboding. There has been only one Mozart, as there has been only one Handel.

It is not known who gave the title "Jupiter" to this symphony. There is nothing in the music that reminds one of Jupiter Tonans, Jupiter Fulgurator, Jupiter Pluvius; or of the god, who assuming various disguises, came down to earth, where by his adventures with women, semi-divine or mortals of common clay, he excited the jealous rage of Juno. The music is not of an Olympian mood. It is intensely human in its loveliness and its gaiety.

There are several reasons why Mr. Bloch's rhapsody should gain momentary popularity. First of all it has a story attached to the music; the audience is told what the composer attempted to and what it is to expect. There is attentive listening so that "Old Hundred" shall not go by unrecognized. There is joy when the orchestra plays "Pop Goes the Weasle" for the Virginia reel. This or that hearer hums "Old Folks at Home" when he hears the melody from the orchestra. In the third section there is a forcible reminder of an apartment house in process of construction and one Bostonian noble dame may whisper to another: "Do you think they'll allow them to go up on Arlington street, spoil the skyline and ruin the Public Garden? What a shame!"

Yes, this Rhapsody is panoramic music therefore more to be enjoyed by many than music that is only music. And so there are persons who look on anecdoted paintings, as Frith's "Derby Day" and "The Railway Station," as triumphs of art.

Not that Mr. Bloch's rhapsody is wholly without some fine or impressive pages.

The opening of the second section with its introductory solo for the English horn establishes a mood. The long crescendo leading to the anthem is well contrived and powerful, but what a little mouse to come out of this mountainous preparation! There was a Grecian gentleman who apologized for the stateliness and pomp of the funeral procession when the corpse was only his little 2-year-old girl. Does Mr. Bloch really believe that he has invented the anthem to be sung by all Americans when their hearts are aglow with patriotism? Or was he exhausted by the crescendo of preparation? Did his Muse forsake him, saying: "You have been fortunate with borrowed themes; now let's see you compose one for your grand climax?" O lame and impotent conclusion.

The singers were those at the first performance on the 21st of last December: Members of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Cub.

The concert wil be repeated tonight.

Next week the orchestra will give concerts in Baltimore, Richmond, Washington, New York, Brooklyn and Hartford. The program of Feb. 8, 9 will be as follows: Bach, Brandenburg concerto No. 4 for violin, two flutes and strings. Mozart, piano concerto, A major (Nicolai Orloff, pianist). Strauss, "Also sprach Zarathustra."

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1929

Symphony

Bloch and His Rhapsody with Mozart Paired

"America" Again, the "Jupiter" for First Performance from Koussevitzky

THE print of the program at Symphony Hall yesterday announced the fourteenth concert; which to the initiated meant that Mr. Koussevitzky was returning to his duties as conductor. When he put in his appearance, the orchestra rose to welcome his return. For two weeks they have been thus rising to do honor to distinguished visitors; yesterday they gave the same greeting to the distinguished conductor who is not a visitor. Mr. Koussevitzky, in turn, grasped the hand of Mr. Burgin, in expressing his appreciation to the assembled orchestra. These felicities over, the program proceeded in its usual way.

Upon that program stood no more than two numbers. Before the intermission came Mozart's Symphony in C major, known as the "Jupiter"; after it, Ernest Bloch's prize-winning "Epic Rhapsody," with title "America." To hear the four Mozartean movements is to hear a sum of supreme masteries, the mastery of a great composer weaving patterns that glint and glisten, that sing their song, that now and again pile strength upon strength; the mastery of a great conductor guiding his orchestra past pitfall after pitfall and giving to the elusive Mozart revealing voice; the mastery of a great orchestra—for none but the greatest orchestras can cope with the difficulties of simplicity which are the essence of Mozartean style. Granted that the slow movement was nearer an Adagio than an Andante, that the fugued Finale was a riot of speed and virtuosity. In the same breath one will glory also in the clear picture which conductor and men gave of qualities which are the very soul of Mozart, the vigors of the beginning, giving way at once to a measure of song, passing soon to themes as light and fragile as many a composer of "fairy music" has never been able to compass. All three, vigor, song, grace are here combined in a blend that is a marvel to behold, whether one consider work of composer, of conductor, or of orchestra. No less did one warm to the loveliness of the melody which is the Andante, or to the elasticity of the supple dance-rhythm which is the Mozartean minuet. But the crowning achievement of this performance was the Finale. Mozart, like Mr. Honegger of a fortnight ago, has a warm spot in his heart for the writing of fugues. And so in this finale, which composers of his day generally cast in the light rondo form, Mozart tosses fuga expositions into a fully developed sonata form. Is the result one of heaviness, o of weight? It is not. Only for th student is such analysis of importance For the rest of us, this finale moves with a lightness and a gayety, with a snap and a sparkle, which all the rondos imaginable have not been able to give t many another symphonic finale. But t give forth such qualities demands virtuosity in orchestra and conducto above that of one or another complex difficult, modern score. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men achieved a triumph in it On many a program such playing o Mozart's great symphony (it was Mr Koussevitzky's first performance of here in Boston) would have been an even in itself. But with performance of th much advertised "America" impending it was evident that minds of many the audience were more occupied wi the piece to come than with the grea music that was passing before them.

Is it possible that at this date anything new can be written about Bloch's panoramic rhapsody? Late in December many orchestras played it, some thirty or forty reviewers, wrote about it, many of them more than once. And the musical journal that originated the prize giving scheme and that is sponsoring the work has printed a symposium of their views. To attempt further comment is almost to commit impertinence. And yet, in the very nature of the case, Ernest Bloch's prize-winning epic rhapsody, "America," raises issues for discussion in greater degree than most new works. The facts about the piece are surprisingly plain and almost self-evident. The standards by which it must be judged are much less easily determined. Mr. Newman in England, in commenting upon Atterberg's symphony, which won another prize, wisely remarked that it is impossible for a reviewer to approach a symphony which he knows has won a given number of thousands of dollars in the same detached and unbiased manner in which he approaches almost any other new work; his mind is partly filled with extraneous matter when he goes to the concert; the subtle psychological fact that the attitude of the people about him toward such a work is different than it is to the more usual novelty, also affects the reviewer.

Ordinarily the connoisseur, be be layman or scribe, in the presence of a new work, asks himself quite simply three questions—Is the work well made, does it accomplish its purpose, does it have something vital to say? With Bloch's new work other questions arise, some of them pertinent, others less so, most of them tending to confuse the issue. There probably has been more discussion of the status of the work as an "American" work than on any other question. The presence of the host of American songs injects an unusual æsthetic question. The validity of Bloch's ideal is open to question—to adopt artificially a style "so simple that the ordinary bootblack will understand the work"; the further ideal of compassing all American history in a single work, and the attempt at sermonizing upon America's present and future; and finally the aim of giving to America an anthem which it was hoped might displace the present national anthem. These, together with the question of the value of a prize work or even what is generally known as an "occasional" piece of music, make determination of its status singularly difficult.

That "America" is well made there can be no doubt. Never has better craftsmanship been brought to bear upon a musical work. Where many a composer, using so exceedingly varied and voluminous a group of material, woud have created inevitably a mere potpourri, Bloch has written a work of singular unity and of considerable power, a work that sounds exceedingly well, that except near the close fully holds the hearer's attention and keps him interested. It is well made.

In large degree it does accomplish its purpose. It is simple enough for anyone to understand. And with great effectiveness it passes in review the story of America—the story of its Indian aborigines, of the settling of the Pilgrims; of the happiness of blacks and whites in the sixties, and of the strife that was let loose upon that happiness; of the popular pleasures of the present and of its at least seemingly characteristic civilization. All these are splendidly unified by the two related mottos symbolizing the growth of America and the Call of America to the nations, in the early days as throughout its history. This unifying concept far outweighs the many diversifying elements. A symphonic poem written upon these two themes alone, without any "folk-song" incidents, could hardly be more persuasive. But when Bloch would point the way to the future he becomes dull, the platitudinous preacher. Though the "anthem" may be better than has sometimes been represented, the fact remains that it contains not one single quality which would justify its supplanting our present national anthem. In fact our present "anthem" is probably the better music. And the answer as to the vitality of its message must follow in parallel course to the answer to this second question.

As to the "Americanism" of the work, sufficient comment has already been made. If there are four kinds of "American" composers—(1) the American born who have America so thoroughly in their blood that it crops out in their music, (2) those of long residence who have assimilated our idioms and our ideals to such an extent that they are second nature to them, (3) those of more recent entrance who use our materials but handle them in a foreign idoim or perhaps an "international" or "universal" idiom, and (4) those American-born composers who still cling to the foreign or "universal" idiom—then Bloch and his symphony must obviously belong in the third class. From this, two false conclusions should not be drawn. Such classification should not in any way be made to bear any relation to the enjoyment which may or may not be had from the work. Secondly, a composer who is enthusiastic about our ideals and our institutions and who is doing everything humanly possible to be one of us should not, because of the unfortunte fact of this classification, be denied his rightful place under our hospitable sun.

One more of the puzzling questions may rightfully be considered. Is it wise for a composer to lay aside his natural language and the language of his time, and adopt a language which is historically a closed book? This is what his ideal of "simplicity" brings us to. This music, with all its excellences is not music of 1928. Except the caricature of the present, almost every note of it might have been written at the opening of the century. Has not that idiom run its course? Can any æsthetically useful purpose be accomplished by bringing it back, no matter how well the temporary return may be accomplished?

As to performance, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra and his chorus gave a superb production yesterday. One heard more of the native folk-material which forms the basis for all the episodes than one did a month ago, but still without producing a scattered effect, or one lacking in any way in unity. After all, the building up of the "America" motif, in performance as on paper, is the dominating idea of the whole. A. H. M.

SYMPHONY REPEATS "AMERICA"

Post Jan 26

Koussevitzky Is Given Warm Greeting by Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The public of the Symphony Concerts plays no favorites. A fortnight ago it showered applause upon Monsieur Honegger; a week later it received with delight Senor Arbos and his programme of Spanish music. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky returned to his post, and the greeting extended him was as warm as though the concert were the first, not the 14th, of the season.

The orchestra, too, did its part. As it had for the visiting Frenchman and Spaniard, it rose in welcome and applauded with the audience when Mr. Koussevitzky made his appearance and at length, through that of Mr. Burgin, the conductor shook its collective hand.

"AMERICA REPEATED"

Next week the orchestra plays in New York and Mr. Koussevitzky purposes giving the Gothamites his version of Ernest Bloch's prize-winning rhapsody "America," although they have already heard it from Mr. Damrosch and the Philharmonic-Symphony. And since music to be carried to New York is quite apt to be heard in Boston the week before, Mr. Koussevitzky placed "America" on the programmes of this week's concerts, companioning it only with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

Whether the audience as a whole was bored or pleased, restive or content through the bulk of "America"—and the piece, for all its obvious effectiveness, has its waste places—the final apotheosis and jubilation, the singing of the banal concluding anthem by the chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe, made the impression which it is likely to make upon all audiences for some time to come. This ad captandum ending is music for the mass, and the mass responds to it.

Meaningless Standing

When "America" was first played in Boston a few weeks ago, the audience rose when the chorus began its measures, although, since no music had been provided that, as the composer directs, it might join in the singing, the gesture was a meaningless one.

The musically more sophisticated company of Saturday evening, on the other hand, kept its seats. The audience of yesterday once more rose, save for a scattered few. It remains now to be seen what course will be pursued this evening.

Like a Brass Band Piece

As to the piece itself, a second hearing but confirms the impression of the first. However masterly as sheer craftsmanship the job that Bloch has done, the musical scheme and method of his piece exclude it from the company of works of art. "America" is no more than the "descriptive symphony" of Sunday afternoon band-concerts raised to a higher power.

Not before had Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the "Jupiter" Symphony in Boston. For the music of Mozart he has usually shown an especial sympathy, and the performance of the "Jupiter," particularly that of the beautiful Andante Cantabile was an admirable one. It is through this movement and the marvelous fugale Finale that the "Jupiter" prevails today. By comparison the first movement and the Minuet are of the work-a-day Mozart. No man could produce masterpieces as rapidly as Mozart made music.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, will give the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series of five, in Symphony hall on Feb. 5 at 3 o'clock.

The programs of this series will be chosen solely from the established masterpieces of orchestral music, both past and present. The first program will be of classical character, and will consist of Bach's fourth Brandenburg concerto for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; and Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica."

EPIC RHAPSODY HEARD AGAIN

AV. N 26 1929

Symphony Orchestra Plays Bloch's "America" for Second Time

Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which is probably the most important contribution to music in recent years, was heard for the second time this season at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The beauty and magnificence of the reading given this great piece by Mr. Koussevitzky drew bursts of applause from different parts of the hall before the number had come to an end—so helpless were some in their appreciation.

The composer has dedicated his masterpiece to his country, and to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision, he asserts, upheld the inspiration of this work. It is lofty in purpose; it is based on an ideal. Throughout is woven the history of the country, its spiritual development. It is in three movements, and the program outlines the sequence as follows: The soil, the Indians, the Mayflower, the landing of the Pilgrims, hours of joy, hours of sorrow, the present, the future.

It moves definitely, magnificently, decisively, rising to stirring crescendos, diminishing to whispers, threading across its imposing tapestry our folk songs, measures of jazz, and at last, an anthem which the composer hopes will become known and beloved and which well deserves the honor of becoming our national anthem. It was sung yesterday by a chorus composed of members of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club.

The rhapsody followed Mozart's symphony in C major, which is known as "Jupiter." Many have questioned the source of that title. Some maintain that the serene, godlike splendor of the music occasioned the name. Others think that its impressive beauty and power are responsible. Masters have called it "the overpowering, great, fiery, pathetic, sublime symphony in C." And it is all that. Under the baton of Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday it was sublime. The large audience received it with delight and repeatedly recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the platform.

JANUARY 28, 1929

Concert-Chronicle

TRANS JAN 28

"Nothing Too Much"

IT IS Mr. Koussevitzky's reasonable habit to repeat in the course of a season one or more pieces that he has lately produced or revived. Usually there is no demur. The pleased are pleased again. The mistrustful find their doubts confirmed, which is another sort of human satisfaction. The music itself often bears well this immediate rehearing. At the Symphony Concerts of last Friday and Saturday the conductor so repeated Mr. Bloch's Symphonic Rhapsody, "America," produced on Dec. 21 and 22. And for the first time, during his five years in Boston, letters questioning a repetition come to this department. Here follows one sufficiently representative, from a practised, open mind and usually well-content subscriber. He addresses The Transcript over his signature; but prefers it withheld from print. The letter:

> No sooner had it been announced that Mr. Koussevitzky was to repeat—within so short a time after its inaugural performances here—Mr. Bloch's "America," than a number of subscribers decided to remain away in mild protest. May I, as one of them, express certain sentiments that were shared by many who attended the repetition through force of habit, or through a spirit of fairness to the piece. Lest any suspicion of racial antagonism enter, may I explain that all to whom I refer are of Jewish descent, and most of them of American birth. They would doubtless agree that Bloch is among the master composers of the day, and that Koussevitzky is of like eminence among contemporary conductors.
>
> But the prize-winning "America" had been played, virtually at the same time, by five leading orchestras of the country. The second movement, after a plethora of verbal interpretation, had been broadcast over a nation-wide chain of radio stations. Mr. Damrosch, indeed, promises shortly to "air" the entire epic rhapsody in the same continental fashion. "Mein Liebchen," as Heine once sang, "was willst du mehr?"
>
> Neither the reception in Boston nor that in New York was of a nature to suggest immediate repetition. Why, then, in the face of obvious satiety, the sudden return of an undistinguished music that had been artificially raised to distinction? The less charitable of those for whom I speak, discovering that our conductor was to take the rhapsody to New York—as if Gotham had plainly not had its fill of the piece—were so discourteous as to suggest that Mr. Koussevitzky was warming his hands once more over this glowing coal before transporting it to Newcastle.
>
> Great composers and great composers, like us lesser mortals, have their off-days. "America" some of us felt, was, for Bloch as artist and for Koussevitzky and the other judges of the contest, such an imperfect day. In any case, both Bloch and our conductor are in merit and artistic reward rich enough to ponder the justice of this complaint from their juniors.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1929

Symphony

Bloch and His Rhapsody with Mozart Paired

"America" Again, the "Jupiter" for First Performance from Koussevitzky

THE print of the program at Symphony Hall yesterday announced the fourteenth concert; which to the initiated meant that Mr. Koussevitzky was returning to his duties as conductor. When he put in his appearance, the orchestra rose to welcome his return. For two weeks they have been thus rising to do honor to distinguished visitors; yesterday they gave the same greeting to the distinguished conductor who is not a visitor. Mr. Koussevitzky, in turn, grasped the hand of Mr. Burgin, in expressing his appreciation to the assembled orchestra. These felicities over, the program proceeded in its usual way.

Upon that program stood no more than two numbers. Before the intermission came Mozart's Symphony in C major, known as the "Jupiter"; after it, Ernest Bloch's prize-winning "Epic Rhapsody," with title "America." To hear the four Mozartean movements is to hear a sum of supreme masteries, the mastery of a great composer weaving patterns that glint and glisten, that sing their song, that now and again pile strength upon strength; the mastery of a great conductor guiding his orchestra past pitfall after pitfall and giving to the elusive Mozart revealing voice; the mastery of a great orchestra—for none but the greatest orchestras can cope with the difficulties of simplicity which are the essence of Mozartean style. Granted that the slow movement was nearer an Adagio than an Andante, that the fugued Finale was a riot of speed and virtuosity. In the same breath one will glory also in the clear picture which conductor and men gave of qualities which are the very soul of Mozart, the vigors of the beginning, giving way at once to a measure of song, passing soon to themes as light and fragile as many a composer of "fairy music" has never been able to compass. All three, vigor, song, grace are here combined in a blend that is a marvel to behold, whether one consider work of composer, of conductor, or of orchestra. No less did one warm to the loveliness of the melody which is the Andante, or to the elasticity of the supple dance-rhythm which is the Mozartean minuet. But the crowning achievement of this performance was the Finale. Mozart, like Mr. Honegger of a fortnight ago, has a warm spot in his heart for the writing of fugues. And so in this finale, which composers of his day generally cast in the light rondo form, Mozart tosses fuga expositions into a fully developed sonata form. Is the result one of heaviness, o of weight? It is not. Only for the student is such analysis of importance. For the rest of us, this finale moves with a lightness and a gayety, with a snap and a sparkle, which all the rondos imaginable have not been able to give to many another symphonic finale. But to give forth such qualities demands a virtuosity in orchestra and conductor above that of one or another complex difficult, modern score. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men achieved a triumph in it. On many a program such playing o Mozart's great symphony (it was Mr Koussevitzky's first performance of i here in Boston) would have been an even in itself. But with performance of th much advertised "America" impending it was evident that minds of many o the audience were more occupied wi the piece to come than with the grea music that was passing before them.

Is it possible that at this date anything new can be written about Bloch's panoramic rhapsody? Late in December many orchestras played it, some thirty or forty reviewers, wrote about it, many of them more than once. And the musical journal that originated the prize giving scheme and that is sponsoring the work has printed a symposium of their views. To attempt further comment is almost to commit impertinence. And yet, in the very nature of the case, Ernest Bloch's prize-winning epic rhapsody, "America," raises issues for discussion in greater degree than most new works. The facts about the piece are surprisingly plain and almost self-evident. The standards by which it must be judged are much less easily determined. Mr. Newman in England, in commenting upon Atterberg's symphony, which won another prize, wisely remarked that it is impossible for a reviewer to approach a symphony which he knows has won a given number of thousands of dollars in the same detached and unbiased manner in which he approaches almost any other new work; his mind is partly filled with extraneous matter when he goes to the concert; the subtle psychological fact that the attitude of the people about him toward such a work is different than it is to the more usual novelty, also affects the reviewer.

Ordinarily the connoisseur, be be layman or scribe, in the presence of a new work, asks himself quite simply three questions—Is the work well made, does it accomplish its purpose, does it have something vital to say? With Bloch's new work other questions arise, some of them pertinent, others less so, most of them tending to confuse the issue. There probably has been more discussion of the status of the work as an "American" work than on any other question. The presence of the host of American songs injects an unusual æsthetic question. The validity of Bloch's ideal is open to question—to adopt artificially a style "so simple that the ordinary bootblack will understand the work"; the further ideal of compassing all American history in a single work, and the attempt at sermonizing upon America's present and future; and finally the aim of giving to America an anthem which it was hoped might displace the present national anthem. These, together with the question of the value of a prize work or even what is generally known as an "occasional" piece of music, make determination of its status singularly difficult.

That "America" is well made there can be no doubt. Never has better craftsmanship been brought to bear upon a musical work. Where many a composer, using so exceedingly varied and voluminous a group of material, woud have created inevitably a mere potpourri, Bloch has written a work of singular unity and of considerable power, a work that sounds exceedingly well, that except near the close fully holds the hearer's attention and keps him interested. It is well made.

In large degree it does accomplish its purpose. It is simple enough for anyone to understand. And with great effectiveness it passes in review the story of America—the story of its Indian aborigines, of the settling of the Pilgrims; of the happiness of blacks and whites in the sixties, and of the strife that was let loose upon that happiness; of the popular pleasures of the present and of its at least seemingly characteristic civilization. All these are splendidly unified by the two related mottos symbolizing the growth of America and the Call of America to the nations, in the early days as throughout its history. This unifying concept far outweighs the many diversifying elements. A symphonic poem written upon these two themes alone, without any "folk-song" incidents, could hardly be more persuasive. But when Bloch would point the way to the future he becomes dull, the platitudinous preacher. Though the "anthem" may be better than has sometimes been represented, the fact remains that it contains not one single quality which would justify its supplanting our present national anthem. In fact our present "anthem" is probably the better music. And the answer as to the vitality of its message must follow in parallel course to the answer to this second question.

As to the "Americanism" of the work, sufficient comment has already been made. If there are four kinds of "American" composers—(1) the American born who have America so thoroughly in their blood that it crops out in their music, (2) those of long residence who have assimilated our idioms and our ideals to such an extent that they are second nature to them, (3) those of more recent entrance who use our materials but handle them in a foreign idoim or perhaps an "international" or "universal" idiom, and (4) those American-born composers who still cling to the foreign or "universal" idiom—then Bloch and his symphony must obviously belong in the third class. From this, two false conclusions should not be drawn. Such classification should not in any way be made to bear any relation to the enjoyment which may or may not be had from the work. Secondly, a composer who is enthusiastic about our ideals and our institutions and who is doing everything humanly possible to be one of us should not, because of the unfortunte fact of this classification, be denied his rightful place under our hospitable sun.

One more of the puzzling questions may rightfully be considered. Is it wise for a composer to lay aside his natural language and the language of his time, and adopt a language which is historically a closed book? This is what his ideal of "simplicity" brings us to. This music, with all its excellences is not music of 1928. Except the caricature of the present, almost every note of it might have been written at the opening of the century. Has not that idiom run its course? Can any æsthetically useful purpose be accomplished by bringing it back, no matter how well the temporary return may be accomplished?

As to performance, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra and his chorus gave a superb production yesterday. One heard more of the native folk-material which forms the basis for all the episodes than one did a month ago, but still without producing a scattered effect, or one lacking in any way in unity. After all, the building up of the "America" motif, in performance as on paper, is the dominating idea of the whole. A. H. M.

SYMPHONY REPEATS "AMERICA"

Post Jan 26

Koussevitzky Is Given Warm Greeting by Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The public of the Symphony Concerts plays no favorites. A fortnight ago it showered applause upon Monsieur Honegger; a week later it received with delight Senor Arbos and his programme of Spanish music. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky returned to his post, and the greeting extended him was as warm as though the concert were the first, not the 14th, of the season.

The orchestra, too, did its part. As it had for the visiting Frenchman and Spaniard, it rose in welcome and applauded with the audience when Mr. Koussevitzky made his appearance and at length, through that of Mr. Burgin, the conductor shook its collective hand.

"AMERICA REPEATED"

Next week the orchestra plays in New York and Mr. Koussevitzky purposes giving the Gothamites his version of Ernest Bloch's prize-winning rhapsody "America," although they have already heard it from Mr. Damrosch and the Philharmonic-Symphony. And since music to be carried to New York is quite apt to be heard in Boston the week before, Mr. Koussevitzky placed "America" on the programmes of this week's concerts, companioning it only with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

Whether the audience as a whole was bored or pleased, restive or content through the bulk of "America"—and the piece, for all its obvious effectiveness, has its waste places—the final apotheosis and jubilation, the singing of the banal concluding anthem by the chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe, made the impression which it is likely to make upon all audiences for some time to come. This ad captandum ending is music for the mass, and the mass responds to it.

Meaningless Standing

When "America" was first played in Boston a few weeks ago, the audience rose when the chorus began its measures, although, since no music had been provided that, as the composer directs, it might join in the singing, the gesture was a meaningless one.

The musically more sophisticated company of Saturday evening, on the other hand, kept its seats. The audience of yesterday once more rose, save for a scattered few. It remains now to be seen what course will be pursued this evening.

Like a Brass Band Piece

As to the piece itself, a second hearing but confirms the impression of the first. However masterly as sheer craftsmanship the job that Bloch has done, the musical scheme and method of his piece exclude it from the company of works of art. "America" is no more than the "descriptive symphony" of Sunday afternoon band-concerts raised to a higher power.

Not before had Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the "Jupiter" Symphony in Boston. For the music of Mozart he has usually shown an especial sympathy, and the performance of the "Jupiter," particularly that of the beautiful Andante Cantabile was an admirable one. It is through this movement and the marvelous fugale Finale that the "Jupiter" prevails today. By comparison the first movement and the Minuet are of the work-a-day Mozart. No man could produce masterpieces as rapidly as Mozart made music.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, will give the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series of five, in Symphony hall on Feb. 5, at 3 o'clock.

The programs of this series will be chosen solely from the established masterpieces of orchestral music, both past and present. The first program will be of classical character, and will consist of Bach's fourth Brandenburg concerto for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; and Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica."

EPIC RHAPSODY HEARD AGAIN

AV.

N 26 —— 1929

Symphony Orchestra Plays Bloch's "America" for Second Time

Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which is probably the most important contribution to music in recent years, was heard for the second time this season at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The beauty and magnificence of the reading given this great piece by Mr. Koussevitzky drew bursts of applause from different parts of the hall before the number had come to an end—so helpless were some in their appreciation.

The composer has dedicated his masterpiece to his country, and to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision, he asserts, upheld the inspiration of this work. It is lofty in purpose; it is based on an ideal. Throughout is woven the history of the country, its spiritual development. It is in three movements, and the program outlines the sequence as follows: The soil, the Indians, the Mayflower, the landing of the Pilgrims, hours of joy, hours of sorrow, the present, the future.

It moves definitely, magnificently, decisively, rising to stirring crescendos, diminishing to whispers, threading across its imposing tapestry our folk songs, measures of jazz, and at last, an anthem which the composer hopes will become known and beloved and which well deserves the honor of becoming our national anthem. It was sung yesterday by a chorus composed of members of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club.

The rhapsody followed Mozart's symphony in C major, which is known as "Jupiter." Many have questioned the source of that title. Some maintain that the serene, godlike splendor of the music occasioned the name. Others think that its impressive beauty and power are responsible. Masters have called it "the overpowering, great, fiery, pathetic, sublime symphony in C." And it is all that. Under the baton of Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday it was sublime. The large audience received it with delight and repeatedly recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the platform.

JANUARY 28, 1929

Concert-Chronicle

TRANS

"Nothing Too Much"

IT IS Mr. Koussevitzky's reasonable habit to repeat in the course of a season one or more pieces that he has lately produced or revived. Usually there is no demur. The pleased are pleased again. The mistrustful find their doubts confirmed, which is another sort of human satisfaction. The music itself often bears well this immediate rehearing. At the Symphony Concerts of last Friday and Saturday the conductor so repeated Mr. Bloch's Symphonic Rhapsody, "America," produced on Dec. 21 and 22. And for the first time, during his five years in Boston, letters questioning a repetition come to this department. Here follows one sufficiently representative, from a practised open mind and usually well-content subscriber. He addresses The Transcript over his signature; but prefers it withheld from print. The letter:

> No sooner had it been announced that Mr. Koussevitzky was to repeat—within so short a time after its inaugural performances here—Mr. Bloch's "America," than a number of subscribers decided to remain away in mild protest. May I, as one of them, express certain sentiments that were shared by many who attended the repetition through force of habit, or through a spirit of fairness to the piece. Lest any suspicion of racial antagonism enter, may I explain that all to whom I refer are of Jewish descent, and most of them of American birth. They would doubtless agree that Bloch is among the master composers of the day, and that Koussevitzky is of like eminence among contemporary conductors.
>
> But the prize-winning "America" had been played, virtually at the same time, by five leading orchestras of the country. The second movement, after a plethora of verbal interpretation, had been broadcast over a nation-wide chain of radio stations. Mr. Damrosch, indeed, promises shortly to "air" the entire epic rhapsody in the same continental fashion. "Mein Liebchen," as Heine once sang, "was willst du mehr?"
>
> Neither the reception in Boston nor that in New York was of a nature to suggest immediate repetition. Why, then, in the face of obvious satiety, the sudden return of an undistinguished music that had been artificially raised to distinction? The less charitable of those for whom I speak, discovering that our conductor was to take the rhapsody to New York—as if Gotham had plainly not had its fill of the piece—were so discourteous as to suggest that Mr. Koussevitzky was warming his hands once more over this glowing coal before transporting it to Newcastle.
>
> Great composers and great composers, like us lesser mortals, have their off-days. "America" some of us felt, was, for Bloch as artist and for Koussevitzky and the other judges of the contest, such an imperfect day. In any case, both Bloch and our conductor are in merit and artistic reward rich enough to ponder the justice of this complaint from their juniors.

TRANS
JAN — 26. '29

Less Than the Need

From the Ranks Comes a Word About the Pension Fund At Symphony Hall

WITH regard to its Symphony Orchestra the city of Boston, without any false modesty, can challenge comparison with New York, or Chicago. And, perhaps, Boston may feel it has even a shade the better of the comparison—save in one respect [writes Paul Shirley, viola player in the orchestra]. This city does not fall short in artistic or cultural values, nor in the quality of the individual artists who make up its wonderful orchestral ensemble. Mr. Koussevitzky is one of the relatively great conductors of our day. And no city has shown a more loyal and consistent appreciation of the representative institution founded by Major Higginson than has Boston.

Where Boston lags far behind New York, Chicago and other cities (and one is ashamed to have to admit it), is in the treatment of the individual players who collectively make the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is. The employees' pension fund is today an accepted feature of all business life. Loyal, faithful service in the same organization for a series of years, which bring those who serve to the threshold of old age, is acknowledged by a pension. This pension is not a gift, it is not a charity, it is merely justice; the putting into effect one of those basic ideas of what is humanly fair and square and which has been accepted by "big business" the world over.

Not to mince words, the Boston Symphony pension fund as it now exists is a joke. It would probably never have come into existence had not Major Higginson laid the foundation with a gift of $5000, and given much time and consideration during his presidency toward increasing it. Yet today, after many years of hard struggling on the part of members of the orchestra, working "on their own," the fund is so small, so burdened with pensions payable, that a Boston Symphony player must qualify as totally incapacitated in order to obtain $500 a year from it.

A member of the New York Philharmonic or of the Chicago Symphony, in cities whose wealthy music-lovers have not been afraid to dig down into their pockets and provide a fund worthy of the name, can look forward, when his days of active service are over, to decent comfort. It does not call for much computation to establish how "comfortable" an incapacitated Boston Symphony player would be on $500 a year.

The existing situation is one that does no credit to Boston. If the city's men of wealth are not so ostentatious in the display of their resources as New Yorkers or Chicagoans, they are none the less able, and easily able, to rectify the present deplorable state of affairs. Boston may be said, quite truthfully, to have developed and supported the cultural values of life at a time when other American cities hardly knew what they were all about. And to this day here men of great wealth are men of great culture, whose appreciation of the arts is based on actual knowledge and sympathy to a degree not to be found elsewhere.

This deplorable condition, which makes Boston look cheap in other eyes, and which lends itself all too readily to unjust and insidious comment on New England parsimony, is one for which no individual member of the Boston Symphony board of trustees probably can be held responsible.

At the root of the matter is the fact that while the Boson Symphony is a quasi-public insitution, practically Boston's best known and most admired cultural representative, famous wherever music is cultivated in the United States—its pension fund is regarded as the personal and private affair of the orchestra members. But at their wish, to be sure. But on the principle of "thus it ever has been, is ,and ever shall be," those who should take the matter in hand wash their hands of it. After all, no Boston Symphony player can ever become totally destitute. If absolutely incapacitated, he always will have his $500 per annum (or less) to which he may look forward!

The artists who give the best years of their lives to maintaining the artistic traditions and prestige of Boston's orchestra have to try and save enough out of a decidedly modest wage to scrape together sufficient for their old age. And they are quite as much exposed to the blows of untoward fortune as anyone else. In the great symphony orchestras of other cities an adequate pension fund provision is regarded as one of the common decencies. Art-supporting millionaires in other cities see to it that the faithful "old horses" of their great symphony orchestras are not turned out after they have been worked out, to browse on the scant financial herbage of $500 a year.

The appeal made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in essence no different than that made by Harvard University. It deserves support on the same aesthetic grounds and its pension is entitled to the same support. A simple way to end the present disgraceful and unhappy state of affairs with regard to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund would be for some of those who every year add to the huge donations given our great university (and in some instances these men are directly interested in the Boston Symphony), to deflect some of the money going Harvard-ward into the Symphony pension fund chest. It would help to put an end to a situation which has, so to speak, come to a head.

(Reprinted from Musical America)

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE JAN 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be away from its own city in the coming week, giving concerts in Richmond, Baltimore, Washington, New York, Hartford and Brooklyn. The orchestra will return to give its 15th regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb 8 and 9. There will be a soloist at this concert—Nicolai Orloff, the talented young Russian pianist, who will play with the orchestra Mozart's Concerto in A major. Serge Koussevitsky will then revive Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," based on the philosophy of Nietsche, and will also perform Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series of five, in Symphony Hall, Feb 5, at 3 o'clock.

The programs of this series will be chosen solely from the established masterpieces of orchestral music, both past and present. The first program will be of classical character, and will consist of Bach's fourth Brandenburg concerto for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica."

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDAN, CONN.
RECORD

JAN 3 - 1929

Boston Symphony In Hartford February 3

The Great Boston Symphony Orchestra with Sergei Koussevitzky, the magnetic Russian conductor, who stands at the top in America, if not the world is a most unique organization.

The Boston Symphony was the first symphony orchestra in America to have its own music hall, and giving a series of symphony concerts. The Boston orchestra at that time was backed financially by Colonel Higginson of Boston, who made up the deficit every season, while he lived, the deficit being a large sum in those days. The original orchestra numbered only about sixty players, while now, there are one hundred twelve musicians, a number of whom have been imported from the first rank orchestras of Europe.

The orchestra, at present gave 67 concerts in Boston, with all tickets being subscribed for at the beginning of the season. The only way a ticket can be secured for the Boston concerts, is by subscribers being out of town, returning their seats to be resold to the box office. Besides the Boston concerts, they make four or five weekly tours of the larger cities each season, Hartford being considered most fortunate through the efforts of Frank A. Sedgwick to be included in their itinerary for a great many years. The orchestra has been brought to the highest pinnacle of perfection under the past five years direction of Sergei Koussevitzky, and is now recognized as America's great symphony orchestra. Koussevitzky gives every summer in Paris, the "Concerts Koussevitzky" being considered the most important musical event of the Paris musical season. The Paris papers give Mr. Koussevitzky unstinted and most lavish praise of his wonderful interpretations of the old classic symphonies and the modern French and Russian music, which electrified his fashionable audiences. The Hartford concert is only a month away, February 3, and the seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street, Hartford. Mail orders filled in order of their receipt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 4 - 1929

Conspicuously seated in a lower tier box yesterday evening at the Boston Symphony Concert at Carnegie Hall was Arthur Honegger, Franco-Swiss composer, lately arrived from Paris. With him was his American colleague, Aaron Copland. Occupying the adjoining loge were Alfred Knopf, the publisher, and Mrs. Knopf. . . . Visible in the back of the hall at the same event were Gdal Saleski, author and 'cellist; Josef Achron and Lazar Saminski, composers, and Aaron Baron, critic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra leaves Boston this week on one of its weekly tours of cities outside of Boston, finishing with concerts next Friday in Brooklyn, and New York on Saturday. They return to Boston then for the regular Boston series, until their next tour, the latter part of this month, which finishes with the Hartford concert here on February 3. The tickets for this concert are now on sale at McCoy's, and reservations are being made, and mail orders filled, accompanied by check, in order of their receipt. It is advisable to make reservations now for this premier musical event of the season. The orchestra is giving the finest concerts and programs of its entire career, and Hartford is most fortunate in having this opportunity of hearing this remarkable organization, under the spirited direction of Sergie Koussevitzky, noted as one of four greatest conductors of the world. The orchestra numbers 112 musicians, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert. A brilliant program has been promised, and will be announced shortly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 4 - 1929

Boston Symphony

The coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the foremost occasion in Hartford's musical season. The distinguished orchestra and its remarkable Russian conductor, Koussevitzky will appear at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon February 3.

When Sergei Koussevitzky returned from his summer in Europe, he brought some significant new scores, and many special plans for this season in America This season is the great orchestra's forty-eighth with the orchestra and conductor giving the most brilliant and finished rendition of programs of its entire existence. Mr. Koussevitzky is making the program for Hartford with especial care, combining the finest of the classical music with the most important of the new music. Announcement of the program will be made in a few days by Frank A. Sedgwick.

The early offering of tickets gives a special apportunity of securing preferred locations. Phone reservations will be accepted and mail orders filled, accompanied by check.

During the summer Mr. Koussivtzky conducted the annual "Concert Koussevitzky" in Paris at which he introduced no less than 13 works to the Parisian public, including Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." Koussenvtzky also listened to much new music and conferred with composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

JAN 5 - 1929

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, gave the second of its Brooklyn concerts under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences at the Academy of Music last evening. The soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma, a young Central American pianist frequently identified with the activities of this body of musicians. He played the Schumann Piano Concerto in a program which opened with Beethoven's Sixth ("Pastoral") Symphony and closed with the familiar concert arrangement of John Alden Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers."

Mr. Sanroma's performance of Schumann's music was marked by delicate poetic fervor in interpretation, as well as by much skill and assurance in execution. In view of such abilities as he revealed, it appears rather odd that his appearances are so limited in number and that one knows next to nothing about him. Pianists of far less adequate equipment, both as technicians and as artists, have with no trouble achieved more popularity.

Schumann's Concerto was the most interesting portion of the program. Among the Beethoven symphonies the Sixth is of relative unimportance, a lengthy and prolix work whose monotony of mood was only emphasized in Mr. Koussewitsky's reading. The playing of the orchestra, however, gave much pleasure, and applause was enthusiastic when occasion called for it.

T. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 2 - 1929

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston this week on one of its weekly tours of cities outside of Boston, finishing with concerts next Friday in Brooklyn, and New York on Saturday. They will return to Boston then for the regular Boston series, until their next tour the latter part of this month, which finishes with the concert here on February 3. The tickets for this concert are now on sale at McCoy's, and reservations are being made, and mail orders filled accompanied by a check, in order of their receipt. It is advisable to make your reservations now for this premier musical event of the season. The orchestra is giving the finest concerts, and programs of their entire career, and Hartford is most fortunate in having this splendid opportunity of hearing this remarkable organization, under the spirited direction of Sergie Koussevitzky, noted as one of four greatest conductors of the world. The orchestra numbers 112 musicians, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert. A brilliant program has been promised, and will be announced very soon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the foremost occasion in Hartford's musical season. The distinguished orchestra and its remarkable Russian conductor, Koussevitzky, will appear at the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

When Sergei Koussevitzky returned from his summer in Europe, he brought some significant new scores and many special plans for this season in America.

This season is the great orchestra's forty-eighth, with the orchestra and conductor giving the most brilliant and finished rendition of programs of its entire existence. Mr. Koussevitzky is making the program for Hartford with especial care, combining the finest of the classical music with the most important of the new music. Announcement of the program will be made in a few days by Frank A. Sedgwick.

The early offering of tickets gives a special opportunity of securing preferred locations. Phone reservations will be accepted and mail orders filled, accompanied by check.

During the summer Mr. Koussevitzky conducted his annual "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris at which he introduced no less than thirteen works to the Parisian public, including Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." Koussevitzky also listened to much new music and conferred with composers. Before he returned, he had several weeks of well earned recreation spent in mountain climbing with the composer Prokokieff in the French Alps. The Boston Symphony recently made several phonograph records for Victor Talking Machine company. Tickets at McCoy's, incorporated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

JAN 4 - 1929

Music

Boston Orchestra Here To-night.

By FELIX DEYO

John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at the Academy of Music to-night. The Chicago composer wrote this piece to describe a picture in rhythms and sounds of New York's frenetic existence, with its characteristic violent alternation between work and play. The "work" is depicted, in its original stage setting (as produced at the Metropolitan Opera House) with a scene showing the framework of a great steel structure, and "play" introduces a scene in Coney Island in which jazz singers and dancers are introduced. The concert version employs solo voices, those of to-night being Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

The symphony to-night will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" (No. 6). Schumann's A minor piano concerto introduces Jesus Maria Sanroma to Brooklyn, as soloist. Senor Sanroma is a young American musician of Central American parents. He has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on several occasions and also in recitals at Berlin, Paris, Madrid and Barcelona.

69

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 3 - 1929

Conductor of Boston Symphony Which Gives Concert Here Sunday

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The annual concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the auspices of Springfield Young Men's Christian association will be given at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon at 3. Admission to the concert will be by ticket only. Free tickets may be secured at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring seats reserved in advance may make arrangements by calling the "Y." The doors of the Auditorium will open at 2.15, but reserved seats will be held until 3 when the concert will start.

Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian leader of the orchestra, will conduct the concert here. The program will consist of selections from such famous composers as Prokofieff, Debussy, Ravel and Brahms. The symphony from the latter composer will be No 2 in D major, opus 73.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 4 - 1929

MUS

By Samuel Cho

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M. Soloists, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano; Joseph Lautner, tenor.

Concerto Grosso for Strings, No. 12, in B Minor.....Handel
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 38.....Toch
Mr. Sanroma
Symphony in B Minor (Unfinished).Schubert
Skyscrapers.....Carpenter
Mme. Sundelius and Mr. Lautner

A concerto for piano and orchestra by Ernst Toch was the new matter advanced at the second Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The soloist for this was Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, a gifted pianist who has come to the aid of the Bostonians at other times in the past.

Mr. Toch's concerto was written in the spring of 1926. Two years is a long time in the life of a modernist composition, and the interval between it's birth and last night's exhibition had drawn many of its atonal and polytonal teeth. Nevertheless, the piece succeeded in capturing one's attention for a good part of the performance. This was not so much due, I suspect, to the importance of the contents as to the relentless pace of the composition, its rhythmic audacity, its masterly orchestration and last, but not least, the brilliant treatment it received at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanroma.

The concerto is one of those compositions which orchestras finish with a flourish and conductor and soloist smile at each other as at a tricky prank, safely executed. To say that the music, for all its effectiveness, means nothing is dangerous, for it leaves one open to the question "does the Schubert 'Unfinished' mean anything?" Yet, though one cannot exactly define the "meaning" of good music, one is certain that it means something in the sense that it induces an emotional experience.

Mr. Toch's concerto gave this listener, at least, no emotional experience. The confidence with which the composer spread his material, his nervi-ness, so to speak, was amusing and his command over the orchestra provided piquant or sonorous effects. For me the piece was audacious nonsense though it may have been a masterpiece for last night's players and audience.

Mr. Koussevitzky further divulged praiseworthy interpretations of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B Minor, Schubert's Symphony in the same key and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," the last with the assistance of Miss Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

Less Than the Need

From the Ranks Comes a Word About the Pension Fund At Symphony Hall

WITH regard to its Symphony Orchestra the city of Boston, without any false modesty, can challenge comparison with New York, or Chicago. And, perhaps, Boston may feel it has even a shade the better of the comparison—save in one respect [writes Paul Shirley, viola player in the orchestra]. This city does not fall short in artistic or cultural values, nor in the quality of the individual artists who make up its wonderful orchestral ensemble. Mr. Koussevitzky is one of the relatively great conductors of our day. And no city has shown a more loyal and consistent appreciation of the representative institution founded by Major Higginson than has Boston.

Where Boston lags far behind New York, Chicago and other cities (and one is ashamed to have to admit it), is in the treatment of the individual players who collectively make the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is. The employees' pension fund is today an accepted feature of all business life. Loyal, faithful service in the same organization for a series of years, which bring those who serve to the threshold of old age, is acknowledged by a pension. This pension is not a gift, it is not a charity, it is merely justice; the putting into effect one of those basic ideas of what is humanly fair and square and which has been accepted by "big business" the world over.

Not to mince words, the Boston Symphony pension fund as it now exists is a joke. It would probably never have come into existence had not Major Higginson laid the foundation with a gift of $5000, and given much time and consideration during his presidency toward increasing it. Yet today, after many years of hard struggling on the part of members of the orchestra, working "on their own," the fund is so small, so burdened with pensions payable, that a Boston Symphony player must qualify as totally incapacitated in order to obtain $500 a year from it.

A member of the New York Philharmonic or of the Chicago Symphony, in cities whose wealthy music-lovers have not been afraid to dig down into their pockets and provide a fund worthy of the name, can look forward, when his days of active service are over, to decent comfort. It does not call for much computation to establish how "comfortable" an incapacitated Boston Symphony player would be on $500 a year.

The existing situation is one that does no credit to Boston. If the city's men of wealth are not so ostentatious in the display of their resources as New Yorkers or Chicagoans, they are none the less able, and easily able, to rectify the present deplorable state of affairs. Boston may be said, quite truthfully, to have developed and supported the cultural values of life at a time when other American cities hardly knew what they were all about. And to this day her men of great wealth are men of great culture, whose appreciation of the arts is based on actual knowledge and sympathy to a degree not to be found elsewhere.

This deplorable condition, which makes Boston look cheap in other eyes, and which lends itself all too readily to unjust and insidious comment on New England parsimony, is one for which no individual member of the Boston Symphony board of trustees probably can be held responsible.

At the root of the matter is the fact that while the Boson Symphony is a quasi-public insitution, practically Boston's best known and most admired cultural representative, famous wherever music is cultivated in the United States—its pension fund is regarded as the personal and private affair of the orchestra members. But at their wish, to be sure. But on the principle of "thus it ever has been, is ,and ever shall be," those who should take the matter in hand wash their hands of it. After all, no Boston Symphony player can ever become totally destitute. If absolutely incapacitated, he always will have his $500 per annum (or less) to which he may look forward!

The artists who give the best years of their lives to maintaining the artistic traditions and prestige of Boston's orchestra have to try and save enough out of a decidedly modest wage to scrape together sufficient for their old age. And they are quite as much exposed to the blows of untoward fortune as anyone else. In the great symphony orchestras of other cities an adequate pension fund provision is regarded as one of the common decencies. Art-supporting millionaires in other cities see to it that the faithful "old horses" of their great symphony orchestras are not turned out after they have been worked out, to browse on the scant financial herbage of $500 a year.

The appeal made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in essence no different than that made by Harvard University. It deserves support on the same aesthetic grounds and its pension is entitled to the same support. A simple way to end the present disgraceful and unhappy state of affairs with regard to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund would be for some of those who every year add to the huge donations given our great university (and in some instances these men are directly interested in the Boston Symphony), to deflect some of the money going Harvard-ward into the Symphony pension fund chest. It would help to put an end to a situation which has, so to speak, come to a head.

(Reprinted from Musical America)

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE JAN 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be away from its own city in the coming week, giving concerts in Richmond, Baltimore, Washington, New York, Hartford and Brooklyn. The orchestra will return to give its 15th regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb 8 and 9. There will be a soloist at this concert—Nicolai Orloff, the talented young Russian pianist, who will play with the orchestra Mozart's Concerto in A major. Serge Koussevitzky will then revive Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," based on the philosophy of Nietzsche, and will also perform Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra.

BOSTON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series of five, in Symphony Hall, Feb 5, at 3 o'clock.

The programs of this series will be chosen solely from the established masterpieces of orchestral music, both past and present. The first program will be of classical character, and will consist of Bach's fourth Brandenburg concerto for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica."

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDAN, CONN.
RECORD

JAN 3 - 1929

Boston Symphony In Hartford February 3

The Great Boston Symphony Orchestra with Sergei Koussevitzky, the magnetic Russian conductor, who stands at the top in America, if not the world is a most unique organization.

The Boston Symphony was the first symphony orchestra in America to have its own music hall, and giving a series of symphony concerts. The Boston orchestra at that time was backed financially by Colonel Higginson of Boston, who made up the deficit every season, while he lived, the deficit being a large sum in those days. The original orchestra numbered only about sixty players, while now, there are one hundred twelve musicians, a number of whom have been imported from the first rank orchestras of Europe.

The orchestra, at present gave 67 concerts in Boston, with all tickets being subscribed for at the beginning of the season. The only way a ticket can be secured for the Boston concerts, is by subscribers being out of town, returning their seats to be resold to the box office. Besides the Boston concerts, they make four or five weekly tours of the larger cities each season, Hartford being considered most fortunate through the efforts of Frank A. Sedgwick to be included in their itinerary for a great many years. The orchestra has been brought to the highest pinnacle of perfection under the past five years direction of Sergei Koussevitzky, and is now recognized as America's great symphony orchestra. Koussevitzky gives every summer in Paris, the "Concerts Koussevitzky" being considered the most important musical event of the Paris musical season. The Paris papers give Mr. Koussevitzky unstinted and most lavish praise of his wonderful interpretations of the old classic symphonies and the modern French and Russian music, which electrified his fashionable audiences. The Hartford concert is only a month away, February 3, and the seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street, Hartford. Mail orders filled in order of their receipt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 4 - 1929

Conspicuously seated in a lower tier box yesterday evening at the Boston Symphony Concert at Carnegie Hall was Arthur Honegger, Franco-Swiss composer, lately arived from Paris. With him was his American colleague, Aaron Copland. Occupying the adjoining loge were Alfred Knopf, the publisher, and Mrs. Knopf. . . . Visible in the back of the hall at the same event were Gdal Saleski, author and 'cellist; Josef Achron and Lazar Saminski, composers, and Aaron Baron, critic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra leaves Boston this week on one of its weekly tours of cities outside of Boston, finishing with concerts next Friday in Brooklyn, and New York on Saturday. They return to Boston then for the regular Boston series, until their next tour, the latter part of this month, which finishes with the Hartford concert here on February 3. The tickets for this concert are now on sale at McCoy's, and reservations are being made, and mail orders filled, accompanied by check, in order of their receipt. It is advisable to make reservations now for this premier musical event of the season. The orchestra is giving the finest concerts and programs of its entire career, and Hartford is most fortunate in having this opportunity of hearing this remarkable organization, under the spirited direction of Sergie Koussevitzky, noted as one of four greatest conductors of the world. The orchestra numbers 112 musicians, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert. A brilliant program has been promised, and will be announced shortly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 4 - 1929

Boston Symphony

The coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the foremost occasion in Hartford's musical season. The distinguished orchestra and its remarkable Russian conductor, Koussevitzky will appear at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon February 3.

When Sergei Koussevitzky returned from his summer in Europe, he brought some significant new scores, and many special plans for this season in America This season is the great orchestra's forty-eighth with the orchestra and conductor giving the most brilliant and finished rendition of programs of its entire existence. Mr. Koussevitzky is making the program for Hartford with especial care, combining the finest of the classical music with the most important of the new music. Announcement of the program will be made in a few days by Frank A. Sedgwick.

The early offering of tickets gives a special opportunity of securing preferred locations. Phone reservations will be accepted and mail orders filled, accompanied by check.

During the summer Mr. Koussivitzky conducted the annual "Concert Koussevitzky" in Paris at which he introduced no less than 13 works to the Parisian public, including Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." Koussevitzky also listened to much new music and conferred with composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

JAN 5 - 1929

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, gave the second of its Brooklyn concerts under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences at the Academy of Music last evening. The soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma, a young Central American pianist frequently identified with the activities of this body of musicians. He played the Schumann Piano Concerto in a program which opened with Beethoven's Sixth ("Pastoral") Symphony and closed with the familiar concert arrangement of John Alden Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers."

Mr. Sanroma's performance of Schumann's music was marked by delicate poetic fervor in interpretation, as well as by much skill and assurance in execution. In view of such abilities as he revealed, it appears rather odd that his appearances are so limited in number and that one knows next to nothing about him. Pianists of far less adequate equipment, both as technicians and as artists, have with no trouble achieved more popularity.

Schumann's Concerto was the most interesting portion of the program. Among the Beethoven symphonies the Sixth is of relative unimportance, a lengthy and prolix work whose monotony of mood was only emphasized in Mr. Koussewitsky's reading. The playing of the orchestra, however, gave much pleasure, and applause was enthusiastic when occasion called for it.

T. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 2 - 1929

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston this week on one of its weekly tours of cities outside of Boston, finishing with concerts next Friday in Brooklyn, and New York on Saturday. They return to Boston then for the regular Boston series, until their next tour the latter part of this month, which finishes with the concert here on February 3. The tickets for this concert are now on sale at McCoy's, and reservations are being made, and mail orders filled accompanied by a check, in order of their receipt. It is advisable to make your reservations now for this premier musical event of the season. The orchestra is giving the finest concerts, and programs of their entire career, and Hartford is most fortunate in having this splendid opportunity of hearing this remarkable organization, under the spirited direction of Sergie Koussevitzky, noted as one of four greatest conductors of the world. The orchestra numbers 112 musicians, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert. A brilliant program has been promised, and will be announced very soon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the foremost occasion in Hartford's musical season. The distinguished orchestra and its remarkable Russian conductor, Koussevitzky, will appear at the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

When Sergei Koussevitzky returned from his summer in Europe, he brought some significant new scores and many special plans for this season in America.

This season is the great orchestra's forty-eighth, with the orchestra and conductor giving the most brilliant and finished rendition of programs of its entire existence. Mr. Koussevitzky is making the program for Hartford with especial care, combining the finest of the classical music with the most important of the new music. Announcement of the program will be made in a few days by Frank A. Sedgwick.

The early offering of tickets gives a special opportunity of securing preferred locations. Phone reservations will be accepted and mail orders filled, accompanied by check.

During the summer Mr. Koussevitzky conducted his annual "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris at which he introduced no less than thirteen works to the Parisian public, including Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." Koussevitzky also listened to much new music and conferred with composers. Before he returned, he had several weeks of well earned recreation spent in mountain climbing with the composer Prokokieff in the French Alps. The Boston Symphony recently made several phonograph records for Victor Talking Machine company. Tickets at McCoy's, incorporated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

JAN 4 - 1929

Music

Boston Orchestra Here To-night.

By FELIX DEYO

John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at the Academy of Music to-night. The Chicago composer wrote this piece to describe a picture in rhythms and sounds of New York's frenetic existence, with its characteristic violent alternation between work and play. The "work" is depicted, in its original stage setting (as produced at the Metropolitan Opera House) with a scene showing the framework of a great steel structure, and "play" introduces a scene in Coney Island in which jazz singers and dancers are introduced. The concert version employs solo voices, those of to-night being Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

The symphony to-night will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" (No. 6). Schumann's A minor piano concerto introduces Jesus Maria Sanroma to Brooklyn, as soloist. Senor Sanroma is a young American musician of Central American parents. He has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on several occasions and also in recitals at Berlin, Paris, Madrid and Barcelona.

69

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 3 - 1929

Conductor of Boston Symphony, Which Gives Concert Here Sunday

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The annual concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the auspices of Springfield Young Men's Christian association will be given at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon at 3. Admission to the concert will be by ticket only. Free tickets may be secured at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring seats reserved in advance may make arrangements by calling the "Y." The doors of the Auditorium will open at 2.15, but reserved seats will be held until 3 when the concert will start.

Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian leader of the orchestra, will conduct the concert here. The program will consist of selections from such famous composers as Prokofieff, Debussy, Ravel and Brahms. The symphony from the latter composer will be No 2 in D major, opus 78.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 4 - 1929

MUS

By Samuel Cho

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M. Soloists, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano; Joseph Lautner, tenor.

Concerto Grosso for Strings, No. 12, in B Minor ..... Handel
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 38 ..... Toch
Mr. Sanroma
Symphony in B Minor (Unfinished) ..... Schubert
Skyscrapers ..... Carpenter
Mme. Sundelius and Mr. Lautner

A concerto for piano and orchestra by Ernst Toch was the new matter advanced at the second Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The soloist for this was Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, a gifted pianist who has come to the aid of the Bostonians at other times in the past.

Mr. Toch's concerto was written in the spring of 1926. Two years is a long time in the life of a modernist composition, and the interval between it's birth and last night's exhibition had drawn many of its atonal and polytonal teeth. Nevertheless, the piece succeeded in capturing one's attention for a good part of the performance. This was not so much due, I suspect, to the importance of the contents as to the relentless pace of the composition, its rhythmic audacity, its masterly orchestration and last, but not least, the brilliant treatment it received at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanroma.

The concerto is one of those compositions which orchestras finish with a flourish and conductor and soloist smile at each other as at a tricky prank, safely executed. To say that the music, for all its effectiveness, means nothing is dangerous, for it leaves one open to the question "does the Schubert 'Unfinished' mean anything?" Yet, though one cannot exactly define the "meaning" of good music, one is certain that it means something in the sense that it indutes an emotional experience.

Mr. Toch's concerto gave this listener, at least, no emotional experience. The confidence with which the composer spread his material, his nervi-ness, so to speak, was amusing and his command over the orchestra provided piquant or sonorous effects. For me, the piece was audacious nonsense though it may have been a masterpiece for last night's players and audience.

Mr. Koussevitzky further divulged praiseworthy interpretations of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B Minor, Schubert's Symphony in the same key and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," the last with the assistance of Miss Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

REDUCTION RATIO 13x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

10

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JAN 4 - 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yesterday, so far as orchestral concerts were concerned, was a day of extremely brilliant conducting, as also of compositions which had unusual interest. The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the evening in Carnegie Hall, introduced as a novelty the piano concerto of Ernest Toch, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist. This concerto is nearly three years old, having been composed in the Spring of 1926, and there were performances in Europe prior to one heard by the writer at the Frankfurt Music Festival of July, 1927. The conducting and the very brilliant interpretation of the work last night were responsible for much that was not made clear by the Frankfurt performance. Toch's concerto, in fact, now appears as one of the most mettlesome and arresting scores that have come in some time from any composer of the modern German school. The sheer certainty and élan of the writing are breath-taking, and these qualities are felt by the listener whether or not his ear and his power of musical analysis are quick enough to follow Mr. Toch's electrical manifestations.

Here is a piece of real modern music—not music composed with the deliberate intention to be modern at all costs, but music written in a language which is the composer's own. To say that Toch had struck a wholly new and individual vein in his work would be a shooting the mark, since he has unquestionably affinities with the later Hindemith, and is well-couched in the ideas of the Schönberg school. But these ideas, and others, have been assimilated in such a way that the piece, which is a whole symphony in three long movements, takes on a very personal character, and indicates a new and extremely vigorous temperament in contemporaneous music.

The music is specifically of the present twentieth century. Of romanticism it has none, although—hist—there was a passing moment of Debussy, and strange did Debussy sound in that galley! But here is no soft feeling, no sentimental ardors. The accents are rather those of stark strength, with clean, clear, astringent progressions of the voices, as they contend against each other in vigorous play. There is nothing affected, nothing decadent. The dominant note is force and health, and somewhat sardonic humor. Perhaps in a later day we will feel a quality that we recognize as true and deep emotion in the slow movement. Elsewhere there is sweeping, rhythmical power, and the finale is mad waggery. All this with the employment of an immense orchestra, as big as any used by Richard Strauss, including the organ and contra-bass tuba, and a piano part of immense technical and rhythmic difficulty, which was played with complete mastery by Mr. Sanroma, who exhibited as technician and musician a competency which is exceptional and which was imperatively demanded by the occasion.

The rhythmical problems of the Toch concerto are complicated for the piano as they are for the orchestra. Problems of balance were equally difficult, requiring of the soloist the soundest knowledge and musical instinct. Mr. Sanroma, who had studied the concerto with the composer, evidently knew the score as he knew his piano part. He was able to watch the conductor like a cat, which was strictly necessary, and he fully appreciated the fact that the rôle of the piano was that of one important part in a composition pre-eminently symphonic. Mr. Koussevitzky was indeed fortunate in his soloist as the composer was fortunate in his conductor. One trembles to think what a fraction of a slip on the part of any one would have meant with such a score. Again, the thought occurs that the composer should have been present. Mr. Toch, a man who is modest as he is distinguished in music, would have been happy in this performance. The audience, in part, disapproved of the intense modernness of the score of what is assumed to be the synonym of modernity, its dissonance. A majority, however, applauded heartily and persistently an audacious, logically built and very exhilarating concerto-symphony.

The other elements of the program were Handel's concerto grosso for string orchestra, Schubert's B minor symphony—was it because of the year of grace?—and John Alden Carpenter's music for the ballet, "Skyscrapers," which Mr. Koussevitzky has already played here in superlative fashion. The writer cannot speak of Handel's music, played by the strings, in a way that excited admiration from certain individuals of authority who were present. The first movement of the Schubert symphony was given a simple and not unduly individualized reading and Mr. Koussevitzky dared to take the slow movement at a tempo that most conductors who find it difficult to sustain long melodies avoid. But we care less for Mr. Koussevitzky's Schubert than for other of his interpretations. Mr. Carpenter's ballet held its own for brilliancy and effect, in the wake of Toch's concerto, and also gave great pleasure to the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 4 - 1929

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

From Mahler to Toch: A Day's Symphonic Contrasts at Two Orchestral Concerts

Concert by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, William Mengelberg conducting. Soloists, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; at Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon.

PROGRAM

1. "Das Lied von der Erde"..... MAHLER

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Soloists, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano; Joseph Lautner, tenor.

PROGRAM

1. Concerto Grosso for strings, No. 12, in B minor ..... HANDEL
2. Concerto for piano and orchestra, Op. 38 ..... TOCH
   Mr. Sanroma
   (First time in New York)
3. Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished") ..... SCHUBERT
4. Skyscrapers ..... CARPENTER
   Mme. Sundelius and Mr. Lautner

NOTHING could more vividly have pointed the contrast between our own musical day and that which is past than the two outstanding works upon yesterday's symphonic programs: Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," which Mr. Mengelberg revived for us at the Philharmonic-Symphony matinee, and the new piano concerto by Ernest Toch played by Mr. Sanroma at last night's Boston Symphony concert under Mr. Koussevitzky. Here, almost cheek by jowl, were our immediate musical past and our musical present, in two vivid and compact embodiments—perhaps not quite the best samples of each that Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Koussevitzky might have found, but certainly representative ones.

* * *

When Mahler some twenty years ago composed his "Lied von der Erde" (which is, of course, no novelty in New York), he built a considerable monument to that musical romanticism which, like so many other things good and bad, was shortly to be swallowed up at Armageddon. Mahler was almost the last of the nineteenth-century romanticists who survived into the twentieth. Unlike his colleague Richard Strauss, who is now, alas, but an incarnate legend, he had the good fortune to be cut off in full flower—in his artistic prime, before his talent had become deciduous. "Das Lied von der Erde" is the essential Mahler: it reveals him, betrays him, sums him up.

* * *

Mahler was the Senancour of his musical generation—the generation that succeeded Wagner's. We hear again and again in his music, and nowhere more insistently than in "Das Lied von der Erde," the very voice of Senancour—"Sensibility which no words can express, charm and torment of our vain years! Vast consciousness of a nature everywhere greater than we are, and everywhere impenetrable!" Almost Mahler might have said, in Goethe's words, that he had consecrated himself to the worship of sorrow; and in "Das Lied von der Erde" this unconquerable melancholy, these poignant protestations against the mystery and the fleetingness and the pain of life, cry out of the music.

* * *

The romantic subjectivity that lies at the heart of most nineteenth-century music shaped the work of Mahler at its most deeply characteristic, and gave it its passionate inwardness, its piercing and its sad sincerity. Listening to the final measures of "Das Lied von der Erde," with the contralto voice murmuring its reiterated "Ewig! Ewig!" above the dying sonorities of the muted strings and harps and celesta, while the flute and oboe sustain the A of that unresolved suspension which is the fitting musical comment upon Mahler's life, we remember the epitaph that Senancour desired for himself: "Eternité, deviens mon asile."

It is easy to believe that Mahler would have found that thought a sympathetic one. Indeed, his intimate disciple, Mr. Paul Stefan, tells us almost as much: that in "Das Lied von der Erde" he took bitter and prophetic leave of a world which his nature estopped him from viewing as a friendly dwelling place, and turned his vision elsewhere—toward some mysteriously sheltering sanctuary of the spirit. Certainly the strangely tragic peace, the mood of sorrowful assuagement, that broods upon the dying cadences of "Das Lied von der Erde," sing to us of the essential Mahler, that maimed spirit—again, like Senancour, "profoundly incomplete, profoundly unsuccessful, profoundly touching."

* * *

This, clearly enough, is nineteenth century romanticism in one of its typical aspects. Here we have the artist of infinite sensibility, bruised by life, oppressed by "the burden of the mystery of all this unintelligible world," and crying out to us his pain and his bewilderment in music whose song, again in the tradition of its era, has "dipt its wings in tears." Here we are very far, of course, from the noble and epic pathos of the gods of an earlier nineteenth-century generation — for Mahler had nothing of their elevation and their sanity and the power of their soaring flight. He shared their sensitivity and their passion and their deep awareness, but not their valor and their strength. And that, perhaps, is why the more towering among those nineteenth century gods—Beethoven and Wagner and Brahms—romantics though they indubitably were, belong not really to their era, but to the ages that their wings may easily overspread.

* * *

And now turn to our own beloved generation, as represented by Mr. Ernest Toch, young and a German and, of course, a professing and diligent modernist, whose new concerto for piano we heard at last night's Boston Symphony concert a few hours after Mahler's canticle of the baffling earth had sung itself into quietude and resignation.

It could never be said of Ernest Toch, as Mr. Santayana said of those philosophers who (like Mahler) believe that existence is illusion, that "they are without one ray of humor and are persuaded that the universe, too, must be without one." Mr. Toch's humor is beyond dispute. If he has any lingering doubts of the uproarious comicality of the universe and of the absurdity of one's taking it too seriously, he has kept them, for the most part, elaborately suppressed. His music is wholly of our day—unshadowed, unquestioning, affirmative; it is through with the doubts and the self-torturings of the Romantic Age, its passionate cries and its haunted sensibility.

Margaret Matzenauer

Contralto soloist in yesterday's performance of Mahler's "Lied von der Erde"

It will traffic a bit, now and again, with what an elder time called beauty—there are poetic and lovely moments in this concerto; but, like nature itself, it guards its loveliness with thorns. If you are determined to pluck a rose in Mr. Toch's beguiling garden, you will find it exceptionally well supplied with prickliness.

* * *

You may, perhaps, entertain the suspicion that a good deal of the polytonalism of our day—this overconscientious thorn-growing, as exemplified in certain passages in Mr. Toch's concerto—is nullified by its obviousness. It seems, at times, a bit too easy. The result that Mr. Toch secures in the first movement of his concerto, for instance, when he sets a tune in C major against an accompaniment figure in F sharp major, seems scarcely rewarding enough to have compensated him for the nuisance of writing in so many sharps for the left hand. Bach did things that were quite as "daring," and made them a good deal more interesting. Perhaps it would be charitable to assume that at such moments our young modernist is merely Toching in his sleep.

But there are other times when Mr. Toch's polytonalism and atonality cease to be merely overworked formulas and become vehicles of musical power, saliency, and charm: as when, in the development section of his first movement, he weaves a rich and lucent tissue of sound out of delicately alien tonalities. And there are other moments, as in the Adagio, when Mr. Toch forgets to be only a conventional child of his time and becomes (may heaven forgive him!) a poet in tones, spinning musical magic out of new and shining stuffs.

* * *

We find his musical "humor" somewhat less detaining. It is said that Mr. Toch was delighted to be told by an appreciative friend that the chief theme of his Finale, a "Rondo Disturbato," as he calls it, suggested an imitation of a cackling hen. It does, indeed, and it is a merry enough theme. But we should enjoy it with a keener zest if we could forget its more musically effective prototypes in the famous clavecin piece by Rameau, "La Poule," composed in 1736, and in the "Gallina et Gallo," composed by Rameau's worthy predecessor, Johann Jakob Walther, in 1688, to say nothing of the high-spirited hen in Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux."

Mr. Toch's harlequinade at the close of his Finale, in which this theme is made sidesplitting by its adornment with clusters of semitones and showers of trombone glissandi, is doubtless, however, pure Toch.

* * *

So our representative twentieth-century piece of music, you see, is rather a mixed affair, with bluster, and comicality, and a slightly furtive beauty, and abounding health and confidence, dancing an exuberant round. Certainly we have traveled a long way from our musical Senancour, with his sorrows and his doubts and his impassioned questionings. Have we discovered a more desirable resting place for the spirit of music? Perhaps. But who shall say?

* * *

It remains only to be added, concerning the performance of "Das Lied von der Erde" in the afternoon, that it was made memorable by the superb interpretation of Mr. Mengelberg and his orchestra, and by the poised and beautiful singing of Mme. Matzenauer, who, though she had given us the Brünnhilde of "Die Walküre" the night before, traversed the difficult music of Mahler as if Wagner and his prodigious exactions had been weeks behind her.

As for the performance of Toch's concerto, it is not easy to imagine it turned off more brilliantly, with an apter and more telling style, than Mr. Sanroma, the pianist of the evening, brought to it. And Mr. Koussevitzky, the master of ceremonies, of course, directed the work as if he believed in it heart and soul—as, no doubt, he does.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
JAN 4 - 1929

Boston Symphony Concert

Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner Are Soloists at Performance at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second of its evening concerts in Carnegie Hall last night. The program comprised Handel's concerto grosso in B minor for strings, Ernst Toch's piano concerto, Schubert's unfinished symphony and John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." The pianist was Senor Jesus Maria Sanroma. The solo singers in Mr. Carpenter's delineative fantasy were Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor. Mr. Toch's concerto was recently produced in Boston, where it seems to have stirred the commentators to a liberal use of laudatory adjectives.

It was composed in Mannheim, where Mr. Toch lives, in 1906 and played by the heroic Elly Ney in Berlin the following year. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced it to Paris at one of his series of concerts in that city last year. Senor Sanroma was the soloist on that occasion. There are warnings both within and without the score. That in the score avers that the development of a symphonic work belongs to the orchestra and requests conductors not to lose sight of that vital fact. Mr. Koussevitzky did not. The extraneous warnings made by the program annotator are that the form of the concerto is free, that it has varied tempi and that it "like much that is contemporaneous in this art, is written in the atonal and polytonal manner."

Mr. Toch studied medicine as well as music and is furthermore a doctor of philosophy. One should expect much of him. As a matter of fact nothing of the scientist or the medico appears in his concerto. If you dislike modernist music per se, no matter whether it is well or badly made, shows mastership or clumsy incompetence, you will not like Toch's concerto. But if you can discern ability in a piece of music whose idiom is uncongenial to you, this one should please you. Toch has not created an immortal masterpiece as some of the propaganda writers have exclaimed, but one can perceive the cause of their ecstasies. Here is actually the first clearly shaped and comprehensively purposeful work that has lately been put forth by any modernist writer. It stands out like a sculpture among masses of mere clay.

It has well defined themes, which are related to each other and impose a homogeneous character upon the work. The rhythms are invigorating and without the lamentable monotony which spoils so much modernist composition. The concerto reveals a mastery of form which is very rare among the unchained spirits of the time. It adheres in some measure to the principles of the classic sonata, but without enslaving the fancy of the musician. The composition as a whole develops logically and is free from the jumble of futile strivings and helpless wanderings which have so discouraged those trying honestly to discover some mastery of their materials among the loudly acclaimed progressives. Toch is perhaps not a Stravinsky, but he seems to know where he is going.

His harmonic style is distinctly atonal, and perhaps he has overworked the chromatic scale and its chord derivatives in his eagerness to avoid all approach to the ancient cadences, but with his chromatics he has achieved some uncommon beauty and at times a certain wistful song speech which seems to be quite his own. His slow movement is of course his weakest. The modernists have not yet found their cantilena. The long melodic line of the classics, which they discarded, has not been replaced by them with anything possessing its suave and sustained enchantment.

But the finale, which one of the enthusiasts has described as rhythmic violence, is nothing of the sort. It is rude in spots and it rejoices in some of those abrupt pauses and jarring resumptions which are items in the modernist stock in trade. But it has vitality. It is male music, and this is true of the whole work. The scoring is marvellously clever and the piano part is constructed so that it is an integral part of the score and not a thing apart.

And the whole composition sounds. It is not always sweet upon the ear; rather it is often pungent, but it intrigues at every moment. One listens to it with interest and recognizes the presence of a musician who knows what he is doing and how to do it. The concerto was superbly performed. Without the most flawless instrumental balance the thing would be cacophonous without doubt. Played as it was last evening by the Boston men under the magic wand of Koussevitzky, it had opulence of texture and color. Senor Sanroma treated the piano part in a style which proclaimed him a virtuoso of the first rank in modernist music.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society performed Gustave Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. This work was called by its composer a symphony with contralto and tenor solos; to a commonplace observer it appears to be an elongated song cycle. It was introduced to New York on February 1, 1922, by the Society of the Friends of Music in Carnegie Hall and repeated on February 17. The same organization gave it behind closed doors in the Town Hall on February 25, 1923. It has not been heard since that occasion until yesterday.

Mahler worshipers declare that it is a masterpiece. Contemplative biographers have asserted that by this and the ninth symphony this musician must stand or fall. Too many essays on Mahler have already been written; this shall not be another. "Das Lied von der Erde" is an uneven and prolix setting of lyrics by four Chinese poets of the eighth century. They were not prohibitionists. The titles of the poems selected by Mahler are "Drinking Song of the Woefulness of the Earth," "The Lonely One in Autumn," "Of Youth," "Of Beauty," "The Drunken One in the Spring" and "The Farewell."

The best of these are "Of Youth," "Of Beauty" and the final one. So plangent is the effect of this closing song that the auditor is likely to forget some of the feeble matter gone before and depart with the impression that he has really heard a master work. Mahler sometimes rose to fervid utterance, but most of the time he plodded laboriously through devious pages scattering insignificant details as he went. It is impossible to escape the conviction that most of his music is the result of painful effort to be great. He was not great or there would be no evidence of effort. "Das Lied von der Erde" is the best he gave us and it is good in spots. But between the spots it is deadly dullness dressed up in pretentious orchestration and accompanied with some of the worst kind of writing for the voice.

Mme. Matzenauer sang her songs yesterday with surpassing skill and with feeling. She sang them without a score; they were plainly old friends and dear to her. They owed most of their impressiveness to her art and sincerity. One wondered at her affection. Richard Crooks was the tenor and his valiant assaults on the arid and mechanical music allotted to him commanded admiration. He did the best he could, but the music prevailed.

Mr. Mengelberg conducted with a conductor's unfailing faith in Mahler. They all seem to adore him and never can understand why their emotions are not shared by those who are not reading the scores and imagining vain things. The excellent musicians of the Philharmonic played the composition of the former conductor of the organization with fidelity and consummate art. The audience was entirely respectful. Once or twice it seemed even well pleased.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JAN 4 - 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Toch's Exciting Piano Concerto Introduced by Bostonians—A Superb Performance of Mahler's "Song of Earth"

RONDO DISTURBATO was the designation given the last movement of his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Ernest Toch. As played in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the designation might have been extended to characterize the entire work. Toch's was a Concerto Disturbato, even to ears attuned to Bartok and those other paladins of dissonance who have written atonally and polytonally for piano and orchestra.

This was a first New York performance of undoubted consequence, if music is to continue along the stridulous paths deserted by Stravinsky after he, perhaps more than any other composer, had directed it to them. The concerto is now nearly three years old and has been heard in Chicago and Boston as well as in various cities of the Old World. Last night's soloist did similar duty in a Paris performance last May, also conducted by Koussevitzky. As the concerto is to be repeated at the Bostonians' Saturday concert, the work can scarcely be numbered among the shamefully neglected products of hidden genius.

However, this is not a flower to blush unseen, or, to mix the metaphor, to sigh unheard. Modesty, reserve, sensitiveness are not its cardinal qualities. It is very much twentieth century in its din, its brass, its impudence, its pile-driving vitality. It hits the listener between the eyes as perhaps no other work of its character has done. For those to whom it is that long-sought desideratum, an expression of the age, it may even be something of a knockout. For others who may be inclined to believe that to cultivate the hard-boiled and the mechanistic is to close the door at the start on any very promising musical inspiration, the question remains as to whether this is music at all.

THERE are many stunning effects—stunning in the literal meaning of the word—in the more violent parts of this concerto. Whether they will have any continuing musical value when they have ceased to be novel is not to be too confidently asserted on the basis of the excitement, on the one hand—or the aversion, on the other—they plainly asserted at last night's performance. This reviewer was surfeited with a formulistic artificiality, a self-conscious strutting, an attitude of "watch my smoke" in most of the first and last movements. The slow movement, if scarcely to be described as beautiful, had an utterance orderly and purposeful, with neat and often attractive turns of phrase.

If the Stravinsky of today is right this concerto may be regarded as an abortive illustration of a skill worthy of a better fate; but if atonality, polytonality, mechanical din and rhythmic violence are, indeed, the signposts of the new day, then Toch has contributed a work that outclasses most of its competitors.

The performance, let it be said, was an electrical one. Though Mr. Sanroma played tenderly enough in the Adagio, he achieved the clatter of a steel-riveting machine in the Allegro.

OTHERWISE, the evening was devoted to Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12—a noble performance of music that admittedly is of quite another age; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, which, it must also be confessed, possesses not a little of those attributes of the heart which are not permitted to intrude upon Toch, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," that "ballet of modern American life," with its "filtered" jazz, which also echoes the machine. Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the symphony and the ballet were familiar from other concerts he has conducted in New York. Soloists in the Carpenter work were Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 4 - 1929

...notice that there will be a heavy attendance.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES RARE TREAT

Concert Sunday at Auditorium to Include Familiar Music and Modern Masterpiece

Of the four works to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its annual concert at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, two are already familiar to Springfield audiences. Both Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" have been heard previously. These represent the French school of music which generally upset musical traditions 25 years ago. The whole-tone scale, exotic combinations of instruments, and freedom of form characterises the music of Debussy. His "Prelude" is considered one of his finest works.

Maurice Ravel made his first American tour last season, and during that time conducted "La Valse." One of the first concerts devoted to his music was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and was broadcast over station WBZ. In this program, was included "La Valse," which was heard over many Springfield radios. "La Valse" was also played by the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts here several years ago.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," will receive its first hearing in Springfield on Sunday. Portions of a suite of his, "The Love of Three Oranges," were played by the Symphony some time ago. This work written in the free modern style, but in the "Classical Symphony" the composer has reverted to the orthodox form adopted by the classic masters.

The chief work of Sunday's program will be the Symphony No 2 in D major, op. 73, by Johannes Brahms. It was written around 1877, in Austria. After completing the work Brahms wrote to a friend, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony, I must inquire of skilled persons." The "skilled persons" did not receive the symphony with enthusiasm. It was the general belief at that time that Wagner and Liszt had exhausted the possibilities of symphonic music, making it difficult for any new composer to break into the orchestral field.

It was first played in America at Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, January 9, 1879. It was called "perplexing and cryptic."

An unusual demand for tickets is noticeable at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring reserved seats should apply at the Y. M. C. A. where arrangements may be made for the single concert, or the remainder of the season, which continues on Sunday afternoons until February 17. Sunday's concert will begi: at 3, instead of at the usual hour of 3.30 and the doors will open at 2.15.

BLANDFORD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
JAN 4 - 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

A PIONEER, affirms Ernest Newman in one of his stimulating volumes, is generally a second-rate person of fanatical bent. His paroxyms redound to the advantage of some later man of genius who grafts upon the classic body of his art such of the pathfinder's innovations as chance to be of value. That justification for the stuttering experiments of modernist music was supplied at Carnegie Hall last night by Ernst Toch's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 38, which was presented for the first time in New York by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Herr Toch has at his fingertips the resources which often afflict us at concerts such as the Copland-Sessions series and the cycles of the League of Composers. Freedom of form, plasticity of rhythm, atonality and polytonality—these have no secrets from the Viennese composer. But he is no mere lexicographer busied with adding new words to the musical language. Steeped in the great German tradition, he finds in the modernist vocabulary an instrument, finely cutting and sharply precise, for the expression of feelings and ideas. The result, in his concerto, is music belonging authentically to the mentality of the twentieth century—subtle, transparent, realistic but not heartless, swift of pace and as dynamic as an airplane.

* * *

After all, the processes of our own "nuova musiche" to which formidable names are given represent for the scientist of acoustics a phenomenon logical, simple and legitimate. They form no more than a progressive conquest of the remoter partials of the harmonic series. For the Greeks only the interval of the octave was aesthetically tolerable. More than a thousand years later the human ear grew acclimated to the fourth and fifth. Almost in our age it came to endure the third and sixth. To-day it is asked suddenly to accept the total apparatus of overtones, which eventually includes the entire chromatic scale. And why not?—the physicist demands. Is there any reason, outside of inertia and habit why one interval should be more comprehensible than another?

Apparently not, if one may judge by the reception of eager hospitality which yesterday evening's typical audience extended to the Toch concerto. It was such a gathering as a few days ago, in the same auditorium, hissed Alexander Tansman's suite from "La Nuit Kurde," which was couched in a similar diction. The difference in response was obviously not due to the modernist idiom. The hearers acutely distinguished between a composer who juggled the new effects for their own sake, and one who marshaled them in order as a means for conveying a communication of force, clarity and significance.

* * *

The concerto consists of three movements—allegro, adagio and rondino disturbato. It rejoiced last night in the superb strength and fire of Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, the utmost skill and ardor of America's foremost orchestra, and the distinguished assistance of Jesus Maria Sanroma, a youthful pianist with a torero's lithe slenderness and deadly striking power of shoulder, who resembled Vladimir Horowitz in charm and flare, controlled by the manliness and restraint of the Castilian.

Under such auspices the electrical first movement erupted in a blaze of energy. But the principal effect was won by the poetic adagio, which was for all the world like a slow movement of Brahms stated in a different tongue. It resembled a translation of a German poem into an alien speech, with its substance of emotion burning unmistakably through the unfamiliar vocables. And in the concluding section the music was reined in with a giant's wrist upon the very rim of an ecstasy of madness in its own vitality, speed and force.

* * *

The potency of the composition was best shown by the fact that it suffered no ill effects from being bracketed between Handel's Imperial Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12, and the most penetrating and imaginative reading of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" ever heard by the writer. The work which really collapsed under the strain was Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," which received a performance undreamed of in the philosophy of the Metropolitan Opera House, but which, nevertheless, in contrast with the adult and civilized Toch concerto, proved mere baby-talk of the musical nursery.

To convert so hackneyed a creation as the "Unfinished Symphony" into fresh, new music, without violating for a moment the inmost spirit of the work, requires a genius akin to that of the composer himself. This feat Mr. Koussevitzky, in one of his most auspicious moods of insight, was able to encompass. He found within the familiar measures secrets hidden from other interpreters.

The opening theme, for instance, was given softly, with a hush and suspense as if the composer had looked upon the cruelty of life and asked himself tremulously: "Can this thing be?" Then there was the poignant contrast between the first and second appearances of the G Major motive for violoncellos—the one candid and open-eyed, the other fraught with heartbreak. The abrupt outbursts of grief, too, were filled with a strange quiet, so that one knew this to be the suffering of a noble and not a vulgar soul. In short, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky's intuition, the "Unfinished Symphony" suddenly moved to a place beside Hamlet's soliloquy, "To be or not to be."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD. MASS.
NEWS
JAN 4 - 1929

...passing over her.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES RARE TREAT

Of the four works to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its annual concert at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, two are already familiar to Springfield audiences. Both Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" have been heard previously. These represent the French school of music which generally upset musical traditions 25 years ago. The whole-tone scale, exotic combinations of instruments, and freedom of form characterises the music of Debussy. His "Prelude" is considered one of his finest works.

Maurice Ravel made his first American tour last season, and during that time conducted "La Valse." One of the first concerts devoted to his music was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and was broadcast over station WBZ. In this program, was included "La Valse," which was heard over many Springfield radios. "La Valse" was also played by the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts here several years ago.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," will receive its first hearing in Springfield on Sunday. Portions of a suite of his, "The Love of Three Oranges," were played by the Symphony some time ago. This work written in the free modern style, but in the "Classical Symphony" the composer has reverted to the orthodox form adopted by the classic masters.

The chief work of Sunday's program will be the Symphony No 2 in D major, op. 73, by Johannes Brahms. It was written around 1877, in Austria. After completing the work Brahms wrote to a friend, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony, I must inquire of skilled persons." The "skilled persons" did not receive the symphony with enthusiasm. It was the general belief at that time that Wagner and Liszt had exhausted the possibilities of symphonic music, making it difficult for any new composer to break into the orchestral field.

It was first played in America at Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, January 9, 1879. It was called "perplexing and cryptic."

An unusual demand for tickets is noticeable at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring reserved seats should apply at the Y. M. C. A. where arrangements may be made for the single concert, or the remainder of the season, which continues on Sunday afternoons until February 17. Sunday's concert will begi: at 3, instead of at the usual hour of 3.30 and the doors will open at 2.15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
JAN 4 - 1929

MAHLER'S "SONG OF EARTH" AND TOCH'S NEW MUSIC HEARD

By IRVING WEIL.

A double ration of orchestral concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday was rather more a matter of the taste of conductors than of audiences, at least so far as concerned the new and unfamiliar music that was brought forward. In the afternoon, Willem Mengelberg occupied himself, the Philharmonic Orchestra and a contralto and tenor with Mahler's pretentious but sadly impotent "The Song of the Earth"—Mahler being one of the Dutch conductor's irrepressible loves. In the evening, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, with the help of Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, introduced the Austrian Ernst Toch's new piano conerto—Toch being one of the convictions in his modernistic gospel.

Mahler's music still has its ardent and suspiciously shrill partisans in Germany and Austria, and a few in Holland, of whom Mr. Mengelberg is one. But in New York, which never appreated Mahler as even the great conductor he was—one of the greatest four we have ever listened to—New York has always shrugged a cold shoulder at Mahler the composer. His ten symphonies, among which "The Song of the Earth" is usually numbered, although it is really a song-cycle in six parts, are nearly all grandiose in plan and intention and lamentably feeble in result.

Now and again some imported conductor ventures a performance of one or another of the symphonies, but the outcome is always disastrous and none of them really has a hold on the orchestral repertoire hereabouts. "The Song of the Earth," which Mahler wrote three years before his death in 1911 immediately following his last Winter here as conductor of the Philharmonic, was first performed in America by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra twelve years ago, but he never brought it to New York. The Friends of Music gave it here six years ago and yesterday's performance was only its second.

The music is a prescient and weary gesture by Mahler signifying the end of all desire. The words of the much adapted Chinese poems of which it is a setting reveal the man resigned at last to bitter disillusion; reveal him, too, faced toward death, which he knew could not be far off, with something like longing—longing for rest from the struggle and frustration that dogged him throughout his days. The gayety in several of the songs is pathetic in its tinkling lustrelessness; but more profoundly pathetic is the sheer inability of the man to express adequately his most deeply felt emotion.

Toch, if his new piano concerto is an indication, has gone over to the noisemakers, strings, wind and drums. The piece is atonal music without reservation, built almost wholly on the Schoenbergian twelve-tone scale. It is an apparently self-conscious attempt to outdo both Schoenberg and Bela Bartok and it is fearfully difficult and trying to listen to. There is quite evidently a programme of some sort behind it and it seems to us rather foolish on the composer's part not to have disclosed what it is. At a first hearing the piece is fairly baffling but at the same time unconvincing. Mr. Sanroma handled the piano part brilliantly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JAN 4 - 1929

Music :

By Oscar Thompson

Toch's Exciting Piano Concerto Introduced by Bostonians—A Superb Performance of Mahler's "Song of Earth"

RONDO DISTURBATO was the designation given the last movement of his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Ernest Toch. As played in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the designation might have been extended to characterize the entire work. Toch's was a Concerto Disturbato, even to ears attuned to Bartok and those other paladins of dissonance who have written atonally and polytonally for piano and orchestra.

This was a first New York performance of undoubted consequence, if music is to continue along the stridulous paths deserted by Stravinsky after he, perhaps more than any other composer, had directed it to them. The concerto is now nearly three years old and has been heard in Chicago and Boston as well as in various cities of the Old World. Last night's soloist did similar duty in a Paris performance last May, also conducted by Koussevitzky. As the concerto is to be repeated at the Bostonians' Saturday concert, the work can scarcely be numbered among the shamefully neglected products of hidden genius.

However, this is not a flower to blush unseen, or, to mix the metaphor, to sigh unheard. Modesty, reserve, sensitiveness are not its cardinal qualities. It is very much twentieth century in its din, its brass, its impudence, its pile-driving vitality. It hits the listener between the eyes as perhaps no other work of its character has done. For those to whom it is that long-sought desideratum, an expression of the age, it may even be something of a knockout. For others who may be inclined to believe that to cultivate the hard-boiled and the mechanistic is to close the door at the start on any very promising musical inspiration, the question remains as to whether this is music at all.

THERE are many stunning effects—stunning in the literal meaning of the word—in the more violent parts of this concerto. Whether they will have any continuing musical value when they have ceased to be novel is not to be too confidently asserted on the basis of the excitement, on the one hand—or the aversion, on the other—they plainly asserted at last night's performance. This reviewer was surfeited with a formulistic artificiality, a self-conscious strutting, an attitude of "watch my smoke" in most of the first and last movements. The slow movement, if scarcely to be described as beautiful, had an utterance orderly and purposeful, with neat and often attractive turns of phrase.

If the Stravinsky of today is right this concerto may be regarded as an abortive illustration of a skill worthy of a better fate; but if atonality, polytonality, mechanical din and rhythmic violence are, indeed, the signposts of the new day, then Toch has contributed a work that outclasses most of its competitors.

The performance, let it be said, was an electrical one. Though Mr. Sanroma played tenderly enough in the Adagio, he achieved the clatter of a steel-riveting machine in the Allegro.

OTHERWISE, the evening was devoted to Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12—a noble performance of music that admittedly is of quite another age; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, which, it must also be confessed, possesses not a little of those attributes of the heart which are not permitted to intrude upon Toch, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," that "ballet of modern American life," with its "filtered" jazz, which also echoes the machine. Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the symphony and the ballet were familiar from other concerts he has conducted in New York. Soloists in the Carpenter work were Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 4 - 1929

...that there will be a heavy attendance.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES RARE TREAT

Concert Sunday at Auditorium to Include Familiar Music and Modern Masterpiece

Of the four works to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its annual concert at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, two are already familiar to Springfield audiences. Both Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" have been heard previously. These represent the French school of music which generally upset musical traditions 25 years ago. The whole-tone scale, exotic combinations of instruments, and freedom of form characterises the music of Debussy. His "Prelude" is considered one of his finest works.

Maurice Ravel made his first American tour last season, and during that time conducted "La Valse." One of the first concerts devoted to his music was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and was broadcast over station WBZ. In this program, was included "La Valse," which was heard over many Springfield radios. "La Valse" was also played by the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts here several years ago.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," will receive its first hearing in Springfield on Sunday. Portions of a suite of his, "The Love of Three Oranges," were played by the Symphony some time ago. This work written in the free modern style, but in the "Classical Symphony" the composer has reverted to the orthodox form adopted by the classic masters.

The chief work of Sunday's program will be the Symphony No 2 in D major, op. 73, by Johannes Brahms. It was written around 1877, in Austria. After completing the work Brahms wrote to a friend, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony, I must inquire of skilled persons." The "skilled persons" did not receive the symphony with enthusiasm. It was the general belief at that time that Wagner and Liszt had exhausted the possibilities of symphonic music, making it difficult for any new composer to break into the orchestral field.

It was first played in America at Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, January 9, 1879. It was called "perplexing and cryptic."

An unusual demand for tickets is noticeable at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring reserved seats should apply at the Y. M. C. A. where arrangements may be made for the single concert, or the remainder of the season, which continues on Sunday afternoons until February 17. Sunday's concert will begi at 3, instead of at the usual hour of 3.30 and the doors will open at 2.15.

BLANDFORD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
JAN 4 - 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

A PIONEER, affirms Ernest Newman in one of his stimulating volumes, is generally a second-rate person of fanatical bent. His paroxyms redound to the advantage of some later man of genius who grafts upon the classic body of his art such of the pathfinder's innovations as chance to be of value. That justification for the stuttering experiments of modernist music was supplied at Carnegie Hall last night by Ernst Toch's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 38, which was presented for the first time in New York by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Herr Toch has at his fingertips the resources which often afflict us at concerts such as the Copland-Sessions series and the cycles of the League of Composers. Freedom of form, plasticity of rhythm, atonality and polytonality—these have no secrets from the Viennese composer. But he is no mere lexicographer busied with adding new words to the musical language. Steeped in the great German tradition, he finds in the modernist vocabulary an instrument, finely cutting and sharply precise, for the expression of feelings and ideas. The result, in his concerto, is music belonging authentically to the mentality of the twentieth century—subtle, transparent, realistic but not heartless, swift of pace and as dynamic as an airplane.

* * *

After all, the processes of our own "nuova musiche" to which formidable names are given represent for the scientist of acoustics a phenomenon logical, simple and legitimate. They form no more than a progressive conquest of the remoter partials of the harmonic series. For the Greeks only the interval of the octave was aesthetically tolerable. More than a thousand years later the human ear grew acclimated to the fourth and fifth. Almost in our age it came to endure the third and sixth. To-day it is asked suddenly to accept the total apparatus of overtones, which eventually includes the entire chromatic scale. And why not?—the physicist demands. Is there any reason, outside of inertia and habit why one interval should be more comprehensible than another?

Apparently not, if one may judge by the reception of eager hospitality which yesterday evening's typical audience extended to the Toch concerto. It was such a gathering as a few days ago, in the same auditorium, hissed Alexander Tansman's suite from "La Nuit Kurde," which was couched in a similar diction. The difference in response was obviously not due to the modernist idiom. The hearers acutely distinguished between a composer who juggled the new effects for their own sake, and one who marshaled them in order as a means for conveying a communication of force, clarity and significance.

* * *

The concerto consists of three movements—allegro, adagio and rondino disturbato. It rejoiced last night in the superb strength and fire of Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, the utmost skill and ardor of America's foremost orchestra, and the distinguished assistance of Jesus Maria Sanroma, a youthful pianist with a torero's lithe slenderness and deadly striking power of shoulder, who resembled Vladimir Horowitz in charm and flare, controlled by the manliness and restraint of the Castilian.

Under such auspices the electrical first movement erupted in a blaze of energy. But the principal effect was won by the poetic adagio, which was for all the world like a slow movement of Brahms stated in a different tongue. It resembled a translation of a German poem into an alien speech, with its substance of emotion burning unmistakably through the unfamiliar vocables. And in the concluding section the music was reined in with a giant's wrist upon the very rim of an ecstasy of madness in its own vitality, speed and force.

* * *

The potency of the composition was best shown by the fact that it suffered no ill effects from being bracketed between Handel's Imperial Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12, and the most penetrating and imaginative reading of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" ever heard by the writer. The work which really collapsed under the strain was Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," which received a performance undreamed of in the philosophy of the Metropolitan Opera House, but which, nevertheless, in contrast with the adult and civilized Toch concerto, proved mere baby-talk of the musical nursery.

To convert so hackneyed a creation as the "Unfinished Symphony" into fresh, new music, without violating for a moment the inmost spirit of the work, requires a genius akin to that of the composer himself. This feat Mr. Koussevitzky, in one of his most auspicious moods of insight, was able to encompass. He found within the familiar measures secrets hidden from other interpreters.

The opening theme, for instance, was given softly, with a hush and suspense as if the composer had looked upon the cruelty of life and asked himself tremulously: "Can this thing be?" Then there was the poignant contrast between the first and second appearances of the G Major motive for violoncellos—the one candid and open-eyed, the other fraught with heartbreak. The abrupt outbursts of grief, too, were filled with a strange quiet, so that one knew this to be the suffering of a noble and not a vulgar soul. In short, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky's intuition, the "Unfinished Symphony" suddenly moved to a place beside Hamlet's soliloquy, "To be or not to be."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD. MASS.
NEWS
JAN 4 - 1929

...after passing over her.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES RARE TREAT

Of the four works to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its annual concert at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, two are already familiar to Springfield audiences. Both Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" have been heard previously. These represent the French school of music which generally upset musical traditions 25 years ago. The whole-tone scale, exotic combinations of instruments, and freedom of form characterises the music of Debussy. His "Prelude" is considered one of his finest works.

Maurice Ravel made his first American tour last season, and during that time conducted "La Valse." One of the first concerts devoted to his music was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and was broadcast over station WBZ. In this program, was included "La Valse," which was heard over many Springfield radios. "La Valse" was also played by the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts here several years ago.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," will receive its first hearing in Springfield on Sunday. Portions of a suite of his, "The Love of Three Oranges," were played by the Symphony some time ago. This work written in the free modern style, but in the "Classical Symphony" the composer has reverted to the orthodox form adopted by the classic masters.

The chief work of Sunday's program will be the Symphony No 2 in D major, op. 73, by Johannes Brahms. It was written around 1877, in Austria. After completing the work Brahms wrote to a friend, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony, I must inquire of skilled persons." The "skilled persons" did not receive the symphony with enthusiasm. It was the general belief at that time that Wagner and Liszt had exhausted the possibilities of symphonic music, making it difficult for any new composer to break into the orchestral field.

It was first played in America at Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, January 9, 1879. It was called "perplexing and cryptic."

An unusual demand for tickets is noticeable at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring reserved seats should apply at the Y. M. C. A. where arrangements may be made for the single concert, or the remainder of the season, which continues on Sunday afternoons until February 17. Sunday's concert will begi at 3, instead of at the usual hour of 3.30 and the doors will open at 2.15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
JAN 4 - 1929

MAHLER'S "SONG OF EARTH" AND TOCH'S NEW MUSIC HEARD

By IRVING WEIL.

A double ration of orchestral concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday was rather more a matter of the taste of conductors than of audiences, at least so far as concerned the new and unfamiliar music that was brought forward. In the afternoon, Willem Mengelberg occupied himself, the Philharmonic Orchestra and a contralto and tenor with Mahler's pretentious but sadly impotent "The Song of the Earth"—Mahler being one of the Dutch conductor's irrepressible loves. In the evening, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, with the help of Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, introduced the Austrian Ernst Toch's new piano conerto—Toch being one of the convictions in his modernistic gospel.

Mahler's music still has its ardent and suspiciously shrill partisans in Germany and Austria, and a few in Holland, of whom Mr. Mengelberg is one. But in New York, which never appreciated Mahler as even the great conductor he was—one of the greatest four we have ever listened to—New York has always shrugged a cold shoulder at Mahler the composer. His ten symphonies, among which "The Song of the Earth" is usually numbered, although it is really a song-cycle in six parts, are nearly all grandiose in plan and intention and lamentably feeble in result.

Now and again some imported conductor ventures a performance of one or another of the symphonies, but the outcome is always disastrous and none of them really has a hold on the orchestral repertoire hereabouts. "The Song of the Earth," which Mahler wrote three years before his death in 1911 immediately following his last Winter here as conductor of the Philharmonic, was first performed in America by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra twelve years ago, but he never brought it to New York. The Friends of Music gave it here six years ago and yesterday's performance was only its second.

The music is a prescient and weary gesture by Mahler signifying the end of all desire. The words of the much adapted Chinese poems of which it is a setting reveal the man resigned at last to bitter disillusion; reveal him, too, faced toward death, which he knew could not be far off, with something like longing—longing for rest from the struggle and frustration that dogged him throughout his days. The gayety in several of the songs is pathetic in its tinkling lustrelessness; but more profoundly pathetic is the sheer inability of the man to express adequately his most deeply felt emotion.

Toch, if his new piano concerto is an indication, has gone over to the noisemakers, strings, wind and drums. The piece is atonal music without reservation, built almost wholly on the Schoenbergian twelve-tone scale. It is an apparently self-conscious attempt to outdo both Schoenberg and Bela Bartok and it is fearfully difficult and trying to listen to. There is quite evidently a programme of some sort behind it and it seems to us rather foolish on the composer's part not to have disclosed what it is. At a first hearing the piece is fairly baffling but at the same time unconvincing. Mr. Sanroma handled the piano part brilliantly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

JAN 4 - 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Toch's Exciting Piano Concerto Introduced by Bostonians—A Superb Performance of Mahler's "Song of Earth"

RONDO DISTURBATO was the designation given the last movement of his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Ernest Toch. As played in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the designation might have been extended to characterize the entire work. Toch's was a Concerto Disturbato, even to ears attuned to Bartok and those other paladins of dissonance who have written atonally and polytonally for piano and orchestra.

This was a first New York performance of undoubted consequence, if music is to continue along the stridulous paths deserted by Stravinsky after he, perhaps more than any other composer, had directed it to them. The concerto is now nearly three years old and has been heard in Chicago and Boston as well as in various cities of the Old World. Last night's soloist did similar duty in a Paris performance last May, also conducted by Koussevitzky. As the concerto is to be repeated at the Bostonians' Saturday concert, the work can scarcely be numbered among the shamefully neglected products of hidden genius.

However, this is not a flower to blush unseen, or, to mix the metaphor, to sigh unheard. Modesty, reserve, sensitiveness are not its cardinal qualities. It is very much twentieth century in its din, its brass, its impudence, its pile-driving vitality. It hits the listener between the eyes as perhaps no other work of its character has done. For those to whom it is that long-sought desideratum, an expression of the age, it may even be something of a knockout. For others who may be inclined to believe that to cultivate the hard-boiled and the mechanistic is to close the door at the start on any very promising musical inspiration, the question remains as to whether this is music at all.

THERE are many stunning effects—stunning in the literal meaning of the word—in the more violent parts of this concerto. Whether they will have any continuing musical value when they have ceased to be novel is not to be too confidently asserted on the basis of the excitement, on the one hand—or the aversion, on the other—they plainly asserted at last night's performance. This reviewer was surfeited with a formulistic artificiality, a self-conscious strutting, an attitude of "watch my smoke" in most of the first and last movements. The slow movement, if scarcely to be described as beautiful, had an utterance orderly and purposeful, with neat and often attractive turns of phrase.

If the Stravinsky of today is right this concerto may be regarded as an abortive illustration of a skill worthy of a better fate; but if atonality, polytonality, mechanical din and rhythmic violence are, indeed, the signposts of the new day, then Toch has contributed a work that outclasses most of its competitors.

The performance, let it be said, was an electrical one. Though Mr. Sanroma played tenderly enough in the Adagio, he achieved the clatter of a steel-riveting machine in the Allegro.

OTHERWISE, the evening was devoted to Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12—a noble performance of music that admittedly is of quite another age; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, which, it must also be confessed, possesses not a little of those attributes of the heart which are not permitted to intrude upon Toch, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," that "ballet of modern American life," with its "filtered" jazz, which also echoes the machine. Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the symphony and the ballet were familiar from other concerts he has conducted in New York. Soloists in the Carpenter work were Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 4 - 1929

[illegible] that there will be a heavy attendance.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES RARE TREAT

Concert Sunday at Auditorium to Include Familiar Music and Modern Masterpiece

Of the four works to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its annual concert at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, two are already familiar to Springfield audiences. Both Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" have been heard previously. These represent the French school of music which generally upset musical traditions 25 years ago. The whole-tone scale, exotic combinations of instruments, and freedom of form characterises the music of Debussy. His "Prelude" is considered one of his finest works.

Maurice Ravel made his first American tour last season, and during that time conducted "La Valse." One of the first concerts devoted to his music was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and was broadcast over station WBZ. In this program, was included "La Valse," which was heard over many Springfield radios. "La Valse" was also played by the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts here several years ago.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," will receive its first hearing in Springfield on Sunday. Portions of a suite of his, "The Love of Three Oranges," were played by the Symphony some time ago. This work written in the free modern style, but in the "Classical Symphony" the composer has reverted to the orthodox form adopted by the classic masters.

The chief work of Sunday's program will be the Symphony No 2 in D major, op. 73, by Johannes Brahms. It was written around 1877, in Austria. After completing the work Brahms wrote to a friend, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony, I must inquire of skilled persons." The "skilled persons" did not receive the symphony with enthusiasm. It was the general belief at that time that Wagner and Liszt had exhausted the possibilities of symphonic music, making it difficult for any new composer to break into the orchestral field.

It was first played in America at Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, January 9, 1879. It was called "perplexing and cryptic."

An unusual demand for tickets is noticeable at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring reserved seats should apply at the Y. M. C. A. where arrangements may be made for the single concert, or the remainder of the season, which continues on Sunday afternoons until February 17. Sunday's concert will begi[illegible] at 3, instead of at the usual hour of 3.30 and the doors will open at 2.15.

BLANDFORD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

JAN 4 - 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

A PIONEER, affirms Ernest Newman in one of his stimulating volumes, is generally a second-rate person of fanatical bent. His paroxyms redound to the advantage of some later man of genius who grafts upon the classic body of his art such of the pathfinder's innovations as chance to be of value. That justification for the stuttering experiments of modernist music was supplied at Carnegie Hall last night by Ernst Toch's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. [illegible], which was presented for the first time in New York by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Herr Toch has at his fingertips the resources which often afflict us at concerts such as the Copland-Sessions series and the cycles of the League of Composers. Freedom of form, plasticity of rhythm, atonality and polytonality—these have no secrets from the Viennese composer. But he is no mere lexicographer busied with adding new words to the musical language. Steeped in the great German tradition, he finds in the modernist vocabulary an instrument, finely cutting and sharply precise, for the expression of feelings and ideas. The result, in his concerto, is music belonging authentically to the mentality of the twentieth century—subtle, transparent, realistic but not heartless, swift of pace and as dynamic as an airplane.

* * *

After all, the processes of our own "nuova musiche" to which formidable names are given represent for the scientist of acoustics a phenomenon logical, simple and legitimate. They form no more than a progressive conquest of the remoter partials of the harmonic series. For the Greeks only the interval of the octave was aesthetically tolerable. More than a thousand years later the human ear grew acclimated to the fourth and fifth. Almost in our age it came to endure the third and sixth. To-day it is asked suddenly to accept the total apparatus of overtones, which eventually includes the entire chromatic scale. And why not?—the physicist demands. Is there any reason, outside of inertia and habit why one interval should be more comprehensible than another?

Apparently not, if one may judge by the reception of eager hospitality which yesterday evening's typical audience extended to the Toch concerto. It was such a gathering as a few days ago, in the same auditorium, hissed Alexander Tansman's suite from "La Nuit Kurde," which was couched in a similar diction. The difference in response was obviously not due to the modernist idiom. The hearers acutely distinguished between a composer who juggled the new effects for their own sake, and one who marshaled them in order as a means for conveying a communication of force, clarity and significance.

* * *

The concerto consists of three movements—allegro, adagio and rondino disturbato. It rejoiced last night in the superb strength and fire of Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, the utmost skill and ardor of America's foremost orchestra, and the distinguished assistance of Jesus Maria Sanroma, a youthful pianist with a torero's lithe slenderness and deadly striking power of shoulder, who resembled Vladimir Horowitz in charm and flare, controlled by the manliness and restraint of the Castilian.

Under such auspices the electrical first movement erupted in a blaze of energy. But the principal effect was won by the poetic adagio, which was for all the world like a slow movement of Brahms stated in a different tongue. It resembled a translation of a German poem into an alien speech, with its substance of emotion burning unmistakably through the unfamiliar vocables. And in the concluding section the music was reined in with a giant's wrist upon the very rim of an ecstasy of madness in its own vitality, speed and force.

* * *

The potency of the composition was best shown by the fact that it suffered no ill effects from being bracketed between Handel's Imperial Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12, and the most penetrating and imaginative reading of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" ever heard by the writer. The work which really collapsed under the strain was Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," which received a performance undreamed of in the philosophy of the Metropolitan Opera House, but which, nevertheless, in contrast with the adult and civilized Toch concerto, proved mere baby-talk of the musical nursery.

To convert so hackneyed a creation as the "Unfinished Symphony" into fresh, new music, without violating for a moment the inmost spirit of the work, requires a genius akin to that of the composer himself. This feat Mr. Koussevitzky, in one of his most auspicious moods of insight, was able to encompass. He found within the familiar measures secrets hidden from other interpreters.

The opening theme, for instance, was given softly, with a hush and suspense as if the composer had looked upon the cruelty of life and asked himself tremulously: "Can this thing be?" Then there was the poignant contrast between the first and second appearances of the G Major motive for violoncellos—the one candid and open-eyed, the other fraught with heartbreak. The abrupt outbursts of grief, too, were filled with a strange quiet, so that one knew this to be the suffering of a noble and not a vulgar soul. In short, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky's intuition, the "Unfinished Symphony" suddenly moved to a place beside Hamlet's soliloquy, "To be or not to be."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 4 - 1929

[illegible] passing over her.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES RARE TREAT

Of the four works to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its annual concert at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, two are already familiar to Springfield audiences. Both Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" have been heard previously. These represent the French school of music which generally upset musical traditions 25 years ago. The whole-tone scale, exotic combinations of instruments, and freedom of form characterises the music of Debussy. His "Prelude" is considered one of his finest works.

Maurice Ravel made his first American tour last season, and during that time conducted "La Valse." One of the first concerts devoted to his music was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and was broadcast over station WBZ. In this program, was included "La Valse," which was heard over many Springfield radios. "La Valse" was also played by the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts here several years ago.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," will receive its first hearing in Springfield on Sunday. Portions of a suite of his, "The Love of Three Oranges," were played by the Symphony some time ago. This work written in the free modern style, but in the "Classical Symphony" the composer has reverted to the orthodox form adopted by the classic masters.

The chief work of Sunday's program will be the Symphony No 2 in D major, op. 73, by Johannes Brahms. It was written around 1877, in Austria. After completing the work Brahms wrote to a friend, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony, I must inquire of skilled persons." The "skilled persons" did not receive the symphony with enthusiasm. It was the general belief at that time that Wagner and Liszt had exhausted the possibilities of symphonic music, making it difficult for any new composer to break into the orchestral field.

It was first played in America at Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, January 9, 1879. It was called "perplexing and cryptic."

An unusual demand for tickets is noticeable at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring reserved seats should apply at the Y. M. C. A. where arrangements may be made for the single concert, or the remainder of the season, which continues on Sunday afternoons until February 17. Sunday's concert will begi[illegible] at 3, instead of at the usual hour of 3.30 and the doors will open at 2.15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JAN 4 - 1929

MAHLER'S "SONG OF EARTH" AND TOCH'S NEW MUSIC HEARD

By IRVING WEIL.

A double ration of orchestral concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday was rather more a matter of the taste of conductors than of audiences, at least so far as concerned the new and unfamiliar music that was brought forward. In the afternoon, Willem Mengelberg occupied himself, the Philharmonic Orchestra and a contralto and tenor with Mahler's pretentious but sadly impotent "The Song of the Earth"—Mahler being one of the Dutch conductor's irrepressible loves. In the evening, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, with the help of Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, introduced the Austrian Ernst Toch's new piano conerto—Toch being one of the convictions in his modernistic gospel.

Mahler's music still has its ardent and suspiciously shrill partisans in Germany and Austria, and a few in Holland, of whom Mr. Mengelberg is one. But in New York, which never appreciated Mahler as even the great conductor he was—one of the greatest four we have ever listened to—New York has always shrugged a cold shoulder at Mahler the composer. His ten symphonies, among which "The Song of the Earth" is usually numbered, although it is really a song-cycle in six parts, are nearly all grandiose in plan and intention and lamentably feeble in result.

Now and again some imported conductor ventures a performance of one or another of the symphonies, but the outcome is always disastrous and none of them really has a hold on the orchestral repertoire hereabouts. "The Song of the Earth," which Mahler wrote three years before his death in 1911 immediately following his last Winter here as conductor of the Philharmonic, was first performed in America by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra twelve years ago, but he never brought it to New York. The Friends of Music gave it here six years ago and yesterday's performance was only its second.

The music is a prescient and weary gesture by Mahler signifying the end of all desire. The words of the much adapted Chinese poems of which it is a setting reveal the man resigned at last to bitter disillusion; reveal him, too, faced toward death, which he knew could not be far off, with something like longing—longing for rest from the struggle and frustration that dogged him throughout his days. The gayety in several of the songs is pathetic in its tinkling lustrelessness; but more profoundly pathetic is the sheer inability of the man to express adequately his most deeply felt emotion.

Toch, if his new piano concerto is an indication, has gone over to the noisemakers, strings, wind and drums. The piece is atonal music without reservation, built almost wholly on the Schoenbergian twelve-tone scale. It is an apparently self-conscious attempt to outdo both Schoenberg and Bela Bartok and it is fearfully difficult and trying to listen to. There is quite evidently a programme of some sort behind it and it seems to us rather foolish on the composer's part not to have disclosed what it is. At a first hearing the piece is fairly baffling but at the same time unconvincing. Mr. Sanroma handled the piano part brilliantly.

[illegible] my love.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JAN 4 - 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Toch's Exciting Piano Concerto Introduced by Bostonians—A Superb Performance of Mahler's "Song of Earth"

RONDO DISTURBATO was the designation given the last movement of his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Ernest Toch. As played in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the designation might have been extended to characterize the entire work. Toch's was a Concerto Disturbato, even to ears attuned to Bartok and those other paladins of dissonance who have written atonally and polytonally for piano and orchestra.

This was a first New York performance of undoubted consequence, if music is to continue along the stridulous paths deserted by Stravinsky after he, perhaps more than any other composer, had directed it to them. The concerto is now nearly three years old and has been heard in Chicago and Boston as well as in various cities of the Old World. Last night's soloist did similar duty in a Paris performance last May, also conducted by Koussevitzky. As the concerto is to be repeated at the Bostonians' Saturday concert, the work can scarcely be numbered among the shamefully neglected products of hidden genius.

However, this is not a flower to blush unseen, or, to mix the metaphor, to sigh unheard. Modesty, reserve, sensitiveness are not its cardinal qualities. It is very much twentieth century in its din, its brass, its impudence, its pile-driving vitality. It hits the listener between the eyes as perhaps no other work of its character has done. For those to whom it is that long-sought desideratum, an expression of the age, it may even be something of a knockout. For others who may be inclined to believe that to cultivate the hard-boiled and the mechanistic is to close the door at the start on any very promising musical inspiration, the question remains as to whether this is music at all.

THERE are many stunning effects—stunning in the literal meaning of the word—in the more violent parts of this concerto. Whether they will have any continuing musical value when they have ceased to be novel is not to be too confidently asserted on the basis of the excitement, on the one hand—or the aversion, on the other—they plainly asserted at last night's performance. This reviewer was surfeited with a formulistic artificiality, a self-conscious strutting, an attitude of "watch my smoke" in most of the first and last movements. The slow movement, if scarcely to be described as beautiful, had an utterance orderly and purposeful, with neat and often attractive turns of phrase.

If the Stravinsky of today is right, this concerto may be regarded as an abortive illustration of a skill worthy of a better fate; but if atonality, polytonality, mechanical din and rhythmic violence are, indeed, the signposts of the new day, then Toch has contributed a work that outclasses most of its competitors.

The performance, let it be said, was an electrical one. Though Mr. Sanroma played tenderly enough in the Adagio, he achieved the clatter of a steel-riveting machine in the Allegro.

OTHERWISE, the evening was devoted to Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12—a noble performance of music that admittedly is of quite another age; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, which, it must also be confessed, possesses not a little of those attributes of the heart which are not permitted to intrude upon Toch, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," that "ballet of modern American life," with its "filtered" jazz, which also echoes the machine. Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the symphony and the ballet were familiar from other concerts he has conducted in New York. Soloists in the Carpenter work were Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 4 - 1929

...indicates that there will be a heavy attendance.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES RARE TREAT

Concert Sunday at Auditorium to Include Familiar Music and Modern Masterpiece

Of the four works to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its annual concert at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, two are already familiar to Springfield audiences. Both Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" have been heard previously. These represent the French school of music which generally upset musical traditions 25 years ago. The whole-tone scale, exotic combinations of instruments, and freedom of form characterises the music of Debussy. His "Prelude" is considered one of his finest works.

Maurice Ravel made his first American tour last season, and during that time conducted "La Valse." One of the first concerts devoted to his music was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and was broadcast over station WBZ. In this program, was included "La Valse," which was heard over many Springfield radios. "La Valse" was also played by the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts here several years ago.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," will receive its first hearing in Springfield on Sunday. Portions of a suite of his, "The Love of Three Oranges," were played by the Symphony some time ago. This work written in the free modern style, but in the "Classical Symphony" the composer has reverted to the orthodox form adopted by the classic masters.

The chief work of Sunday's program will be the Symphony No 2 in D major, op. 73, by Johannes Brahms. It was written around 1877, in Austria. After completing the work Brahms wrote to a friend, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony, I must inquire of skilled persons." The "skilled persons" did not receive the symphony with enthusiasm. It was the general belief at that time that Wagner and Liszt had exhausted the possibilities of symphonic music, making it difficult for any new composer to break into the orchestral field.

It was first played in America at Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, January 9, 1879. It was called "perplexing and cryptic."

An unusual demand for tickets is noticeable at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring reserved seats should apply at the Y. M. C. A. where arrangements may be made for the single concert, or the remainder of the season, which continues on Sunday afternoons until February 17. Sunday's concert will begi at 3, instead of at the usual hour of 3.30 and the doors will open at 2.15.

BLANDFORD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
JAN 4 - 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

A PIONEER, affirms Ernest Newman in one of his stimulating volumes, is generally a second-rate person of fanatical bent. His paroxyms redound to the advantage of some later man of genius who grafts upon the classic body of his art such of the pathfinder's innovations as chance to be of value. That justification for the stuttering experiments of modernist music was supplied at Carnegie Hall last night by Ernst Toch's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 38, which was presented for the first time in New York by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Herr Toch has at his fingertips the resources which often afflict us at concerts such as the Copland-Sessions series and the cycles of the League of Composers. Freedom of form, plasticity of rhythm, atonality and polytonality—these have no secrets from the Viennese composer. But he is no mere lexicographer busied with adding new words to the musical language. Steeped in the great German tradition, he finds in the modernist vocabulary an instrument, finely cutting and sharply precise, for the expression of feelings and ideas. The result, in his concerto, is music belonging authentically to the mentality of the twentieth century—subtle, transparent, realistic but not heartless, swift of pace and as dynamic as an airplane.

* * *

After all, the processes of our own "nuova musiche" to which formidable names are given represent for the scientist of acoustics a phenomenon logical, simple and legitimate. They form no more than a progressive conquest of the remoter partials of the harmonic series. For the Greeks only the interval of the octave was aesthetically tolerable. More than a thousand years later the human ear grew acclimated to the fourth and fifth. Almost in our age it came to endure the third and sixth. To-day it is asked suddenly to accept the total apparatus of overtones, which eventually includes the entire chromatic scale. And why not?—the physicist demands. Is there any reason, outside of inertia and habit why one interval should be more comprehensible than another?

Apparently not, if one may judge by the reception of eager hospitality which yesterday evening's typical audience extended to the Toch concerto. It was such a gathering as a few days ago, in the same auditorium, hissed Alexander Tansman's suite from "La Nuit Kurde," which was couched in a similar diction. The difference in response was obviously not due to the modernist idiom. The hearers acutely distinguished between a composer who juggled the new effects for their own sake, and one who marshaled them in order as a means for conveying a communication of force, clarity and significance.

* * *

The concerto consists of three movements—allegro, adagio and rondino disturbato. It rejoiced last night in the superb strength and fire of Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, the utmost skill and ardor of America's foremost orchestra, and the distinguished assistance of Jesus Maria Sanroma, a youthful pianist with a torero's lithe slenderness and deadly striking power of shoulder, who resembled Vladimir Horowitz in charm and flare, controlled by the manliness and restraint of the Castilian.

Under such auspices the electrical first movement erupted in a blaze of energy. But the principal effect was won by the poetic adagio, which was for all the world like a slow movement of Brahms stated in a different tongue. It resembled a translation of a German poem into an alien speech, with its substance of emotion burning unmistakably through the unfamiliar vocables. And in the concluding section the music was reined in with a giant's wrist upon the very rim of an ecstasy of madness in its own vitality, speed and force.

* * *

The potency of the composition was best shown by the fact that it suffered no ill effects from being bracketed between Handel's Imperial Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12, and the most penetrating and imaginative reading of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" ever heard by the writer. The work which really collapsed under the strain was Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," which received a performance undreamed of in the philosophy of the Metropolitan Opera House, but which, nevertheless, in contrast with the adult and civilized Toch concerto, proved mere baby-talk of the musical nursery.

To convert so hackneyed a creation as the "Unfinished Symphony" into fresh, new music, without violating for a moment the inmost spirit of the work, requires a genius akin to that of the composer himself. This feat Mr. Koussevitzky, in one of his most auspicious moods of insight, was able to encompass. He found within the familiar measures secrets hidden from other interpreters.

The opening theme, for instance, was given softly, with a hush and suspense as if the composer had looked upon the cruelty of life and asked himself tremulously: "Can this thing be?" Then there was the poignant contrast between the first and second appearances of the G Major motive for violoncellos—the one candid and open-eyed, the other fraught with heartbreak. The abrupt outbursts of grief, too, were filled with a strange quiet, so that one knew this to be the suffering of a noble and not a vulgar soul. In short, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky's intuition, the "Unfinished Symphony" suddenly moved to a place beside Hamlet's soliloquy, "To be or not to be."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD. MASS.
NEWS
JAN 4 - 1929

...while passing over her.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES RARE TREAT

Of the four works to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its annual concert at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, two are already familiar to Springfield audiences. Both Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," and Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" have been heard previously. These represent the French school of music which generally upset musical traditions 25 years ago. The whole-tone scale, exotic combinations of instruments, and freedom of form characterises the music of Debussy. His "Prelude" is considered one of his finest works.

Maurice Ravel made his first American tour last season, and during that time conducted "La Valse." One of the first concerts devoted to his music was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and was broadcast over station WBZ. In this program, was included "La Valse," which was heard over many Springfield radios. "La Valse" was also played by the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts here several years ago.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," will receive its first hearing in Springfield on Sunday. Portions of a suite of his, "The Love of Three Oranges," were played by the Symphony some time ago. This work written in the free modern style, but in the "Classical Symphony" the composer has reverted to the orthodox form adopted by the classic masters.

The chief work of Sunday's program will be the Symphony No 2 in D major, op. 73, by Johannes Brahms. It was written around 1877, in Austria. After completing the work Brahms wrote to a friend, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony, I must inquire of skilled persons." The "skilled persons" did not receive the symphony with enthusiasm. It was the general belief at that time that Wagner and Liszt had exhausted the possibilities of symphonic music, making it difficult for any new composer to break into the orchestral field.

It was first played in America at Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, January 9, 1879. It was called "perplexing and cryptic."

An unusual demand for tickets is noticeable at the Y. M. C. A. and music stores. Those desiring reserved seats should apply at the Y. M. C. A. where arrangements may be made for the single concert, or the remainder of the season, which continues on Sunday afternoons until February 17. Sunday's concert will begi at 3, instead of at the usual hour of 3.30 and the doors will open at 2.15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
JAN 4 - 1929

MAHLER'S "SONG OF EARTH" AND TOCH'S NEW MUSIC HEARD

By IRVING WEIL.

A double ration of orchestral concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday was rather more a matter of the taste of conductors than of audiences, at least so far as concerned the new and unfamiliar music that was brought forward. In the afternoon, Willem Mengelberg occupied himself, the Philharmonic Orchestra and a contralto and tenor with Mahler's pretentious but sadly impotent "The Song of the Earth"—Mahler being one of the Dutch conductor's irrepressible loves. In the evening, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, with the help of Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, introduced the Austrian Ernst Toch's new piano conerto—Toch being one of the convictions in his modernistic gospel.

Mahler's music still has its ardent and suspiciously shrill partisans in Germany and Austria, and a few in Holland, of whom Mr. Mengelberg is one. But in New York, which never appreated Mahler as even the great conductor he was—one of the greatest four we have ever listened to—New York has always shrugged a cold shoulder at Mahler the composer. His ten symphonies, among which "The Song of the Earth" is usually numbered, although it is really a song-cycle in six parts, are nearly all grandiose in plan and intention and lamentably feeble in result.

Now and again some imported conductor ventures a performance of one or another of the symphonies, but the outcome is always disastrous and none of them really has a hold on the orchestral repertoire hereabouts. "The Song of the Earth," which Mahler wrote three years before his death in 1911 immediately following his last Winter here as conductor of the Philharmonic, was first performed in America by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra twelve years ago, but he never brought it to New York. The Friends of Music gave it here six years ago and yesterday's performance was only its second.

The music is a prescient and weary gesture by Mahler signifying the end of all desire. The words of the much adapted Chinese poems of which it is a setting reveal the man resigned at last to bitter disillusion; reveal him, too, faced toward death, which he knew could not be far off, with something like longing—longing for rest from the struggle and frustration that dogged him throughout his days. The gayety in several of the songs is pathetic in its tinkling lustrelessness; but more profoundly pathetic is the sheer inability of the man to express adequately his most deeply felt emotion.

Toch, if his new piano concerto is an indication, has gone over to the noisemakers, strings, wind and drums. The piece is atonal music without reservation, built almost wholly on the Schoenbergian twelve-tone scale. It is an apparently self-conscious attempt to outdo both Schoenberg and Bela Bartok and it is fearfully difficult and trying to listen to. There is quite evidently a programme of some sort behind it and it seems to us rather foolish on the composer's part not to have disclosed what it is. At a first hearing the piece is fairly baffling but at the same time unconvincing. Mr. Sanroma handled the piano part brilliantly.

72

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

JAN 4 - 1929

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

A Piano Concerto by Ernst Toch Is Given by the Boston Symphony—Mr. Mengelberg Conducts "Das Lied von der Erde."

ERNST TOCH, an insurgent Mannheimer from whom we have occasionally heard, contributed a Piano Concerto to the program of last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Born 42 years ago in Vienna and dedicated in his youth to the medical profession, his proficiency as a composer is the result of his own ambition and diligence. At 22 he won the Mozart Prize and a year later another Austrian jury, astonished by talents as obvious as they were unorthodox, awarded him the Mendelssohn Prize. Beyond these meagre details, information concerning Mr. Toch is difficult of discovery, and we must rely on his music for what we would know of the man.

The concerto last evening, performed for the first time in New York, was written in Mannheim early in 1926. It was played in Berlin a year later and in July of 1927 it was included on the programs of the Frankfort music festivals. Mr. Koussewitsky introduced it to Paris in the spring of 1928 and it received its first American hearing through the courtesy of Mr. Stock, who offered it to a Chicago audience little less than a year ago.

* * *

Knowing little of Mr. Toch's music, we have no way of telling whether or not this Concerto i characteristic of his style. It suggests a relationship to the Alba Berg who composed "Wozzek," bu it may very well be written in a idiom which Toch no longer em ploys and which Berg, certainly has abandoned. This is the idio precipitated by the practice of poly tonality and atonality, the idio whose source may be discovered i the music of Arnold Schoenberg Toch promulgates it with th strength of conviction—there i nothing about the Concerto tha suggests the reticence of the Vien nese group surrounding Schoenberg It employs a huge orchestra in th maintenance of continuous din; it assault is savage and relentless. Th rude strength of the opening allegro its sharp and angular profile, inter estingly demonstrate a talent intol erant of rule or rein, as do th subtler divigations of the Adagio. Harmonic lucidity is attained only in the Rondo finale, where familiar chord structures suddenly startle the listener. The design of the first movement is obscured by the elaborate instrumentation, whose multiplicity of effects dazzles and dazes the attention, but when the Adagio is reached, the listener begins faintly to apprehend the intentions of the composer. Portions of the slow movement have a sinuous sensuousness of mood, but these give way to a greater intensity of utterance, which reaches its climax in outbursts of clamant despair. To this sinister interlude the elephantine jococity of the finale poses a striking and effective contrast.

But the work as a whole seems arbitrary and affected, the product of intellectual rather than of emotional energy, and in the end the listener is obliged to fall back upon admiration of Mr. Toch's virtuosity in the manipulation of an orchestra, his skill in calling forth new sounds, new colors at a time when the number of possible combinations of timbres would seem to be exhausted. The applause of last evening's audience was provoked, it seems probably, more by the brilliant performance of the orchestra, the soloist (Jesus Maria Sanroma) and the conductor than by any real or imagined merit in the music.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky opened the concert with a Concerto Grosso in B minor by Handel, a reading stressed with dignity, ennobled by the eloquence of the string players of the Boston Orchestra. Following the intermission, Mr. Koussewitsky devoted himself to Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." The vocal soloists in the latter work were Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

The indisposition of Miss Rosa Ponselle compelled a change in opera offered to Thursday subscribers. "Norma" was withdrawn and "Aida" substituted, the cast including Clara Jacobo, Marion Telva and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Basiola and Pinza.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

JAN 4 - 1929

BOSTON'S Gershwin

SERGE KOUSSEVITCKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall last night with a Piano Concerto new to this city. It is the work of Ernst Toch, whom I shall immediately term the German Gershwin. The Concerto is actually a work for piano and orchestra, for all the instruments are employed in a more forward manner than is usually the case where a soloist is "accompanied" by the ensemble.

The appellation of "German Gershwin" ought to be explained. The only other piano solo of recent years which may be mentioned as resembling the present composition is that famous "Rhapsody in Blue." This, though not the slightest detail is reminiscent, nor the merest melodic or rhythmic line similar, one to the other.

▼

LET me put it this way: syncopation is remote to the Toch Concerto. But that nonchalant, care-free, bold and adventurous spirit of the Blue Rhapsodie is here gone one better. What a brave and dashing creation is this original and easily remembered oratorical outburst. It careens and madly charges the horizon. With a swashbuckling, frontiersman-like abandon, it speaks its message.

Frankly modernistic, clearly influenced by the present school of monotone shading, it succeeds by some paradox in discovering a myriad of tints, and, in uncovering a variety which gives it more interest, than any similar work which we have heard from Mr. Toch's colleagues.

▼

THUS, I am willing to wager, that hearing the Toch Piano Concerto three times, the average man will be tapping out the summoning call and whistling the strangely eccentric theme.

In the middle of the first movement, Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist, and the volatile Koussevitcky built up a climax which was the highspot of the evening's music. This Sanroma, whose name none of us knew, had played the work at its first performance in Paris.

Resembling in his figure, face, manner and modesty that phenomenal pianist, Horowitz, this Sanroma plays not unlike him. Such crisp, clean, bell-like tones, such fine feeling for the bravura spirit of the piece—Egad, one could not help but admire the soloist.

▼

SPACE tonight unfortunately prohibits a careful analysis of the Toch Concerto or of the rest of Mr. Koussevitcky's satisfying and richly executed program.

Opening with the Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, which was played with a delicacy suggesting an ancient harpsichord, the Bostonians included Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." This was sung with restraint and a sort of silent weeping.

The last number, which we did not hear—it had not started at 10.30—was J. C. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner, soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

JAN 4 - 1929

A MODERN CONCERTO

For a good half hour last night the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall sounded like high jinks at a Copland-Sessions soiree. The focal point of the evening was a concerto for piano and orchestra by Ernest Toch, of Vienna, and Mannheim, which, while already known to Chicago and Boston, was introduced only now to this citadel of culture. Toch, as all good little modernists are aware, is the fruit of the same stem that produced Hindemith and Krenek, though old enough—he was born in 1887—to be their big brother.

The present concerto, his op. 38, was written more than two years ago and was first done in Berlin and in Frankfurt-on-the-Main. Last spring Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it in Paris with the Boston pianist of Spanish origin, Jesus Maria Sanroma, at the keyboard. Mr. Sanroma discharged the same duties last night.

The concerto is in three movements. Its form, we are told, is "free." Also, "like much that is contemporaneous in this art, the music is written in the atonal and polytonal manner." The first movement is in sonata form, and, after an adagio, things develop into a "rondo disturbato." The composer expressly desires Their Worships, the conductors, to bear in mind that the orchestra here is more than a mere accompaniment. Yesterday evening Mr. Koussevitsky scrupulously observed this wish, and the Boston band bravely affirmed its independence. This did not prevent Mr. Sanroma from remembering to endow his share with a becoming prominence.

The concerto seemed to precipitate a sharp affray of sentiments last night, and during the intermission aisles and corridors seethed with acute antagonisms. To some the music of Toch proved rich in thrust and temperament, pulsed with elemental rhythms, flashed with fulgurant lights and gleaming hues and seemed of all recent "modernism" the most prizeably charged. To others it was a tiresome and meaningless racket, garnished with reminders of things that Igor Stravinsky, Richard Strauss and even Franz Liszt did, at one time or another, immeasurably better; and further desolated by a slow movement of sorry maunderings and aimless vaporings. It is with the latter faction, alas, that this listener feels driven to share his own humble opinion. No doubt the first movement is in sonata form, no doubt it is closely packed with fugal writing and contrapuntal workmanship, no doubt there is a deal of pother and turmoil and bustle. But unless music freighted with all these beguilements veritably says something, why then, in the right honorable phrase, What of it?

At all events the performance did indubitable justice to the piece and many had pleasure of the blare, the tinkle and the bluster of it all. Mr. Koussevitsky prepared his hearers for the high-stepping joys of Toch with a rather ponderous pronouncement of Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso (reversing for some unannounced reason the order of the first and the last allegros) that lost something of its flexibility and authentic character by sheer weight and volume of string tone.

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—which is certainly no Koussevitsky battle horse—and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with the vocal collaboration of Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner, completed the activities of the evening.

H. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

JAN 5 - 1929

Prize-Winning Jazz Pieces Prove Notable as Vital Contributions to American Music

By FELIX DEYO

Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts Beethoven's "Pastoral"

For last night's programme, the second of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra series in Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, urbane and elegant, and sometimes eloquent, conductor, led off with the "Pastoral" symphony. Again we pay compliment to the original force brought to bear by Mr. Koussevitzky on the music of Beethoven. Like his memorable reading of the C minor symphony, that of the "Pastoral" last night was a version cast in perfect art form, not attempting to uncover startling new effects, yet yielding to reversions of dynamics too mellow, perhaps, and foreign soil, it might seem to some supercritics, for the sturdy German Beethoven. But, in retrospect, Mr. Koussevitzky's readings are cyclonical when needs be revealing a massively unmatched Beethoven. Again, as conductor, this Russian is engrossing; physically the eye watches his every movement (his back is grace personified), none of which go to waste, each of which is persuasively indicative of intent, and illuminative to his co-operators as to the will of his aesthetic imagination. A study in conservation of outward gesture, contained as a pent-up volcano with its eruptive power at command, is Mr. Koussevitzky.

Another surprise pianist was sprung at last night's concert (last year it was Miss Eunice Norton)—a youthful player, unknown to New York prior to Thursday night, when he played with the Bostonians at Carnegie Hall — by name Jesus Maria Sanroma, young musician of Central American parentage. He played the solo part of Schumann's A minor concerto, and played it passing well; very much in the manner of beautiful miniature. The work itself is covered by grey mists, and these, in our experience, have seldom been dispelled by a juvenile pianist, however polished and keen the thrust of his, or her, keyboard technique. We confess Schumann to be our favorite composer (in the music of his first period), but have never been moved by the concerto except in instances of the past when it has reached our ears at the hands of the grizzled veterans of the so-called "old school"—master musicians we refer to, with seasoned intellects and richly poetical temperaments. Mr. Paderewski is one of the very few we have in mind.

Senor Sanroma played the concerto last night in a scale of line appropriate to chamber music exposition. It was a prettily adjusted conception, drawing pianistic sparklets rather than flame. Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was limned similarly. The total effect was drab—so often peculiarly the result with Schumann in this particular composition.

But the orchestra and conductor blazed gloriously in the concert arrangement of John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" ballet, which followed as a concluding number. Here is music much after our own heart—the quintessence of jazz. Mr. Toscanini, we understand, may include it on his Philharmonic programmes this season.

Willem Mengelberg

Conducts Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn tomorrow afternoon, at the Academy of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JAN 5 - 1929

Boston Symphony in 35th Concert

Koussevitzky Will Lead Music at Auditorium Tomorrow.

Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 35th concert in Springfield when it will appear in the Municipal Auditorium under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. tomorrow afternoon. The well known symphony concert aggregation will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The program will open at 3 o'clock. Admission is by ticket only, to be procured free of charge at the Y. M. C. A. or music stores.

The program follows:

PROGRAM.

Prokofieff, "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25
Allegro.
Larghetto.
Gavotte.
Finale.
Debussy, "Prelude a nl'Apres-Midi d'u Faune," Mallarme
Ravel, "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem.
Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
Allegro con spirito.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1929

Boston Symphony Concert

E. Fernandez Arbos, the famous Spanish conductor, will be guest conductor at the Boston Symphony concert at the Albee Theatre, Providence, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 15. The Spanish musician, on a visit to this country last season, conducted the New York Symphony Society in New York, and brought out some Spanish music with great success. Spanish scores, including his own fine transcription of Albenez's suite, "Iberia," will be a feature of his programme in Providence.

Arbos will be remembered by some as the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the single season of 1903-4, when he succeeded Franz Kneizel. Indeed, Arbos as a young man was a famous violin virtuoso.

Born in Madrid, he studied the violin there as a boy, and perfected his technique under Vieuxtemps of Brussels and Joachim of Berlin. Touring Europe in the nineties, he became a foremost virtuoso of that period. It was in 1904 that he devoted his career more particularly to conducting. He has long been at the head of the Symphony orchestra of Madrid, likewise conducting in London for many seasons, and conducting concerts more recently in Paris, Rome and Petrograd.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky's refined and imaginative [illegible] enhanced the pastoral atmosphere of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The orchestra also played Schumann's Concerto in A Minor, with ardor, assisted by Jesus Maria Sanmora, a young pianist endowed with charm and flaire.

The presentation of Carpenter's Skyscrapers was assisted by Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

C. E. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1929

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to a[illegible]n this city in February, is giving a concert in New York this afternoon, following another successful program on Thursday evening in Carnegie hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted, and the soloist was [illegible] Maria Sanroma, pianist, who is to appear in this city soon. This artist gave the first New York performance of Ernest Toch's "Piano Concerto" at this afternoon's concert. Mr. Koussevitzky also presented the famous "Unfinished Symphony, by Schubert, the "Concerto Crosso" written for strings, by Handel, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers".

72

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

JAN 4 - 1929

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

A Piano Concerto by Ernst Toch Is Given by the Boston Symphony—Mr. Mengelberg Conducts "Das Lied von der Erde."

ERNST TOCH, an insurgent Mannheimer from whom we have occasionally heard, contributed a Piano Concerto to the program of last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Born 42 years ago in Vienna and dedicated in his youth to the medical profession, his proficiency as a composer is the result of his own ambition and diligence. At 22 he won the Mozart Prize and a year later another Austrian jury, astonished by talents as obvious as they were unorthodox, awarded him the Mendelssohn Prize. Beyond these meagre details, information concerning Mr. Toch is difficult of discovery, and we must rely on his music for what we would know of the man.

The concerto last evening, performed for the first time in New York, was written in Mannheim early in 1926. It was played in Berlin a year later and in July of 1927 it was included on the programs of the Frankfort music festivals. Mr. Koussewitsky introduced it to Paris in the spring of 1928 and it received its first American hearing through the courtesy of Mr. Stock, who offered it to a Chicago audience little less than a year ago.

* * *

Knowing little of Mr. Toch's music, we have no way of telling whether or not this Concerto is characteristic of his style. It suggests a relationship to the Alban Berg who composed "Wozzek," but it may very well be written in an idiom which Toch no longer employs and which Berg, certainly has abandoned. This is the idiom precipitated by the practice of polytonality and atonality, the idiom whose source may be discovered in the music of Arnold Schoenberg. Toch promulgates it with the strength of conviction—there is nothing about the Concerto that suggests the reticence of the Viennese group surrounding Schoenberg. It employs a huge orchestra in the maintenance of continuous din; its assault is savage and relentless. The rude strength of the opening allegro, its sharp and angular profile, interestingly demonstrate a talent intolerant of rule or rein, as do the subtler divigations of the Adagio. Harmonic lucidity is attained only in the Rondo finale, where familiar chord structures suddenly startle the listener. The design of the first movement is obscured by the elaborate instrumentation, whose multiplicity of effects dazzles and dazes the attention, but when the Adagio is reached, the listener begins faintly to apprehend the intentions of the composer. Portions of the slow movement have a sinuous sensuousness of mood, but these give way to a greater intensity of utterance, which reaches its climax in outbursts of clamant despair. To this sinister interlude the elephantine jococity of the finale poses a striking and effective contrast.

But the work as a whole seems arbitrary and affected, the product of intellectual rather than of emotional energy, and in the end the listener is obliged to fall back upon admiration of Mr. Toch's virtuosity in the manipulation of an orchestra, his skill in calling forth new sounds, new colors at a time when the number of possible combinations of timbres would seem to be exhausted. The applause of last evening's audience was provoked, it seems probably, more by the brilliant performance of the orchestra, the soloist (Jesus Maria Sanroma) and the conductor than by any real or imagined merit in the music.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky opened the concert with a Concerto Grosso in B minor by Handel, a reading stressed with dignity, ennobled by the eloquence of the string players of the Boston Orchestra. Following the intermission, Mr. Koussewitsky devoted himself to Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." The vocal soloists in the latter work were Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

The indisposition of Miss Rosa Ponselle compelled a change in opera offered to Thursday subscribers. "Norma" was withdrawn and "Aida" substituted, the cast including Clara Jacobo, Marion Telva and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Basiola and Pinza.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

JAN 4 - 1929

BOSTO[illegible]

SERGE KOUSSEVITCKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall last night with a Piano Concerto new to this city. It is the work of Ernst Toch, whom I shall immediately term the German Gershwin. The Concerto is actually a work for piano and orchestra, for all the instruments are employed in a more forward manner than is usually the case where a soloist is "accompanied" by the ensemble.

The appellation of "German Gershwin" ought to be explained. The only other piano solo of recent years which may be mentioned as resembling the present composition is that famous "Rhapsody in Blue." This, though not the slightest detail is reminiscent, nor the merest melodic or rhythmic line similar, one to the other.

▼

LET me put it this way: syncopation is remote to the Toch Concerto. But that nonchalant, care-free, bold and adventurous spirit of the Blue Rhapsodie is here gone one better. What a brave and dashing creation is this original and easily remembered oratorical outburst. It careens and madly charges the horizon. With a swashbuckling, frontiersman-like abandon, it speaks its message.

Frankly modernistic, clearly influenced by the present school of monotone shading, it succeeds by some paradox in discovering a myriad of tints, and, in uncovering a variety which gives it more interest, than any similar work which we have heard from Mr. Toch's colleagues.

▼

THUS, I am willing to wager, that hearing the Toch Piano Concerto three times, the average man will be tapping out the summoning call and whistling the strangely eccentric theme.

In the middle of the first movement, Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist, and the volatile Koussevitcky built up a climax which was the highspot of the evening's music. This Sanroma, whose name none of us knew, had played the work at its first performance in Paris.

Resembling in his figure, face, manner and modesty that phenomenal pianist, Horowitz, this Sanroma plays not unlike him. Such crisp, clean, bell-like tones, such fine feeling for the bravura spirit of the piece—Egad, one could not help but admire the soloist.

▼

SPACE tonight unfortunately prohibits a careful analysis of the Toch Concerto or of the rest of Mr. Koussevitcky's satisfying and richly executed program.

Opening with the Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, which was played with a delicacy suggesting an ancient harpsichord, the Bostonians included Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." This was sung with restraint and a sort of silent weeping.

The last number, which we did not hear—it had not started at 10.30—was J. C. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner, soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

JAN 4 - 1929

A MODERN CONCERTO

For a good half hour last night the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie [illegible] sounded like high jinks at a Copland-Sessions soiree. The focal point of the evening was a concerto for piano and orchestra by Ernest Toch, of Vienna, and Mannheim, which, while already known to Chicago and Boston, was introduced only now to this citadel of culture. Toch, as all good little modernists are aware, is the fruit of the same stem that produced Hindemith and Krenek, though old enough—he was born in 1887—to be their big brother.

The present concerto, his op. 38, was written more than two years ago and was first done in Berlin and in Frankfurt-on-the-Main. Last spring Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it in Paris with the Boston pianist of Spanish origin, Jesus Maria Sanroma, at the keyboard. Mr. Sanroma discharged the same duties last night.

The concerto is in three movements. Its form, we are told, is "free." Also, "like much that is contemporaneous in this art, the music is written in the atonal and polytonal manner." The first movement is in sonata form, and, after an adagio, things develop into a "rondo disturbato." The composer expressly desires Their Worships, the conductors, to bear in mind that the orchestra here is more than a mere accompaniment. Yesterday evening Mr. Koussevitsky scrupulously observed this wish, and the Boston band bravely affirmed its independent existence. This did not prevent Mr. Sanroma from remembering to endow his share with a becoming prominence.

The concerto seemed to precipitate a sharp affray of sentiments last night, and during the intermission aisles and corridors seethed with acute antagonisms. To some the music of Toch proved rich in thrust and temperament, pulsed with elemental rhythms, flashed with fulgurant lights and gleaming hues and seemed of all recent "modernism" the most prizeably charged. To others it was a tiresome and meaningless racket, garnished with reminders of things that Igor Stravinsky, Richard Strauss and even Franz Liszt did, at one time or another, immeasurably better; and further desolated by a slow movement of sorry maunderings and aimless vaporings. It is with the latter faction, alas, that this listener feels driven to share his own humble opinion. No doubt the first movement is in sonata form, no doubt it is closely packed with fugal writing and contrapuntal workmanship, no doubt there is a deal of pother and turmoil and bustle. But unless music freighted with all these beguilements veritably says something, why then, in the right honorable phrase, What of it?

At all events the performance did indubitable justice to the piece and many had pleasure of the blare, the tinkle and the bluster of it all. Mr. Koussevitsky prepared his hearers for the high-stepping joys of Toch with a rather ponderous pronouncement of Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso (reversing for some unannounced reason the order of the first and the last allegros) that lost something of its flexibility and authentic character by sheer weight and volume of string tone.

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—which is certainly no Koussevitsky battle horse—and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with the vocal collaboration of Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner, completed the activities of the evening.

H. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

JAN 5 - 1929

Prize-Winning Jazz Pieces Prove Notable as Vital Contributions to American Music

By FELIX DEYO

Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts Beethoven's "Pastoral"

For last night's programme, the second of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra series in Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, urbane and elegant, and sometimes eloquent, conductor, led off with the "Pastoral" symphony. Again we pay compliment to the original force brought to bear by Mr. Koussevitzky on the music of Beethoven. Like his memorable reading of the C minor symphony, that of the "Pastoral" last night was a version cast in perfect art form, not attempting to uncover startling new effects, yet yielding to reversions of dynamics too mellow, perhaps, and foreign soil, it might seem to some supercritics, for the sturdy German Beethoven. But, in retrospect, Mr. Koussevitzky's readings are cyclonical when needs be revealing a massively unmatched Beethoven. Again, as conductor, this Russian is engrossing; physically the eye watches his every movement (his back is grace personified), none of which go to waste, each of which is persuasively indicative of intent, and illuminative to his co-operators as to the will of his aesthetic imagination. A study in conservation of outward gesture, contained as a pent-up volcano with its eruptive power at command, is Mr. Koussevitzky.

Another surprise pianist was sprung at last night's concert (last year it was Miss Eunice Norton)—a youthful player, unknown to New York prior to Thursday night, when he played with the Bostonians at Carnegie Hall — by name Jesus Maria Sanroma, young musician of Central American parentage. He played the solo part of Schumann's A minor concerto, and played it passing well; very much in the manner of beautiful miniature. The work itself is covered by grey mists, and these, in our experience, have seldom been dispelled by a juvenile pianist, however polished and keen the thrust of his, or her, keyboard technique. We confess Schumann to be our favorite composer (in the music of his first period), but have never been moved by the concerto except in instances of the past when it has reached our ears at the hands of the grizzled veterans of the so-called "old school"—master musicians we refer to, with seasoned intellects and richly poetical temperaments. Mr. Paderewski is one of the very few we have in mind.

Senor Sanroma played the concerto last night in a scale of line appropriate to chamber music exposition. It was a prettily adjusted conception, drawing pianistic sparklets rather than flame. Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was limned similarly. The total effect was drab—so often peculiarly the result with Schumann in this particular composition.

But the orchestra and conductor blazed gloriously in the concert arrangement of John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" ballet, which followed as a concluding number. Here is music much after our own heart—the quintessence of jazz. Mr. Toscanini, we understand, may include it on his Philharmonic programmes this season.

Willem Mengelberg

Conducts Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn tomorrow afternoon, at the Academy of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JAN 5 - 1929

Boston Symphony in 35th Concert

Koussevitzky Will Lead Music at Auditorium Tomorrow.

Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 35th concert in Springfield when it will appear in the Municipal Auditorium under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. tomorrow afternoon. The well known symphony concert aggregation will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The program will open at 3 o'clock. Admission is by ticket only, to be procured free of charge at the Y. M. C. A. or music stores.

The program follows:

PROGRAM.

Prokofieff, "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25
Allegro.
Larghetto.
Gavotte.
Finale.
Debussy, "Prelude a nl'Apres-Midi d'u Faune." Mallarme
Ravel, "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem.
Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
Allegro con spirito.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1929

Boston Symphony Concert

E. Fernandez Arbos, the famous Spanish conductor, will be guest conductor at the Boston Symphony concert at the Albee Theatre, Providence, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 15. The Spanish musician, on a visit to this country last season, conducted the New York Symphony Society in New York, and brought out some Spanish music with great success. Spanish scores, including his own fine transcription of Albeniz's suite, "Iberia," will be a feature of his programme in Providence.

Arbos will be remembered by some as the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the single season of 1903-4, when he succeeded Franz Kneizel. Indeed, Arbos as a young man was a famous violin virtuoso.

Born in Madrid, he studied the violin there as a boy, and perfected his technique under Vieuxtemps of Brussels and Joachim of Berlin. Touring Europe in the nineties, he became a foremost virtuoso of that period. It was in 1904 that he devoted his career more particularly to conducting. He has long been at the head of the Symphony orchestra of Madrid, likewise conducting in London for many seasons, and conducting concerts more recently in Paris, Rome and Petrograd.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky's refined and imag[illegible] enhanced the pastoral atmosphere of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The orchestra also played Schumman's Concerto in A Minor, with ardor, assisted by Jesus Maria Sanmora, a young pianist endowed with charm and flaire.

The presentation of Carpenter's Skyscrapers was assisted by Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

C. E. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1929

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to a[illegible]n this city in February, is giving a concert in New York this afternoon, following another successful program on Thursday evening in Carnegie hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted, and the soloist was [illegible] Maria Sanroma, pianist, who is to appear in this city soon. This artist gave the first New York performance of Ernest Toch's "Piano Concerto" at this afternoon's concert. Mr. Koussevitzky also presented the famous "Unfinished Symphony, by Schubert, the "Concerto Grosso" written for strings, by Handel, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers".

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JAN 6 - 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Koussevitzky at His Best.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is often adjudged a modernist and a virtuoso, rather than a classicist or conservative among conductors, chose to open the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. In some respects this is the most difficult of the Beethoven symphonies to interpret worthily and interestingly for a modern audience. For these are not pastoral days. The city dweller entering a concert hall from the glare and clamor of the White Way is prone to snort at the innocent antics of Beethoven's peasants and to fall asleep by Beethoven's brook. For this concertgoer are the instrumental clangors and harmonic planes of a Stravinsky or a Bloch, describing our era, and not the murmurs of wood and field, the simple songs, the naïve but very suggestive depiction of Beethoven's thunderstorm, and the orchestra which seems to emerge, like nature herself, radiant and singing, in the path of the tempest!

It befell, however, that Mr. Koussevitzky captured the secret and mood of this music with the rarest felicity. He did not attempt to read a kind of emotion or color into the score that was not there. He chose his tempi with the greatest good fortune. The "Brook" movement may completely miss its effect by being a fraction too fast or too slow. The opening movement can communicate and maintain the sensation of humming life and endless happy singsong of nature if the interpreter is capable of such simplicity and of maintaining the unobstructed lyrical flow of Beethoven's music. In it there is truly the respiration of nature, the pulse of the soil. Not many interpreters in this day and age can re-create such beauty and rhythm for the listener. It is also necessary to give this symphony the utmost clarity and beauty of sound. Such sound came yesterday from the instruments which gave the melodic phrases a swelling ardor and suavity of form that made the whole symphony lyrical and again bespoke the excellence of the orchestra.

The Toch piano concerto, introduced in New York last Thursday, night, was repeated with Jesus Sanroma as the soloist. The work fully justified the enthusiastic reception of thirty-six hours before and new discoveries were made by certain observers, as, for instance, the beauty of the second theme of the first movement, and the importance of this beautiful idea in the elaborate and electrifying developments. Again the performance was a triumph for composer, conductor and solosit. If anything, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanroma outshone their previous achievements with the same score. The end of this occasion was Ravel's " Le Valse," brilliant and sardonic as ever, an admirable vehicle for the virtuoso conducting of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Symphonic E[illegible]e Reappears.

The [illegible] the sections to other sections of the overture. The wind instruments, however, are improving. There is reasont oexpect more and better from them next season.

The performance which gave the strongest proof of the qualities and capacities of the new orchestra was the accompaniment of Prokofieff's difficult concerto. The piano part was played very effectively by Mr. Stassevitch, who unites with his knowledge of the violin a virtuoso's technique and fluency on the keyed instrument. But this would not have been enough to represent the difficult score, which has complicated rhythms for the ensemble, and other problems of technique and musicianship without the excellent performance of the orchestra. The accompaniment had hardly a flaw, a fact of which only a very efficient orchestra would be capable. This was an admirable representation of a concerto which is glib in the modern manner, brilliant, superficial and hollow.

Nevertheless, it is very doubtful whether symphonic ensembles will ever parallel orchestras conducted by musicians of mastery and imagination when it comes to spontaneous and creative performance. But it is evident that players who rehearse together on their own responsibilities, relying upon individual efforts and capacities for musical results, are capable of accomplishment which is interesting and impressive, valuable for the lessons it teaches and the standards of ensemble that it maintains. The audience last night was very enthusiastic. There was special approval of Mr. Stossevitch and the players after the Prokofieff concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM New York American
JAN 6 - 1929

3 ORCHESTRAS GIVE CONCERTS

By GRENA BENNETT.

Carnegie Hall housed three different orchestral organizations yesterday. The Philharmonic, conducted by Walter Damrosch, gave a concert for children in the morning; the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, performed to a capacity audience in the afternoon; the American Symphonic Ensemble, without a conductor, was heard in the evening.

SPECIALITY PROGRAMME.

Mr. Damrosch prepared a programme that glorified members of the bird, fish, insect and animal kingdoms. His list consisted of the Donkey music in Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," the Elephant and the Aquarium in Saint-Saens' "Carnival of Animals," the Nightingale and Cuckoo themes from Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Bumble Bee," Liadov's "Dance of the Mosquito," and Strauss' "Dragon Fly."

Mr. Damrosch beamed on his young subscribers and his remarks and analyses were received with evident delight.

FAULTLESS RENDITION.

The Bostonian's matinee programme began with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, presented with superb musicianship and a full realization of its many and varied melodious moods. These glorious musical figures stood out crystal clear, yet ever maintained the proportion of beautiful gems faultlessly set. The performance was deservedly applauded.

Toch's Concerto, held over from Thursday evening's concert in the same hall, was the second number, with Jesus Maria Sanroma again officiating as piano soloist. The programme ended with Ravel's orchestral poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 6 - 1929

The Boston Orchestra Again

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. Carnegie Hall, 2.30 P. M. Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

Symphony No. 6, in F Major (Pastoral) ..... Beethoven
Concerto for piano and orchestra, Op. 38 ..... Toch
Mr. Sanroma
La Valse ..... Ravel

Mr. Koussevitzky repeated Ernest Toch's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra at the Boston Orchestra's matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony preceded the concerto and Ravel's "La Valse" closed the program.

A second hearing of Mr. Toch's modernist composition only served to affirm the impression the work made on this reviewer at the Boston Symphony's Thursday evening's concert. The concerto's significance—it is significant because it manages to hold the attention of the listener, something which cannot be said of many modernist compositions—seems to be due to its unrelenting speed and its bizarre orchestration. Cantalina is not a strong point with the composers of the moment, not because, as they would have us think, they shun melody on principle but because they are unable to write good tunes. When they do go in for broad slow stretches of music they usually achieve that much boredom, as witness Mr. Tanzman's Oriental opera, excerpts from which recently enabled Mr. Mengelberg to provoke a demonstration of disapproval from the usual polite Philharmonic-Symphony audience.

By some happy instinct Mr. Toch in his concerto refrains from laying too much stress on cantalina. One does not mind what there is of it because one's mind, even in the adagio, is still under the influence of the rush and roar of the first and third movements. So too the slow theme of the first movement is in itself pretty uninteresting stuff, but the composer gives you no chance to become aware of the fact. Before you are able to exercise your judgment Mr. Toch turns on his accelerator and you are once more in the maelstrom of a headlong succession of notes.

For the "Pastoral" Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky contrived a well-balanced and colorful performance and for the Ravel piece one that throbbed with rhythmical passion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 6 - 1929

3 Orchestras Share Day in Carnegie Hall

Walter Damrosch Makes His Season's Last Appearance in Concert for Children

Three orchestras occupied Carnegie Hall yesterday. In the morning session Walter Damrosch conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in his last children's concert of the season, directing and discoursing on a program illustrating "Animals in Music." Several of the animals represented were members of the engaging Saint-Saens menagerie titled "Le Carneval des Animaux." This was Mr. Damrosch's last scheduled appearance with the Philharmonic-Symphony this season.

In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second New York Saturday concert of the season. Serge Koussevitzky repeated his novelty of Thursday night, Ernest Toch's concerto for piano and orchestra, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Porto Rican musician, again played the piano part in this up-to-date work, which was received with somewhat reserved applause.

"Pastoral" Played Admirably

Mr. Koussevitzky opened his program with Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, played with the admirable balance and clarity of tone which characterizes the work of this orchestra. The third and last number was Ravel's "La Valse," which received a spirited interpretation with a rhythmic nuance contributing effectively to the presumably-intended Viennese atmosphere of the work.

But this latest hearing led us to wonder whether "La Valse" is destined for a permanent or long-held position in the orchestral active lists, as it appeared to be soon after its first production.

The conductorless American Symphonic Ensemble, which had made a successful debut last November, completed Carnegie Hall's musical day in the evening with the first concert of a subscription series of three. The program consisted of the Mozart symphony in C. major, known as the "Jupiter," Prokofieff's third piano concerto and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." For the concerto, which has been played here by the composer himself, Paul Stassevitch, the concertmaster, took temporary leave of his violin to take part as the solo pianist in a smooth, well balanced performance of the work.

Orchestra Plays Commendably

The orchestra gave a very commendable performance of the Mozart symphony. Touches of weightiness and coloring not including the more subtle gradations could be noticed, but the general unity and finish of the performance deserved praise. An audience of fair size proved distinctly enthusiastic.

Another orchestral concert of the evening was the opening of the free Saturday night series at the Metropolitan Art Museum, where David Mannes conducted a program with Tchaikovsky's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
JAN 6 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Arbos, Noted Spanish Guest Conductor, Here on Jan. 15

E. Fernandez Arbos, the famous Spanish conductor, is coming to America to appear as guest over the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the week of Jan. 13, and will therefore lead the Providence Symphony Concert at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 15, as well as the regular Boston concerts of Jan. 18 and 19. The Spanish musician visited this country last season to conduct the New York Symphony Society in New York, when he brought out some Spanish music with great success. Spanish scores, including his own fine transcription of Albeniz Suite, "Iberia," will be a feature of his program here.

Arbos will be remembered by some as the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the single season of 1903-4, when he succeeded Franz Kneizel. Indeed, Arbos as a young man was a famous violin virtuoso.

Born in Madrid, he studied the violin there as a boy, and perfected his technique under Vieuxtemps of Brussels and Joachim of Berlin. Touring Europe in the 90s he became a foremost virtuoso of that period. It was in 1904 that he devoted his career more particularly to conducting. He has long been at the head of the Symphony Orchestra of Madrid, likewise conducting in London for many seasons, and conducting concerts more recently in Paris, Rome and Petrograd.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 6 - 1929

Koussevitsky Is Re-engaged.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in concert at Poli's Theater January 30 and March 5, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, has been re-engaged as conductor of that famous orchestra for an indefinite period at a salary that is said to "exceed all expectations."

Koussevitsky will conduct both Washington performances of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 6 - 1929

Music Students Will Enjoy Boston Symphony

A remarkable opportunity is afforded the music student, of great educational value in attending the Boston Symphony concert, Feb. 3, at the Capitol Theater. To hear the effects of the string choirs, wood winds, brasses, percussian instruments and harps, directed by Koussevitzky. Gives the student a chance to study the effects and hear the different tone colorings of the great orchestra consisting of 112 musicians.

The Boston Symphony orchestra met with great success on its recent trip. The public and the press of Chicago—and Chicago has had for many years an orchestra of the first rank—were enthusiastic in praise of Mr. Koussevitzky and the players.

Mr. Stinson, in the Chicago Journal, said that Mr. Koussevitzky on occasion is "on easy terms with greatness."

Mr. Goldberg of the Herald Examiner referring to Ravel's "Daphne and Chloe" as the "high light" of the evening: "In its shifting colors and extraordinary blending of timbers it came near to being a miracle of orchestral playing."

Mr. Moore of the Tribune about Mr. Koussevitzky: "A disciplinarian and a driver at the same time. No traditionalist he, but a dynamic leader who believes that the way to present music is to play it up for all it is worth, and if he gives a tweek to your nerves in the operation, so much the better. You at least know he is there. At the same time, he is perfectly balanced and sane. In at least as much of his program as I was able to hear, distortion had no place in his scheme, though emphasis, and sometimes unexpected emphasis, did most decidedly. He is a musical exhilarator."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 6 - 1929

Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in concert at Poli's Theater on January 30, and again on March 5, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, has been re-engaged as conductor of that famous orchestra for an indefinite period at a salary that is said to "exceed all expectations." Koussevitzky will conduct both Washington performances of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
JAN 6 - 1929

Boston Symphony

YESTERDAY afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky repeated the Toch "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra" with Jesus Maria Sanroma. Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony and Ravel's "Choreographic poem, "La Valse," were added.

Not in many a symphony concert have we heard Beethoven as it was presented under the guidance of the intense and masteriy Koussevitzky. The "impressions on arriving in the country" contained the tableaux in its clearest form possible; the large stretch of land, dotted with clumps of the greenest trees imaginable, the bluest of skies with pleasant tufts of white billowy clouds, and the slightest and most delicate of breezes; upon this carpet of green "the jolly country folk gathered," and they were as jolly as happy people could be, as they danced by ones, twos and threes and sometimes in larger numbers; they were light and not ungraceful, and the rustic air clung about them. How they scampered for protection when the storm started.

We're sure from the way Mr. Koussevitzky handled them that he knows each one of his little country people personally. He was given enthusiastic applause.

The Ravel "Waltz" was not as light and fantastic as we had anticipated, but coming directly after the Toch Concerto, we could hardly expect the orchestra to have regained its poise so quickly. Some of the harshness and blatancy still lingered around the edges of the Waltz, but considering all, it quite capped an afternoon of genuine pleasure. B. L. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
JAN 7 - 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Probably no dictum of Beethoven in reference to the interpretation of his works is so widely known as the constantly quoted phrase regarding the "Pastoral" Symphony, which tersely states that he intended its imagery to be understood as "more the expression of feeling than painting." At the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky reversed this admonition, putting full emphasis on the programmatic aspects of the masterpiece in a reading primarily external and objective. Furthermore, his revolutionary scheme of approach relegated the first three movements to the background, in favor of the "Storm," and reserved the richest hues of the palette for the final Rondo. To carry out this arbitrary and startling conception, the first movement was metronomically four-square, with no give in rhythm anywhere, except two ritards, introduced to mark off the three sections of the development. The "Brook" was taken at a pace that stressed the "Molto moto" of the time indication until the Andante became virtually an Allegretto. Sunlight sparkled on the waters as they tripped past, but surely no human onlooker was hinted at in this scene as the conductor unfolded it. The "jolly" gathering of country folk turned out to be a sober affair such as the Pilgrim Fathers might easily have countenanced, and went at a shame-faced halting gait.

And then followed a "Storm" in which Mr. Koussevitzky set to work with all the effectiveness of Jupiter Pluvius in his prime. Here he came into his stride, with a realism and virtuosity that were fairly breathtaking. Surely no other conductor within memory has quite equaled the Boston leader in evoking those uncanny roaring blasts that swept in undulating chromatics down and up the strings, just before the climactic outbreak of the Coda.

In the Finale the marvelous clarity of all that preceded was maintained, despite the unexampled wealth of tone employed throughout these concluding pages. If the first three movements were highly questionable, the rest was little short of phenomenal. A repetition of Toch's piano concerto, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the Bostonians' well-known rendition of Ravel's "La Valse" completed the program. N. S.

74

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 7 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY AGAIN SHOWS HIS GREAT ABILITY

Brilliantly Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in Widely-Varied Program at Auditorium Here

By FRANCIS REGAL

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday in its concert at the Auditorium, which for a good many years has been the great feature of the Young Men's Christian association Sunday afternoon entertainments. It assured the public a chance to hear at least one fine concert in lean years, and interest in it is all the greater now that Springfield has a symphony orchestra of its own which is steadily building up interest in symphonic music—its members hurried through their own rehearsal in order to hear the concert and could be picked out here and there in the audience by their instruments, which they had to bring with them. It was a large audience, quite filling the hall, and an exceptionally attentive audience; possibly the keenness of its interest, on which many people commented, is partly a result of the growing habit of listening to radio programs—Springfield's music lovers were much disappointed when the broadcasting of the Boston concerts was discontinued.

The program was by no means an exacting one, so far as the listener was concerned, and opened ingratiatingly with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, a clever essay in the style of Mozart, written in 1917 by this ultra-modern Russian. It is pure pastiche, of course, but if the composer writes with his tongue in his cheek it is in no spirit of burlesque, but apparently to see what he could do with the old-fashioned material. His idea, according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." But he has caught the form rather than the spirit, for it is easier to fill in the do-mi-sol-mi of the Alberti bass than to fill even a single bar with the pure sunshine of Mozartian melody. It is skilful work, and pleasant, even interesting to hear, yet even more interesting would have been the "Jupiter" symphony, or the G minor, by Mozart, which seldom figure on our programs.

The charm of the Prokofieff symphony depended in great part on its exquisite interpretation by Mr Koussevitzky, whose consummate skill as a conductor has seldom been so strikingly shown as in yesterday's concert, which called notably for delicacy, precision and grace. It is hard to conceive of a more perfect performance of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and even a deaf person might have grasped something of its beauty by watching the subtle and flowing motions of the conductor. It was as remarkable in its way as the intricate glitter of the Ravel choreographic poem, "The Valse," which was played with great brilliance and esprit. In theme and treatment this work bears an obvious resemblance to Schelling's "Victory Ball," but in orchestration and in its rhythmical complexities it is even more interesting; it is worth giving if only as a tour de force, and Mr Koussevitzky made it that.

The only really serious work of the afternoon was the Brahms symphony in D major, No 2, and it was interesting to see how conductor and orchestra adjusted themselves to its weightier burden when they reassembled after the intermission. Here was something very different from Prokofieff's clever sham antique or Debussy's charming impressionism, or Ravel's sardonic fantasy. Of the four Brahms symphonies this is the one which the public best knows and takes to most kindly; it has found a place in popular esteem not very far below that of any of the Beethoven symphonies except the Fifth, and it gains surely if slowly in public favor. Mr Koussevitzky gave it an admirable interpretation, putting aside all the airy lightness of style which marked his leading of the lighter works and bringing out the full depth of the composer. It was not a sensational program, yet such perfection in the treatment of widely different styles was sufficient to show him as one of the greatest of living orchestral conductors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
JAN 7 - 1929

Fine Concert by Boston Symphony

Large, Attentive Audience Enjoys Program in Auditorium.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, gave its annual concert under the direction of the Y. M. C. A. yesterday afternoon in the Auditorium. A large and attentive audience listened to a superb interpretation of one of the finest programs the orchestra has presented here in years.

Each year finds the orchestra in finer form and yesterday it seemed on a par with either the Philharmonic or Philadelphia Symphony orchestras. What orchestra can rival its brasses and wood winds or achieve the delicate pianissimi heard yesterday? Once again the audience was fascinated by the grace and authority of Conductor Koussevitsky, beau brummel of conductors.

The program had been chosen most with an eye to variety and also to show Mr. Kussevitsky at his best. Few there are who equal him in the interpretation of the moderns. Equally at home he seemed in his reading of the lovely "D major symphony" of Brahms. We believe that this is the first time the work has been played in the city. There has always been discussion about the greatness of this symphony. Be it great or not it affords many moments of extreme pleasure. Its melodies are interesting and its reflective serenity grips one as the passages unfold. It was played with sensitive conception of its calm beauty.

Quite different was the opening number, the "Classical" symphony by Prokofieff. According to program notes the work was written as Mozart might have written it had he been writing for the present day orchestra. It is a pleasant work gay and humorous in style and not lacking in melodic interest. The symphony was completed in 1917 and the first performance in this country was given by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in New York. The work has a Mozartian atmosphere but the composer lacks the melodic facility of Mozart.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" has been played here before and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The performance yesterday seemed entirely new. It was performed as exquisitely as one could imagine. From the first lovely notes from the flute of Georges Laurent, superb player that he is, one reveled in tonal beauty. Seldom is one privileged to hear such wealth of tonal color, such rounding of phrase as was revealed in this performance. It may well take its place as one of the great moments.

In striking contrast was the Ravel Choregraphic Poem "La Valse." This barbaric work loses some of its effectiveness when played as a program number. It is interesting as an orchestral study and more than reminiscent of portions of Schelling's "Victory Ball."

It may be another year before Springfield has the opportunity of hearing a major orchestra again but it is safe to predict that those present today will long remember this fine program so magnificently played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
JAN 7 - 1929

Boston Symphony Gives Second Matinee Concert

The second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on Saturday in Carnegie Hall. The opening number, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, received a smooth, well-balanced reading from Mr. Koussewitzky, though his tempis provided some moments of prolonged dullness in the final parts. The gentle and reassuring call of the cuckoo and other nonexaggerated effects employed by the composer in depicting a thunderstorm and other scenes of country life, formed sharp contrast, but with a characterizing eloquence quite complete to the up-to-date clarion toned, sharply colored Toch concerto for piano and orchestra, which followed in the list, as a novelty repetition from Thursday's concert.

The performance of the symphony brought prolonged plaudits for conductor and orchestra, and the enthusiasm of the large audience found vent again for Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano soloist, and the orchestral players, due to their presentation, wholly remarkable for virtuosic brilliance of Toch's composition. The concert came to a close with a superbly colored performance of "La Valse," by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JAN 7 - 1929

NO SHARPER musical contrast could have been placed before the audience which heard the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon than that which placed Ernest Toch's piano concerto and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony in juxtaposition. The modern work, again very brilliantly played by Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist, did not improve with a second hearing. How would it have sounded if it had been listened to twenty, thirty, forty times like the Beethoven Sixth Symphony? Doubtless only a fanatical admirer could expect it ever to be played so many times. There are engaging pages in this concerto, particularly in the first and second movements — though the latter seemed interminable to the reviewer at the rehearing Saturday—but there is also much that is formula and bravado. Little or none of it can be regarded as transcending its flash (and din) of style. If it is very showily alive now, longevity is scarcely to be predicted for any work so patently a product of mechanistic, rather than emotional or spiritual concepts.

The symphony was superbly played in all that pertained to quality of the ensemble. Mr. Koussevitzky has given few finer examples of his ability to build an edifice of glorious tone. The Brook sang divinely, the Storm was a masterfully wrought climax rather than the sometimes insipid example of limited descriptive resources. The tendency was toward a fast tempo, particularly in the slow movement, but all was justified in the interrelation of the parts, leading into a tonally resplendent finale. The other work of the afternoon was Ravel's "La Valse," a familiar and successful repetition from past Koussevitzky programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 7 - 1929

MUSIC STUDENTS WILL ENJOY BOSTON SYMPHONY

A remarkable opportunity is afforded the music student, of great educational value in attending the Boston Symphony concert, February 3, at the Capitol theater. To hear the effects of the string choirs, woodwinds, brasses, percussion instruments and harps, directed by Koussevitsky. Gives the student a chance to study the effects and hear the different tone colorings of the great orchestra consisting of 112 musicians.

The Boston Symphony orchestra met with great success on its recent trip. The public and the press of Chicago—and Chicago has had for many years an orchestra of the first rank—were enthusiastic in praise of Mr. Koussevitzky and the players.

Mr. Stinson, in the Chicago Journal, said that Mr. Kousevitzky on occasion is "on easy terms with greatness."

Mr. Goldberg of the Herald Examin- referring to Ravel's "Daphne and Chloe" as the "high light" of the evening: "In its shifting colors and extraordinary blending of timbers it came near to being a miracle of orchestral playing."

Mr. Moore of the Tribune about Mr. Koussevitzky: "A disciplinarian and a driver at the same time. No traditionalist he, but a dynamic leader who believes that the way to present music is to play it up for all it is worth, and if he gives a tweek to your nerves in the operation, so much the better. You at least know he is there. At the same time, he is perfectly balanced and sane. In at least as much of his program as I was able to hear, distortion had no place in his scheme, though emphasis, and sometimes unexpected emphasis, did most decidedly. He is a musical exhilarator."

Pinal:

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JAN 7 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS SPRINGFIELD PEOPLE

A large and appreciative audience gathered at the Springfield Young Men's Christian association concert in the Auditorium yesterday to enjoy a concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest living orchestral leaders.

Brahms symphony in D major, No 2, which was the most serious work on the program and was admirably interpreted by the orchestra under the direction of Mt Koussevitzky, the full depth and meaning of the composer being sounded by the aggregation of musicians.

The program opened with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, a skillfull work written by the composer in 1917 after the style of Mozart, very much in the manner one writes modern English in the style of Samuel Pepys, the composer writing in a very light and delightful manner in old-time style.

Dubussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," was given a most perfect rendition and Ravel's "The Valse," also delighted the audience with its beautiful rhythm, which the orchestra emphasized not too obviously while playing with brilliance and esprit.

The afternoon program which was not too exacting, nevertheless was one carried through with much charm of execution, with Mr Koussevitzky displaying consummate skill as a conductor.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
JAN 8 - 1929

At a recent dinner tendered to Serge Koussevitzky by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the city of Lowells and Cabots, the musical entertainment of the evening consisted of innumerable xylophone solos by one L. White.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 9 - 1929

biggest successes.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

To say that genius is born and not made savors of banality. What indeed can define genius, or place its limits, or trace its origins? To attempt to do so almost invariably leads to confusion. But in its presence even the slow-witted recognize something that is so difficult to define. To see genius work one need only to go to Boston's Symphony hall on a Friday afternoon or Saturday evening. For at those times the Boston Symphony orchestra is giving its concerts, and its leadership is in the hands of a true genius of the art of conducting—Serge Koussevitzky.

In Boston Mr. Koussevitzky's work has been chiefly one of refinement of standards. The Boston Symphony orchestra has acquired world fame under Dr. Karl Muck. The amiable and correct Henry Rabaud did not go far on the road to progress with the reorganized orchestra after the war. To his successor, Pierre Monteaux is due much of the credit for the recapturing of standards that had been temporarily lost. During his regime the Boston Symphony orchestra again became quickly an orchestra of the first rank. In this condition Mr. Koussevitzky found it,—a group of excellent players, excellently routined, having large accomplishments to their credit (such as the production of Stravinsky's "Le Source du Printemps" at the time accounted an undertaking of the first magnitude) awaiting only the touch of the impelling force of genius to take it out of the rank and file of "first rank orchestras" and to place it in a position of leadership among them. This force Serge Koussevitzky has been able abundantly to supply. Music students are taking advantage of the opportunity of hearing the Hartford concert at the Capitol theater February 3, by securing tickets moderately priced in the balconies and lower floors. The ticket sale is at McCoy's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 9 - 1929

A Spanish Invasion by the Symphony

Arbos Comes from Madrid to Borrow Koussevitzky's Baton and Conduct the New Music of the Peninsula.—An Unusual Interlude

A Spanish interlude in the season's music will bring E. Fernandez Arbos to this city next Tuesday night as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a visit which promises great things. Mr. Arbos comes not only as a gifted interpreter of the remarkable modern school of Spanish composers but as the man who is in no small measure distinctly responsible for the amazing Iberian renaissance.

It would be permissible to become excited over such a guest even if the cue were not given by the procession of superlatives that marked his brief appearance with the New York Symphony last winter. He was to land yesterday for a week with the Boston organization, which will play programs predominantly Spanish under his inspired baton.

Mr. Arbos is no stranger to Boston. Just 25 years ago he made his first visit to America as concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He stayed only one season, 1903-1904, returning to Spain when called to become conductor of the Madrid Symphony Orchestra, whose conductor he remains today.

A whole school of Spanish composers has grown up during that time, and it is difficult to conceive of the development without Mr. Arbos as their champion in place of proverbial neglect, their own country.

A Changed Situation.

There had been no orchestras to play their music if natives had wished to undertake serious instrumental composition. Now the Madrid Orchestra, which had given only eight concerts a year, gives 200, and encourages native composers. Four other orchestras, including that in Barcelona conducted by Pablo Casals, function in the country. Spain is now enjoying the greatest period of musical prosperity she has ever known.

Little of the Spanish music Mr. Arbos will play here had come into existence when he accepted the conductorship of the Madrid Orchestra. As Olin Downes pointed out in the New York Times a year ago in an excellent article from which this borrows liberally, it was several years after that when musicians in America began to fumble over certain piano pieces of Albeniz's belonging to the set called "Iberia," cautiously displayed on the counters of music stores.

The works of Granados were unknown and the opera "Goyescas," product of a later year when Granados met his death by submarine, was unsuspected. Turina, so far as the American public was concerned, was non-existent—in fact, was only then beginning to find himself in Paris. De Falla, the present leader of the Spanish School, had yet to pursue his decisive studies in that capital. The name of old Pedrell—he died as recently as 1922—was known principally, outside of his own country, to lexicons and musicologists.

Making a Good Guess

The program which the guest conductor will elect to play here cannot be announced with surety until he is established in Boston today, but it is probable that it will be a very near-twin to that of the first Boston concert next week. The numbers to be heard in Symphony Hall are:

Wagner.....Prelude to "Meistersingers"
Halfter-Escriche ..... Sinfonietta
Ravel......"Alborada del Graciosa"
Albeniz....."Iberia," transcribed by Arbos
Turina....."Procesion de Rocio"
De Falla....."Three-Cornered Hat"

Whether such is the intention or not, that program serves well to indicate Spanish musical history in the quarter-century. Spain was for long under the domination of Germany in matter musical, but the French came to be the counsellors and kinsmen.

"German profundities and psychological delvings are not for the Spaniards," Mr. Arbos said last year. "We are of the same racial origins as the French. We are near neighbors and have been close friends or bitter foes for centuries. The clarity, the logic and warmth of coloring, the sensitiveness to rhythm, the instinct for fine instrumental values—these tendencies are extremely sympathetic to artists of Spain. France gave us our technic, cultivated our taste, and made us aware of our own musical richness."

He opens his program with the "Meistersingers" overture which, curiously enough, Sir Thomas Beecham conducted last year as guest conductor here with the same orchestra.

German and French

The sinfonietta by Halfter-Escriche in three parts is said to be German-influenced, modern in harmony but in style conforming more to the old "concerto grosso," with important solo parts for 11 different instruments. The composer, only 24 years old now and younger of course when he wrote the piece, uses polytanality extensively, but there is clarity to be found in its form and its gaiety.

Mr. Arbos likes not only to put on his programs Spanish music developed under French influence but in juxtaposition French music inspired by Spain. He is fond of Debussy's "Iberia" and the prospective program includes the satirical Ravel piece listed above. This composition, originally a piano piece, has been played under Koussevitzky, who gave it finish and color and Gallic wit. Arbos's interpretation was called electric and extravagant and Spanish by the critics last March.

Mr. Arbos remembers Albeniz when both were at the Brussels Conservatiore, the former studying the violin under Vieuxtemps and the latter the piano under Brassin. Their friendship continued firm until Albeniz's death.

The Spanish Liszt

Like Liszt, to whom he has been compared, Albeniz had an amazing picturesque career. At the age of six he ran away from home—to play the piano. He astounded judges at the Paris Conservatiore by his playing, then took a ball from his pocket and smashed a looking glass with it.

Put back to school, he fled again, and this time was not so easily traced. He travelled everywhere in poverty. He secured a contract from a publisher whereby he would be paid four pesetas for every page of music he composed. He produced 50 pages a night until the publisher knelt to beg freedom from such a ruinous contract. His production as a composer would have been better had he been less popular as a virtuoso, for he had extraordinary inventive powers.

Although he composed in the popular vein, he never used popular melodies. He was at home only with the piano, but Arbos has lovingly transcribed several works for the orchestra, retaining the character of the original but adding greatly by the brilliant orchestrations. The "Iberia" suite will be represented by three parts.

From the Nation's Store

While Albeniz had his own melodies, surcharged with the popular spirit, de Falla constantly utilized Andalusian folk-melodies in his work. They are to be found insinuated in his music for the "Three-Cornered Hat," the ballet popularized by the notable performance by the Russian Ballet.

The outbreak of the World War drove home many Spanish composers at work elsewhere. Among them were de Falla and Turina. The latter, who may also be represented on the Providence program, is also under the French influence, having studied with Paul Dukas and with Vincent d'Indy at the Paris Schola Cantorum.

One of Olin Downes's tributes to Mr. Arbos is worth quoting since it bears on the visitor's capabilities as a guest conductor:

"No other conductor who has come to this country interprets Spanish music with so much sensuousness, temperament and orchestral command; nor has another conductor united in one and the same personality the rhythmical impulse and accent that come from his soil, which can neither be counterfeited nor imitated, with the musical knowledge that Mr. Arbos possesses.

"He has a remarkable way with the orchestra. He put the devil in the reverend signors of the New York Symphony Orchestra. They whipped off their chords, their cross-accents as if they had been stung; they mooned over long and sensuous phrases as if they were sitting in a Spanish landscape. The orchestra did not merely glow; it blazed in Mr. Arbos's sonorities."

Certainly that is enough to make one look ahead toward Tuesday with excitement.

W. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BILLBOARD
JAN 1 2 1929

Boston Symphony at Richmond

Keen interest is being shown by music lovers of Richmond, Va., in the coming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky, at the City Auditorium on January 29. The orchestra, whose appearance is the third attraction in the Artists' Series, is being presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, and other artists announced for the balance of the season are Rosa Ponselle, February 21, and Tito Schipa on April 12.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 9 - 1929

Serge Koussevitzky

To say that [illegible] born and not made savors of banality. What indeed can define genius, or place its limits, or trace its origins? To see genius work one need only go to Boston's Symphony Hall on a Friday afternoon or Saturday evening. For at those times the Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving its concerts, and its leadership is in the hands of a true genius of the art of conducting —Serge Koussevitzky.

In Boston Mr. Koussevitzky's work has been chiefly one of refinement of standards. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had acquired world fame under Dr. Karl Muck. The amiable and correct Henry Rabaud did not go far on the road to progress with the reorganized orchestra after the war. To his successor, Pierre Monteaux, is due much of the credit for the recapturing of standards that had been temporarily lost. During his regime the Boston Symphony again became quickly an orchestra, an orchestra unquestionably of the first rank. In this condition Mr. Koussevitzky found it—a group of excellent players, excellently routined, having large accomplishment

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
JAN 1 2 1929

Music in Springfield

The annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra sponsored by the Y. M. C. A. has been for many years the outstanding musical event of the winter season in Springfield. In recent years it has been an even more important event than before because of the almost complete lack of other concerts of comparable quality. The Y. M. C. A. deserves the fullest commendation for continuing to bring the orchestra to Springfield in the face of great difficulties. In a sense, it has been performing a civic service. Whether or not it can continue longer to do so now seems to depend entirely upon the attitude of the public that it has so generously endeavored to serve.

The statistics of the last concert indicates plainly that a crisis has been reached. For the first time in the history of the concerts, the orchestra last Sunday played to empty seats in the Auditorium. It has been assumed that the inclement weather may have kept many away, although it would seem that in view of the paucity of concerts in Springfield this winter, in view of the recognized fame of the orchestra and its conductor, and finally, in view of the fact that no admission was charged, the Auditorium should have been filled notwithstanding the shower of rain that fell an hour before concert time.

The collection taken is an even more depressing index of the lack of interest manifested in this concert by the public of Springfield. It was the smallest ever taken at these concerts. The audience of approximately three thousand contributed the miserly total of $737.38 to defraying the expenses. Although this was increased to $978.38 through the sale of a few reserved seats, the Y. M. C. A. must meet a deficit of approximately $1700 on this concert, the payment of which wipes out the funds realized from the sale of season tickets to the Sunday meetings. In order to provide the public of Springfield with the symphony concert, the Y. M. C. A. is obliged to conduct the remainder of its Sunday meetings this year on the collections taken at each meeting, which it can do only with the greatest difficulty, if at all.

The Y. M. C. A. can scarcely be blamed if it decides that it can no longer afford to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield at its own expense. The future of more than this single concert would seem to be involved. Within the last five years for lack of popular support the number of public concerts in Springfield has been reduced to a bare two or three. The Steinert series of concerts is no longer given, except for an occasional recital. The other concerts in the Y. M. C. A. course have necessarily been abandoned. The Music Festival is continued only with difficulty and on a much reduced scale, both in quantity and quality The Springfield Symphony Orchestra continues to give generally adequate concerts, but it can receive little encouragement for improving its standards in a community that seems manifestly disinterested in the best orchestral music.

The facts are unpalatable, but equally unavoidable. The time seems plainly to have come for a showdown. If Springfield desires to continue in the future as in the past to be known as a musical community, it can do so by giving concrete manifestation of its willingness to cooperate with the Y. M. C. A. in supporting the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This may as well be the test case. If hearty popular support can be given to these concerts, other musical agencies may be justifiably encouraged to continue their efforts to supply Springfield with good music. If such support cannot be won for an enterprise of such proved merit, other musical groups in planning their activities may by that sign know how little to expect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOWN TOPICS
JAN 1 0 1929

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Carnegie Hall for concerts on Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon. A modernistic piano concerto by Ernest Toch of Vienna and Mannheim was the feature of both programmes. To some this opus in three movements seemed to bear particularly dazzling testimony to the tonal genius of our own day. To others it was an annoying and gratuitous racket, decked out with stuff that Stravinsky, Strauss, and even Liszt had done better. The performance by Mr. Koussevitzky and the men of Boston, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as officiating pianist, was, needless to say, of quite the first order. The Thursday evening attendants were treated also to Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers"—the last with Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor, as soloists. On Saturday, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony preceded the Toch affair and Ravel's "La Valse" (a Koussevitzky battle-steed), followed it.

The second concert of the Schubert Memorial [illegible] Carnegie Hall, on Wednesday evening, [illegible] Yalkovsky, a young pianist, in Tschaik[illegible] flat minor concerto, and Graham Harris, a young conductor who had functioned, among other places, at the Capitol Theatre, in the C minor symphony of Brahms. At these revelations none of the neighboring rivers burst into flame, though Miss Yalkovsky disclosed enough of speed and power and M[illegible] Harris disposed of Brah[illegible]

The outstan[illegible] s Rose Zulalian, contralto[illegible] or, Saturday afternoon; Re[illegible] res Segovia, guitarist. Sun[illegible] cellist, Sunday evening, [illegible] s boy of the violin, Sunday

Mélomane.

UNION
Springfield, Mass.
JAN 1 2 1929

Music in Springfield

The annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra sponsored by the Y. M. C. A. has been for many years the outstanding musical event of the winter season in Springfield. In recent years it has been an even more important event than before because of the almost complete lack of other concerts of comparable quality. The Y. M. C. A. deserves the fullest commendation for continuing to bring the orchestra to Springfield in the face of great difficulties. In a sense, it has been performing a civic service. Whether or not it can continue longer to do so now seems to depend entirely upon the attitude of the public that it has so generously endeavored to serve.

The statistics of the last concert indicates plainly that a crisis has been reached. For the first time in the history of the concerts, the orchestra last Sunday played to empty seats in the Auditorium. It has been assumed that the inclement weather may have kept many away, although it would seem that in view of the paucity of concerts in Springfield this winter, in view of the recognized fame of the orchestra and its conductor, and finally, in view of the fact that no admission was charged, the Auditorium should have been filled notwithstanding the shower of rain that fell an hour before concert time.

The collection taken is an even more depressing index of the lack of interest manifested in this concert by the public of Springfield. It was the smallest ever taken at these concerts. The audience of approximately three thousand contributed the miserly total of $737.38 to defraying the expenses. Although this was increased to $978.38 through the sale of a few reserved seats, the Y. M. C. A. must meet a deficit of approximately $1700 on this concert, the payment of which wipes out the funds realized from the sale of season tickets to the Sunday meetings. In order to provide the public of Springfield with the symphony concert, the Y. M. C. A. is obliged to conduct the remainder of its Sunday meetings this year on the collections taken at each meeting, which it can do only with the greatest difficulty, if at all.

The Y. M. C. A. can scarcely be blamed if it decides that it can no longer afford to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield at its own expense. The future of more than this single concert would seem to be involved. Within the last five years for lack of popular support the number of public concerts in Springfield has been reduced to a bare two or three. The Steinert series of concerts is no longer given, except for an occasional recital. The other concerts in the Y. M. C. A. course have necessarily been abandoned. The Music Festival is continued only with difficulty and on a much reduced scale, both in quantity and quality The Springfield Symphony Orchestra continues to give generally adequate concerts, but it can receive little encouragement for improving its standards in a community that seems manifestly disinterested in the best orchestral music.

The facts are unpalatable, but equally unavoidable. The time seems plainly to have come for a showdown. If Springfield desires to continue in the future as in the past to be known as a musical community, it can do so by giving concrete manifestation of its willingness to cooperate with the Y. M. C. A. in supporting the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This may as well be the test case. If hearty popular support can be given to these concerts, other musical agencies may be justifiably encouraged to continue their efforts to supply Springfield with good music. If such support cannot be won for an enterprise of such proved merit, other musical groups in planning their activities may by that sign know how little to expect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 9 - 1929

A Spanish Invasion by the Symphony

Arbos Comes from Madrid to Borrow Koussevitzky's Baton and Conduct the New Music of the Peninsula.—An Unusual Interlude

A Spanish interlude in the season's music will bring E. Fernandez Arbos to this city next Tuesday night as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a visit which promises great things. Mr. Arbos comes not only as a gifted interpreter of the remarkable modern school of Spanish composers but as the man who is in no small measure distinctly responsible for the amazing Iberian renaissance.

It would be permissible to become excited over such a guest even if the cue were not given by the procession of superlatives that marked his brief appearance with the New York Symphony last winter. He was to land yesterday for a week with the Boston organization, which will play programs predominantly Spanish under his inspired baton.

Mr. Arbos is no stranger to Boston. Just 25 years ago he made his first visit to America as concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He stayed only one season, 1903-1904, returning to Spain when called to become conductor of the Madrid Symphony Orchestra, whose conductor he remains today.

A whole school of Spanish composers has grown up during that time, and it is difficult to conceive of the development without Mr. Arbos as their champion in place of proverbial neglect, their own country.

A Changed Situation.

There had been no orchestras to play their music if natives had wished to undertake serious instrumental composition. Now the Madrid Orchestra, which had given only eight concerts a year, gives 200, and encourages native composers. Four other orchestras, including that in Barcelona conducted by Pablo Casals, function in the country. Spain is now enjoying the greatest period of musical prosperity she has ever known.

Little of the Spanish music Mr. Arbos will play here had come into existence when he accepted the conductorship of the Madrid Orchestra. As Olin Downes pointed out in the New York Times a year ago in an excellent article from which this borrows liberally, it was several years after that when musicians in America began to fumble over certain piano pieces of Albeniz's belonging to the set called "Iberia," cautiously displayed on the counters of music stores.

The works of Granados were unknown and the opera "Goyescas," product of a later year when Granados met his death by submarine, was unsuspected. Turina, so far as the American public was concerned, was non-existent—in fact, was only then beginning to find himself in Paris. De Falla, the present leader of the Spanish School, had yet to pursue his decisive studies in that capital. The name of old Pedrell—he died as recently as 1922—was known principally, outside of his own country, to lexicons and musicologists.

Making a Good Guess

The program which the guest conductor will elect to play here cannot be announced with surety until he is established in Boston today, but it is probable that it will be a very near-twin to that of the first Boston concert next week. The numbers to be heard in Symphony Hall are:

Wagner.....Prelude to "Meistersingers"
Halfter-Escriche ..... Sinfonietta
Ravel.....''Alborada del Graciosa"
Albeniz.....''Iberia," transcribed by Arbos
Turina.....''Procesion de Rocio"
De Falla.....''Three-Cornered Hat"

Whether such is the intention or not, that program serves well to indicate Spanish musical history in the quarter-century. Spain was for long under the domination of Germany in matter musical, but the French came to be the counsellors and kinsmen.

"German profundities and psychological delvings are not for the Spaniards," Mr. Arbos said last year. "We are of the same racial origins as the French. We are near neighbors and have been close friends or bitter foes for centuries. The clarity, the logic and warmth of coloring, the sensitiveness to rhythm, the instinct for fine instrumental values—these tendencies are extremely sympathetic to artists of Spain. France gave us our technic, cultivated our taste, and made us aware of our own musical richness."

He opens his program with the "Meistersingers" overture which, curiously enough, Sir Thomas Beecham conducted last year as guest conductor here with the same orchestra.

German and French

The sinfonietta by Halfter-Escriche in three parts is said to be German-influenced, modern in harmony but in style conforming more to the old "concerto grosso," with important solo parts for 11 different instruments. The composer, only 24 years old now and younger of course when he wrote the piece, uses polytanality extensively, but there is clarity to be found in its form and its gaiety.

Mr. Arbos likes not only to put on his programs Spanish music developed under French influence but in juxtaposition French music inspired by Spain. He is fond of Debussy's "Iberia" and the prospective program includes the satirical Ravel piece listed above. This composition, originally a piano piece, has been played under Koussevitzky, who gave it finish and color and Gallic wit. Arbos's interpretation was called electric and extravagant and Spanish by the critics last March.

Mr. Arbos remembers Albeniz when both were at the Brussels Conservatiore, the former studying the violin under Vieuxtemps and the latter the piano under Brassin. Their friendship continued firm until Albeniz's death.

The Spanish Liszt

Like Liszt, to whom he has been compared, Albeniz had an amazing picturesque career. At the age of six he ran away from home—to play the piano. He astounded judges at the Paris Conservatiore by his playing, then took a ball from his pocket and smashed a looking glass with it.

Put back to school, he fled again, and this time was not so easily traced. He travelled everywhere in poverty. He secured a contract from a publisher whereby he would be paid four pesetas for every page of music he composed. He produced 50 pages a night until the publisher knelt to beg freedom from such a ruinous contract. His production as a composer would have been better had he been less popular as a virtuoso, for he had extraordinary inventive powers.

Although he composed in the popular vein, he never used popular melodies. He was at home only with the piano, but Arbos has lovingly transcribed several works for the orchestra, retaining the character of the original but adding greatly by the brilliant orchestrations. The "Iberia" suite will be represented by three parts.

From the Nation's Store

While Albeniz had his own melodies, surcharged with the popular spirit, de Falla constantly utilized Andalusian folk-melodies in his work. They are to be found insinuated in his music for the "Three-Cornered Hat," the ballet popularized by the notable performance by the Russian Ballet.

The outbreak of the World War drove home many Spanish composers at work elsewhere. Among them were de Falla and Turina. The latter, who may also be represented on the Providence program, is also under the French influence, having studied with Paul Dukas and with Vincent d'Indy at the Paris Schola Cantorum.

One of Olin Downes's tributes to Mr. Arbos is worth quoting since it bears on the visitor's capabilities as a guest conductor:

"No other conductor who has come to this country interprets Spanish music with so much sensuousness, temperament and orchestral command; nor has another conductor united in one and the same personality the rhythmical impulse and accent that come from his soil, which can neither be counterfeited nor imitated, with the musical knowledge that Mr. Arbos possesses.

"He has a remarkable way with the orchestra. He put the devil in the reverend signors of the New York Symphony Orchestra. They whipped off their chords, their cross-accents as if they had been stung; they mooned over long and sensuous phrases as if they were sitting in a Spanish landscape. The orchestra did not merely glow; it blazed in Mr. Arbos's sonorities."

Certainly that is enough to make one look ahead toward Tuesday with excitement.

W. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BILLBOARD
JAN 1 2 1929

Boston Symphony at Richmond

Keen interest is being shown by music lovers of Richmond, Va., in the coming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky, at the City Auditorium on January 29. The orchestra, whose appearance is the third attraction in the Artists' Series, is being presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene, and other artists announced for the balance of the season are Rosa Ponselle, February 21, and Tito Schipa on April 12.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 9 - 1929

Serge Koussevitzky

To say th[illegible] born and not made savors of banality. What indeed can define genius, or place its limits, or trace its origins? To see genius work one need only go to Boston's Symphony Hall on a Friday afternoon or Saturday evening. For at those times the Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving its concerts, and its leadership is in the hands of a true genius of the art of conducting —Serge Koussevitzky.

In Boston Mr. Koussevitzky's work has been chiefly one of refinement of standards. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had acquired world fame under Dr. Karl Muck. The amiable and correct Henry Rabaud did not go far on the road to progress with the reorganized orchestra after the war. To his successor, Pierre Monteaux, is due much of the credit for the recapturing of standards that had been temporarily lost. During his regime the Boston Symphony again became quickly an orchestra, an orchestra unquestionably of the first rank. In this condition Mr. Koussevitzky found it—a group of excellent players, excellently routined, having large accomplishments to their credit, awaiting only the touch of the impelling force of genius to take it out of the rank and file of "first rank orchestras" and to place it in a position of leadership among them. This force Serge Koussevitzky has been able abundantly to supply. Music students are taking advantage of the opportunity of hearing the Hartford concert at the Capitol Theater February 3. The ticket sale is at McCoy's.

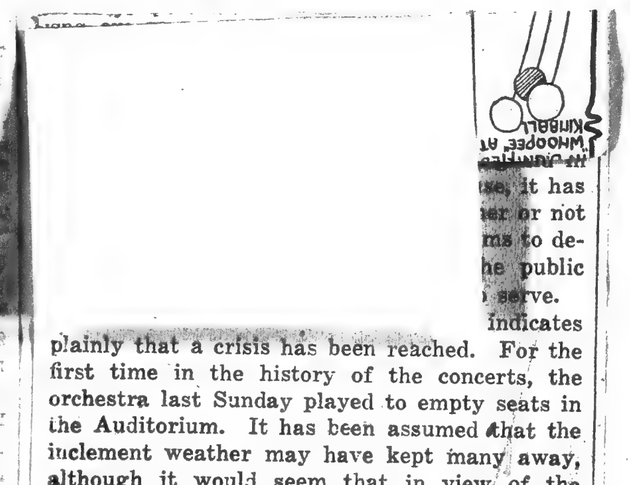
THIS CLIPPING FROM
TOWN TOPICS
JAN 1 0 1929

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Carnegie Hall for concerts on Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon. A modernistic piano concerto by Ernest Toch of Vienna and Mannheim was the feature of both programmes. To some this opus in three movements seemed to bear particularly dazzling testimony to the tonal genius of our own day. To others it was an annoying and gratuitous racket, decked out with stuff that Stravinsky, Strauss, and even Liszt had done better. The performance by Mr. Koussevitzky and the men of Boston, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as officiating pianist, was, needless to say, of quite the first order. The Thursday evening attendants were treated also to Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers"—the last with Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor, as soloists. On Saturday, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony preceded the Toch affair and Ravel's "La Valse" (a Koussevitzky battle-steed), followed it.

The second concert of the Schubert Memorial [illegible] Hall, on Wednesday evening [illegible] Yalkovsky, a young pianist, in Tschaik[illegible] flat minor concerto, and Graham Harris, a young conductor who had functioned, among other places, at the Capitol Theatre, in the C minor symphony of Brahms. At these revelations none of the neighboring rivers burst into flame, though Miss Yalkovsky disclosed enough of speed and power and Mr. Harris disposed of Brahms in a safe and sane fashion.

The outstanding recitals of the week were those of Miss Rose Zulalian, contralto, New Year's night; Arthur Hackett, tenor, Saturday afternoon; Roland Hayes, tenor, Sunday afternoon; Andres Segovia, guitarist, Sunday afternoon; Miss Beatrice Harrison, 'cellist, Sunday evening, and young Yehudi Menuhin, the marvelous boy of the violin, Sunday evening.

The Mélomane.



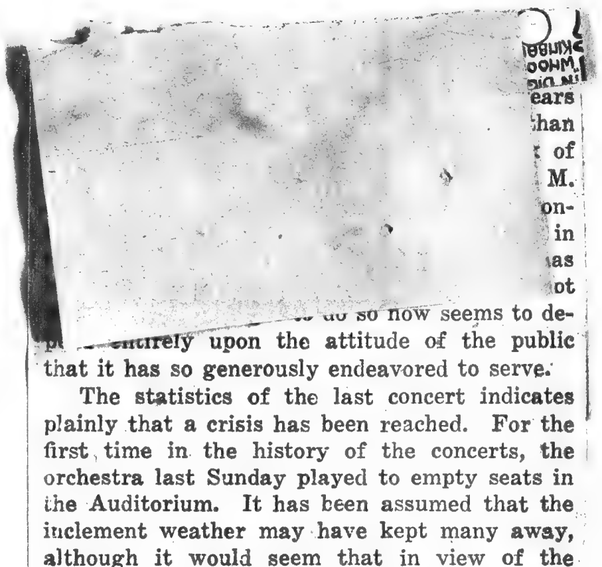
[illegible] it has [illegible] or not [illegible] to de- [illegible] public [illegible] serve.

indicates plainly that a crisis has been reached. For the first time in the history of the concerts, the orchestra last Sunday played to empty seats in the Auditorium. It has been assumed that the inclement weather may have kept many away, although it would seem that in view of the paucity of concerts in Springfield this winter, in view of the recognized fame of the orchestra and its conductor, and finally, in view of the fact that no admission was charged, the Auditorium should have been filled notwithstanding the shower of rain that fell an hour before concert time.

The collection taken is an even more depressing index of the lack of interest manifested in this concert by the public of Springfield. It was the smallest ever taken at these concerts. The audience of approximately three thousand contributed the miserly total of $737.38 to defraying the expenses. Although this was increased to $978.38 through the sale of a few reserved seats, the Y. M. C. A. must meet a deficit of approximately $1700 on this concert, the payment of which wipes out the funds realized from the sale of season tickets to the Sunday meetings. In order to provide the public of Springfield with the symphony concert, the Y. M. C. A. is obliged to conduct the remainder of its Sunday meetings this year on the collections taken at each meeting, which it can do only with the greatest difficulty, if at all.

The Y. M. C. A. can scarcely be blamed if it decides that it can no longer afford to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield at its own expense. The future of more than this single concert would seem to be involved. Within the last five years for lack of popular support the number of public concerts in Springfield has been reduced to a bare two or three. The Steinert series of concerts is no longer given, except for an occasional recital. The other concerts in the Y. M. C. A. course have necessarily been abandoned. The Music Festival is continued only with difficulty and on a much reduced scale, both in quantity and quality The Springfield Symphony Orchestra continues to give generally adequate concerts, but it can receive little encouragement for improving its standards in a community that seems manifestly disinterested in the best orchestral music.

The facts are unpalatable, but equally unavoidable. The time seems plainly to have come for a showdown. If Springfield desires to continue in the future as in the past to be known as a musical community, it can do so by giving concrete manifestation of its willingness to cooperate with the Y. M. C. A. in supporting the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This may as well be the test case. If hearty popular support can be given to these concerts, other musical agencies may be justifiably encouraged to continue their efforts to supply Springfield with good music. If such support cannot be won for an enterprise of such proved merit, other musical groups in planning their activities may by that sign know how little to expect.



[illegible] ears [illegible] than [illegible] of [illegible] M. [illegible] on- [illegible] in [illegible] as [illegible] ot

[illegible] to do so now seems to depend entirely upon the attitude of the public that it has so generously endeavored to serve.

The statistics of the last concert indicates plainly that a crisis has been reached. For the first time in the history of the concerts, the orchestra last Sunday played to empty seats in the Auditorium. It has been assumed that the inclement weather may have kept many away, although it would seem that in view of the paucity of concerts in Springfield this winter, in view of the recognized fame of the orchestra and its conductor, and finally, in view of the fact that no admission was charged, the Auditorium should have been filled notwithstanding the shower of rain that fell an hour before concert time.

The collection taken is an even more depressing index of the lack of interest manifested in this concert by the public of Springfield. It was the smallest ever taken at these concerts. The audience of approximately three thousand contributed the miserly total of $737.38 to defraying the expenses. Although this was increased to $978.38 through the sale of a few reserved seats, the Y. M. C. A. must meet a deficit of approximately $1700 on this concert, the payment of which wipes out the funds realized from the sale of season tickets to the Sunday meetings. In order to provide the public of Springfield with the symphony concert, the Y. M. C. A. is obliged to conduct the remainder of its Sunday meetings this year on the collections taken at each meeting, which it can do only with the greatest difficulty, if at all.

The Y. M. C. A. can scarcely be blamed if it decides that it can no longer afford to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield at its own expense. The future of more than this single concert would seem to be involved. Within the last five years for lack of popular support the number of public concerts in Springfield has been reduced to a bare two or three. The Steinert series of concerts is no longer given, except for an occasional recital. The other concerts in the Y. M. C. A. course have necessarily been abandoned. The Music Festival is continued only with difficulty and on a much reduced scale, both in quantity and quality The Springfield Symphony Orchestra continues to give generally adequate concerts, but it can receive little encouragement for improving its standards in a community that seems manifestly disinterested in the best orchestral music.

The facts are unpalatable, but equally unavoidable. The time seems plainly to have come for a showdown. If Springfield desires to continue in the future as in the past to be known as a musical community, it can do so by giving concrete manifestation of its willingness to cooperate with the Y. M. C. A. in supporting the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This may as well be the test case. If hearty popular support can be given to these concerts, other musical agencies may be justifiably encouraged to continue their efforts to supply Springfield with good music. If such support cannot be won for an enterprise of such proved merit, other musical groups in planning their activities may by that sign know how little to expect.

76

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CANADA
MAIL & EMPIRE

JAN 12 1929

Music in New York

BY JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON.

New York, Jan. 11.—[illegible]th the Philharmonic giving Mahler's Lied von der Erde, the Boston Symphony introducing a new pianist in a [illegible] concerto, and the leaderless orchestra at it again, things took a step upward after the musical doldrums of the previous week. The resumption of Carmen into the repertoire of the Metropolitan also added interest, as did the reappearance of La Jeritza in Rosenkavalier the previous evening, after all he had said on the subject; but of this more later.

Mr. Mengelberg, as has been said before, is bent upon making America like Mahler whether it wants to or not. Remembering, perhaps, the timidity with which Wagner was received on this side of the Atlantic and the furore he created when once a foothold was obtained the Dutch conductor hopes, possibly, to repeat the phenomenon. But alas! Mahler is no Wagner and Mengelberg is no Leopold Damrosch, and Mahler does not seem to be making much of a dent in our musical consciousness.

Nevertheless, and notwithstanding, as was said in the story of Miss Betty Arundale, the performance was an impressive one which Mengelberg gave of Mahler's Lied von der Erde, which, for the benefit of those unfamiliar with it, is a longish symphony with solo parts for contralto and tenor suggested by some Chinese meditation on Life, Death, the Seasons and what not. The soloists in the present instance were Margaret Matzenauer, contralto of the Metropolitan, and Richard Crooks, tenor not of the Metropolitan. Especially notable was Mme. Matzenauer's singing of the contralto sections. As someone said of her in opera, when she comes on the stage, you know someone is there. This quality of personality extends to Mme. Matzenauer's concert singing as well, and very beautiful was all she did with Mahler's work. Admirers of Mr. Crooks' singing, also, must have found much that gave them pleasure in his [illegible] conducting, [illegible] was done for the [illegible] of a [illegible]

For the pair of concerts of the Boston [illegible] Koussevitzky provided interesting programs, giving at the second the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven and Ravel's rather dull La Valse. At the first, the Unfinished of Schubert was played, Handel's B Minor Concerto Grosso, Carpenter's Skyscrapers Suite with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lauther as soloists. At both concerts Jesus Sanroma, pianist, was heard in Toch's Concerto, a novelty.

Naturally, Mr. Sanroma and the Toch work are the apices of interest. One may take for granted that the two symphonies were impeccably given, as well as Mr. Carpenter's highly-contrasting work, and that of Mr. Handel; also, if Mr. Koussevitzky will play the Ravel Valse at all, he played it well.

The Toch Concerto is some three years old and after two or three hearings in various music centres of Europe, it was one of the admired numbers at the Congress of Cacophony at Frankfort in 1927. The work is lengthy, almost of symphonic length, and besides a piano part of Herculean proportions and difficulties, utilizes an immense orchestra. Not the least feat in the performances was the team-work between soloist and conductor. Mr. Sanroma is said to have studied the work with the composer, which accounts for his very obvious familiarity with the score, as well as with his solo parts.

The Concerto leaves one with a curious galvanized feeling. It is all so rapid, so sharply cut with a quality of steel about it. There is no sentimentality, no romanticism. It is all power, brilliancy, the efficiency of metal, metal with a sardonic sense of humor, if such a thing were possible. One could never lie back with closed eyes during a performance, as in the Schumann A Minor, or the Tchaikovsky, or the Rubinstein. You have to keep sitting up and taking notice. Just by this much one is left fatigued.

Mr. Sanroma's performance was magnificent in every way. His technique was more than equal to the difficulties encountered, and it must be supposed that hsi interpretation was an authentic one. By way of contrast, and probably in order to show that his talents were not confined to ultra modern things, Mr. Sanroma played the Schumann A Minor Concerto at a concert in Brooklyn between his two performances of the Toch in Manhattan. Unfortunately, the writer was unable to attend this concert.

With regard to the concert by the Leaderless Orchestra, or the Am[illegible] Symphony, as it is officially called, it must be recorded that their performance was an improvement upon the previous one. The program included the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and the Prokofieff Piano Concerto played by Paul Sassievitch, who acts as concert master for the Ensemble.

The hypothesis of the conductorless orchestra still seems to beg the question. Doubtless its members, freed from the stigma of having to follow the leadership of anyone, play with their souls unfettered in the mood which the musicians under the grateful domination of Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Gabrilowitsch never feel. If this is true, however, results would seem to prove that the unfettering of so much soul-stuff at one time is not an unmitigated blessing musica'ly speaking, that is. The Ensemble plays well, but it cannot honestly be said to have any soaring quality of brilliance or shading which the best personally-conducted orchestras do not exhibit. Perhaps the evocations of one soul neutralize those of another. It might easily happen this way. So far as can yet be seen, the only thing in its favor is that it saves the salary of a conductor, but one suspects that this amount, however small or large, is straightway swallowed up in extra rehearsals. Who knows?

Mr. Sassievitch has been heard before. He appeared with some orchestra or other, within the last few years, as a double-barrelled soloist, playing a piano concerto and a violin ditto. He did well with the Prokofieff, which is not an easy work under any circumstances, and it must be said that the orchestra gave him careful and musicianly support.

The Schubert Memorial gave its second concert, bringing forth Isabelle Yakovsky, pianist, in the Tchaikovsky Concerto, and Graham Harris, conductor, in the Brahms C Minor Symphony.

How they do go on, these young things; Hardened symphonic angels of years of experience put off the shoes from their feet before attempting this Brahms Symphony, and only an artist with the maturity which Life alone can give, can bring forth what is in the Tchaikovsky. The results in this case were what might have been expected, good, even excellent performances, but nothing to write home about. Mr. Harris has had a lot of experience and is even now getting some more, conducting one of the big motion picture orchestras here, but can this help him with his mighty Brahms? And does one swallow in Carnegie Hall make a symphonic summer? The wonders.

At the Metropolitan La Jeritza did the handsome thing, and although she had not sung "Rosenkavalier" for four years and had no costumes here, and though she was booked for the first "Carmen" of the season the following day at the matinee, she volunteered to fill in for Grete Stueckgold, who was still ill, and thus save the management from having to substitute another opera. They had had to do this the night before when Ponselle was unable to appear in "Norma."

Octavian still seems La Jeritza's handsomest part, for in this role alone of all she has played at the Metropolitan does she have a chance to show her superlative abilities as a comedienne. And who, among all who have sung it, can look as she looks at her entrance in the second act with the silver rose? Her work throughout this performance was of a high order and reflected great credit upon her. Florence Easton, as the Feldmarschallin, repeated her splendid characterization, and sang even better than usual.

Another substitute in the cast was Queena Mario, who arose from a sick bed to sing Editha Fleischer's role of Sophie, a role which formerly was her own property. Miss Mario obviously saved her voice in the second act, but in the third sang with all her accustomed beauty of tone. Richard Mayr's Baron Ochs was indifferent, as usual. He is the least satisfactory singer heard to date in the part.

The following day La Jeritza sang "Carmen" at the matinee. It is not her best part, nor even her second best, but it has improved since last season. Martinelli was the Jose, and in the third act the two fought with pretty fightings that threatened to become serious. Queena Mario again substituted, this time for Lucrezia Bori as Micaela, and won rounds of applause for her Prayer.

It was a week of substitutions. Instead of "Norma" on Thursday, "Aida" was sung, with Jacobo in the part, though why this singer was not put into Miss Ponselle's role in "Norma" and the opera let to stay, is the management's affair. Miss Jacobo knows "Norma," and, as a matter of fact, made her first American appearance in the role several years back at the Manhattan Opera House. The night before that flu played the deuce with things. "Walkuere" was the opera, with Easton as Bruennhilde and Stueckgold as Sieglinde, while Matzenauer was cast for Fricka, Mme. Stueckgold being still hors de combat, Mme. Easton sang her part, Mme. Matzenauer sang Mme. Easton's part, and Julia Claussen was pressed into service to substitute for Mme. Matzenauer as Fricka.

An impressario's life is not a happy one!

EDMUND ABBEY,

one of the popular artists of the New Empire Company. Mr. Abbey will play an important role in "Too Much Family," Harry Delf's comedy, which will be enacted in Toronto for the first time next week at the Empire Theatre.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 12 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

In establishing the orchestra in 1881, Mr. Higginson wished to add interest and stimulation by securing a more romantic and exotic figure as conductor. George Henschel, then a versatile composer, had just made a spectacular appearance at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, Higginson was amazed by the effects that Henschel achieved from the orchestra, approached him with an offer to lead the new organization. He made a tremendous success and created a profound impression, and as time went on, the concerts grew steadily in popularity.

Gericke was ideally fitted to carry on. He was a drill master, whose insatiable desire for perfection was only equalled by his foresight in obtaining it. Following the classical period of Mr. Gericke, came the romantic ones of Nikish and Pauer. The former found a body of musicians at his disposal exquisitely trained and perfected in their technique. Emil Paur succeeded him. Again brilliance and energy held the stage. Dr. Karl Muck, by special permission of the German emperor, was taken from the conductorship of the Royal Opera House in Berlin. To many he represents the peak of musicianship and the perfection of the art of conducting. Of Max Fiedler, another fine musician it is hard to speak adequately. Rabaud, the French composer took the reins for a single season, to be succeeded by Pierre Monteaux. Koussevitzky came next. His dynamic personality and the dramatic power swept all before him. To the old ones Koussevitzky brought daring ideas which have had the undeniable effect of stimulating renewed interest in the classics. Tickets for the Hartford concert February 3, on sale at McCoy's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

JAN 12 1929

NOTED SPANIARD TO CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

A program featuring notable contemporary Spanish music is announced by E. Fernandez Arbos, the celebrated Spanish conductor, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as guest, at its second Providence concert, in the Albee theatre, next Tuesday evening. Mr. Arbos will open the evening with Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and also perform the symphony of Joseph Haydn in G-major. The latter part of the program will consist of Spanish music, in the performance of which Arbos holds a special reputation. This will include two numbers, "Triana" and "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," from the piano suite, "Iberia" by Albeniz, which Mr. Arbos has arranged for orchestra. There will also be three dances from de Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat"), and Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1929

Arbos Prepares Program for Symphony Orchestra

The program will be as follows at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, in the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening.

E. Ferandez Arbos, celebrated Spanish conductor, will open the evening with Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and also perform the Symphony of Joseph Haydn, in G major (B. & H. No 13). The latter part of the programme will consist of Spanish music, in the performance of which Arbos holds a special reputation. This will include two numbers—"Triana" and "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," from the Piano Suite, "Iberia" by Albeniz, which Mr. Arbos has arranged for orchestra. There will also be three dances from de Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three Cornered Hat"), and Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso."

Arbos arrived in America last Tuesday on his special trip here for the purpose of conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and Providence. He conducted the same Spanish scores with much success in a series of guest appearances in New York last season. The Spanish musician began his career as violin virtuoso of great brilliance, and is remembered by some as concertmaster of this orchestra, following Franz Kneisel in the season of 1903-4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

JAN 13 1929

BOSTON IS STILL HUB OF MUSIC

Symphony Hall Continues to Rest Proudly on Its Four Walls.

By GEORGE SMITH
Music Critic of The Syracuse Harald

THE very word "Boston" is practically certain to call up pictures in our minds. To some it immediately suggests Beacon Hill, the Common, Trinity Church, and Harvard. To others there appear fabulous visions of well browned Baked Beans, or of sea-food dinners fresh from Cape Cod. To those who enjoy the more exact arrangement of our more modern American cities, there may arise a painful remembrance of crooked streets, paths always bringing the bewildered visitor back to Scollay Square with a sort of pitiless certainty.

Strangers holding such pleasantly romantic pictures in their minds' eyes would be somewhat non-plussed to see the city of their particular dreams today. They might find that there are Bostonians of several years residence who are only dimly aware that Beacon Street has an internationally broadcast legend; many of these present-day citizens will clamly tell you that Beacon Street is that street which crosses Commonwealth Avenue at Kenmore Subway Station. Thousands of its busy denizens flitter across Boston Common without a passing thought for the ground they tramp. And as for baked beans in a Boston restaurant! they are as prevalent as chop suey in Hong Kong, from all accounts.

THE old byways, in the old section, are, to be sure, fortuously enough arranged, but the new Boston is spacious, regular, "New Yorkish," and ill suits the ladies who use it as a background for clothes of the vintage 1904. It may safely be said that for a person engaged in a research study of millinery of the past, this charming city is without peer as hunting ground. The hats, to say the least, go back many years. Some of the younger generation succeed with appalling accuracy in resembling their grandparents.

Boston is not without theaters. To name a few of the legitimate playhouses we might cite: The theaters Plymouth, Hollis, Wilbur, Colonial, Tremont, Copley, Repertory, Schubert, Majestic. There are motion picture palaces, great and small, without count. But the inhabitants of this extraordinary city, once notable for its enthusiastic reception of Shaw plays, go quietly and decorously to renderings of such nursery-room playlets as "Charley's Aunt"—and consider it a rare bit. Books of the more audacious sort, usually published in naught New York, are carefully kept away from impressionable Bostonians by discerning and upright censors.

IT IS scarcely necessary to relate that Symphony Hall continues to rest proudly on its four walls bordering Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues. In this solemn building the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds [illegible] the baton of the popular and talented M. Koussevitzky. The concerts are attended as ever by loyal patrons who at times are a bit alarmed at the array of Russian music on the programs. Beethoven looks clamly down upon both the Boston families and the Russian pianists from his personal Symphony Hall. Of late, Beethoven has a right to appear satisfied; his music has been royally treated in Symphony Hall. Of late, Beethovan has also witnessed, along with the Boston gentry, the triumphant pianism of M. Horowitz, who, be it said, has stirred the Bostonese to what might fairly be called their very depths.

Recitals continue at a great rate in Jordan Hall, scene of hundreds of debuts. The Peoples Symphony Orchestra plays in the ball-room of the new Hotel Statler, led by Mr. Wenat. The sumptuous opera house (The Boston Opera House) provides the scene for an annual short season of opera, generally given by the Chicago Opera Company—for Boston has no opera company of its own.

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CANADA
MAIL & EMPIRE
JAN 12 1929

Music in New York

BY JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON.

New York, Jan. 11.— ith the Philharmonic giving Mahler Lied von der Erde, the Boston Sympho y introducing a new pianist in concerto, and the leaderless orchest at it again, things took a step up ard after the musical doldrums of the previous week. The resumption of C men into the repertoire of the Metro itan also added interest, as did t reappearance of La Jeritza in Rosen valier the previous evening, after al e had said on the subject; but of th more later.

Mr. Mengelberg, as as been said before, is bent upon aking America like Mahler whether it ants to or not. Remembering, perhap the timidity with which Wagner s received on this side of the Atlant and the furore he created when once foothold was obtained the Dutch ductor hopes, possibly, to repeat the enomenon. But out alas! Mahler is Wagner and Mengelberg is no old Damrosch. and Mahler does not to be making much of a dent in musical consciousness.

Nevertheless, and no ithstanding, as was said in the stor of Miss Betty Arundale, the perform ce was an impressive one which M elberg gave of Mahler's Lied von der rde, which, for the benefit of those u miliar with it, is a longish symphony with solo parts for contralto and ten suggested by some Chinese medit on on Life, Death, the Seasons an what not. The soloists in the preser instance were Margaret Matzenauer, ntralto of the Metropolitan, and Richa Crooks, tenor not of the Metropol n. Especially notable was Mme. Ma enauer's singing of the contralto sec ns. As someone said of her in o ra, when she comes on the stage, y know someone is there. This qu y of personality extends to Mm Matzenauer's concert singing as well, nd very beautiful was all she did with Mahler's work. Admirers of Mr. ooks' singing, also, must have found ch that gave them pleasu e was done the d ch of a concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky programs, giving at interesting programs, giving at first performance the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven and Ravel's rather dull La Valse. At the first, the Unfinished of Schubert, was played, Handel's B Minor Concerto Grosso, Carpenter's Skyscrapers Suite with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lauther as soloists. At both concerts Jesus Sanroma, pianist, was heard in Toch's Concerto, a novelty.

Naturally, Mr. Sanroma and the Toch work are the apices of interest. One may take for granted that the two symphonies were impeccably given, as well as Mr. Carpenter's highly-contrasting work, and that of Mr. Handel; also, if Mr. Koussevitzky will play the Ravel Valse at all, he played it well.

The Toch Concerto is some three years old and after two or three hearings in various music centres of Europe, it was one of the admired numbers at the Congress of Cacophony at Frankfort in 1927. The work is lengthy, almost of symphonic length, and besides a piano part of Herculean proportions and difficulties, utilizes an immense orchestra. Not the least feat in the performances was the team-work between soloist and conductor. Mr. Sanroma is said to have studied the work with the composer, which accounts for his very obvious familiarity with the score, as well as with his solo parts.

The Concerto leaves one with a curious galvanized feeling. It is all so rapid, so sharply cut with a quality of steel about it. There is no sentimentality, no romanticism. It is all power, brilliancy, the efficiency of metal, metal with a sardonic sense of humor, if such a thing were possible. One could never lie back with closed eyes during a performance, as in the Schumann A Minor, or the Tchaikovsky, or the Rubinstein. You have to keep sitting up and taking notice. Just by this much one is left fatigued.

Mr. Sanroma's performance was magnificent in every way. His technique was more than equal to the difficulties encountered, and it must be supposed that hsi interpretation was an authentic one. By way of contrast, and probably in order to show that his talents were not confined to ultra modern things, Mr. Sanroma played the Schumann A Minor Concerto at a concert in Brooklyn between his two performances of the Toch in Manhattan. Unfortunately, the writer was unable to attend this concert.

With regard to the concert by the Leaderless Orchestra, or the Am ally called, it must be recorded that their performance was a improvement upon the previous one. rogram included the Jupiter Sy phony of Mozart, Tchaikovsky's "Ro o and Juliet" and the Prokofieff Pia Concerto played by Paul Sassievitch who acts as concert master for th Ensemble.

The hypothesis the conductorless orchestra still seem to beg the question. Doubtless it members, freed from the stigma of wing to follow the leadership of anyo play with their souls unfettered in mood which the musicians under the ateful domination of Mr. Koussevitzk or Mr. Gabrilowitsch never feel. I his is true, however, results would m to prove that the unfettering of so uch soul-stuff at one time is not an mmitigated blessing musica'ly speak g, that is. The Ensemble plays we but it cannot honestly be said to ave any soaring quality of brilliance shading which the best personally-conducted orchestras do not exhibit. Perhaps the evocations of one soul eutralize those of another. It might easily happen this way. So far as c n yet be seen, the only thing in its favor is that it saves the salary of a nductor, but one suspects that this amount, however small or large, is straightway swallowed up in extra rehears s. Who knows?

Mr. Sassievitch been heard before. He appeared with some orchestra or other, within the last few years, as a double-barrel d soloist, playing a piano concerto a a violin ditto. He did well with th Prokofieff, which is not an easy wo under any circumstances, and it must be said that the orchestra gave h careful and musicianly support.

The Schubert morial gave its second concert, br ging forth Isabelle Yakovsky, pianis in the Tchaikovsky Concerto, and G am Harris, conductor, in the Brah C Minor Symphony.

How they do go on, these young things; Hardene symphonic angels of years of experi e put off the shoes from their feet efore attempting this Brahms Symph y, and only an artist with the matur y which Life alone can give, can br forth what is in the Tchaikovsky. T results in this case were what migh have been expected, good, even exce nt performances, but nothing to write omo about. Mr. Harris has had a l of experience and is even now gettin some more, conducting one of the motion picture orchestras here, can this help him with his mighty hms? And does one swallow in Carne Hall make a symphonic summer? e wonders.

At the Metropoli n La Jeritza did the handsome thing, a although she had not sung "Ros nkavalier" for four years and had no costumes here, and though she was booked for the first "Carmen" of the season the ollowing day at the matinee, she vol eered to fill in for Grete Stueckgold, who was still ill, and thus save the ma agement from having to substitute ano er opera. They had had to do this t night before when Ponselle was u ble to appear in "Norma."

Octavian still s La Jeritza's handiest part, for in his role alone of all she has played at the Metropolitan does she have a chance to show her superlative abilities as a comedienne. And who, among all who have sung it, can look as she looks at he entrance in the second act with the silver rose? Her work throughout this performance was of a high order and r flected great credit upon her. Florence Easton, as the Feldmarschallin, repeated her splendid characterization, and sang even better than usual.

Another substitute i the cast was Queena Mario, who ar e from a sick bed to sing Editha Fl cher's role of Sophie, a role which fo merly was her own property. Miss M rio obviously saved her voice in the s cond act, but in the third sang with l her accustomed beauty of tone. Richard Mayr's Baron Ochs was indiffere t, as usual. He is the least satisfactor singer heard to date in the part.

The following day La Jeritza sang "Carmen" at the matinee. It is not her best part, nor even her second best, but it has improved since last season. Martinelli was the Jose, and in the third act the two fought with pretty fightings that threatened to become serious. Queena Mario again substituted, this time for Lucrezia Bori as Micaela, and won rounds of applause for her Prayer.

It was a week of substitutions. Instead of "Norma" on Thursday, "Aida" was sung, with Jacobo in the part, though why this singer was not put into Miss Ponselle's role in "Norma" and the opera let to stay, is the management's affair. Miss Jacobo knows "Norma," and, as a matter of fact, made her first American appearance in the role several years back at the Manhattan Opera House. The night before that flu played the deuce with things. "Walkuere" was the opera, with Easton as Bruennhilde and Stueckgold as Sieglinde, while Matzanauer was cast for Fricka, Mme. Stueckgold being still hors de combat, Mme. Easton sang her part. Mme. Matzanauer sang Mme. Easton's part, and Julia Claussen was pressed into service to substitute for Mme. Matzanauer as Fricka.

An impressario's life is not a happy one!

EDMUND ABBEY,

one of the popular artists of the New Empire Company. Mr. Abbey will play an important role in "Too Much Family," Harry Delf's comedy, which will be enacted in Toronto for the first time next week at the Empire Theatre.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 12 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

In establishing the orchestra in 1881, Mr. Higginson wished to add interest and stimulation by securing a more romantic and exotic figure as conductor. George Henschel, then a versatile composer, had just made a spectacular appearance at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, Higginson was amazed by the effects that Henschel achieved from the orchestra, approached him with an offer to lead the new organization. He made a tremendous success and created a profound impression, and as time went on, the concerts grew steadily in popularity.

Gericke was ideally fitted to carry on. He was a drill master, whose insatiable desire for perfection was only equalled by his foresight in obtaining it. Following the classical period of Mr. Gericke, came the romantic ones of Nikish and Pauer. The former found a body of musicians at his disposal exquisitely trained and perfected in their technique. Emil Paur succeeded him. Again brilliance and energy held the stage. Dr. Karl Muck, by special permission of the German emperor, was taken from the conductorship of the Royal Opera House in Berlin. To many he represents the peak of musicianship and the perfection of the art of conducting. Of Max Fiedler, another fine musician it is hard to speak adequately. Rabaud, the French composer took the reins for a single season, to be succeeded by Pierre Monteaux. Koussevitzky came next. His dynamic personality and the dramatic power swept all before him. To the old ones Koussevitzky brought daring ideas which have had the undeniable effect of stimulating renewed interest in the classics. Tickets for the Hartford concert February 3, on sale at McCoy's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
JAN 12 1929

NOTED SPANIARD TO CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

A program featuring notable contemporary Spanish music is announced by E. Fernandez Arbos, the celebrated Spanish conductor, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as guest, at its second Providence concert, in the Albee theatre, next Tuesday evening. Mr. Arbos will open the evening with Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and also perform the symphony of Joseph Haydn in G-major. The latter part of the program will consist of Spanish music, in the performance of which Arbos holds a special reputation. This will include two numbers, "Triana" and "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," from the piano suite, "Iberia" by Albeniz, which Mr. Arbos has arranged for orchestra. There will also be three dances from de Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat"), and Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1929

Arbos Prepares Program for Symphony Orchestra

The program will be as follows at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, in the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening.

E. Ferandez Arbos, celebrated Spanish conductor, will open the evening with Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and also perform the Symphony of Joseph Haydn, in G major (B. & H. No 13). The latter part of the programme will consist of Spanish music, in the performance of which Arbos holds a special reputation. This will include two numbers—"Triana" and "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," from the Piano Suite, "Iberia" by Albeniz, which Mr. Arbos has arranged for orchestra. There will also be three dances from de Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three Cornered Hat"), and Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso."

Arbos arrived in America last Tuesday on his special trip here for the purpose of conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and Providence. He conducted the same Spanish scores with much success in a series of guest appearances in New York last season. The Spanish musician began his career as violin virtuoso of great brilliance, and is remembered by some as concertmaster of this orchestra, following Franz Kneisel in the season of 1903-4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD
JAN 13 1929

BOSTON IS STILL HUB OF MUSIC

Symphony Hall Continues to Rest Proudly on Its Four Walls.

By GEORGE SMITH
Music Critic of The Syracuse Herald

THE very word "Boston" is practically certain to call up pictures in our minds. To some it immediately suggests Beacon Hill, the Common, Trinity Church, and Harvard. To others there appear fabulous visions of well browned Baked Beans, or of sea-food dinners fresh from Cape Cod. To those who enjoy the more exact arrangement of our more modern American cities, there may arise a painful remembrance of crooked streets, paths always bringing the bewildered visitor back to Scollay Square with a sort of pitiless certainty.

Strangers holding such pleasantly romantic pictures in their minds' eyes would be somewhat non-plussed to see the city of their particular dreams today. They might find that there are Bostonians of several years residence who are only dimly aware that Beacon Street has an internationally broadcast legend; many of these present-day citizens will clamly tell you that Beacon Street is that street which crosses Commonwealth Avenue at Kenmore Subway Station. Thousands of its busy denizens flitter across Boston Common without a passing thought for the ground they tramp. And as for baked beans in a Boston restaurant! they are as prevalent as chop suey in Hong Kong, from all accounts.

THE old byways, in the old section, are, to be sure, tortuously enough arranged, but the new Boston is spacious, regular, "New Yorkish," and all suits the ladies who use it as a background for clothes of the vintage 1904. It may safely be said that for a person engaged in a research study of millinery of the past, this charming city is without peer as hunting ground. The hats, to say the least, go back many years. Some of the younger generation succeed with appalling accuracy in resembling their grandparents.

Boston is not without theaters. To name a few of the legitimate playhouses we might cite: The theaters Plymouth, Hollis, Wilbur, Colonial, Tremont, Copley, Repertory, Schubert, Majestic. There are motion picture palaces, great and small, without count. But the inhabitants of this extraordinary city, once notable for its enthusiastic reception of Shaw plays, go quietly and decorously to renderings of such nursery-room playlets as "Charley's Aunt"—and consider it a racy bit. Books of the more audacious sort, usually published in naughty New York, are carefully kept away from impressionable Bostonians by discerning and upright censors.

IT IS scarcely necessary to relate that Symphony Hall continues to rest proudly on its four walls bordering Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues. In this solemn building the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds to the baton of the popular and talented M. Koussevitzky. The concerts are attended as ever by loyal patrons who at times are a bit alarmed at the array of Russian music on the programs. Beethoven looks clamly down upon both the Boston families and the Russian pianists from his personal Symphony Hall. Of late, Beethoven has a right to appear satisfied; his music has been royally treated in Symphony Hall. Of late, Beethovan has also witnessed, along with the Boston gentry, the triumphant pianism of M. Horowitz, who, be it said, has stirred the Bostonese to what might fairly be called their very depths.

Recitals continue at a great rate in Jordan Hall, scene of hundreds of debuts. The Peoples Symphony Orchestra plays in the ball-room of the new Hotel Statler, led by Mr. Wendt. The sumptuous opera house (The Boston Opera House) provides the scene for an annual short season of opera, generally given by the Chicago Opera Company—for Boston has no opera company of its own.

76

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CANADA
MAIL & EMPIRE

JAN 12 1929

Music in New York

BY JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON.

New York, Jan. 11.— ith the Philharmonic giving Mahler Lied von der Erde, the Boston Symph y introducing a new pianist in a ne concerto, and the leaderless orchest at it again, things took a step up ard after the musical doldrums of the previous week. The resumption of C men into the repertoire of the Metro itan also added interest, as did t reappearance of La Jeritza in Rosen valier the previous evening, after al e had said on the subject; but of th more later.

Mr. Mengelberg, as as been said before, is bent upon aking America like Mahler whether it ants to or not. Remembering, perhap the timidity with which Wagner s received on this side of the Atlant and the furore he created when once foothold was obtained the Dutch ductor hopes, possibly, to repeat the enomenon. But out alas! Mahler is Wagner and Mengelberg is no old Damrosch. and Mahler does not to be making much of a dent in musical consciousness.

Nevertheless, and no ithstanding, as was said in the stor of Miss Betty Arundale, the perform ce was an impressive one which Me elberg gave of Mahler's Lied von der rde, which, for the benefit of those u miliar with it, is a longish symphony with solo parts for contralto and ten suggested by some Chinese medi on on Life, Death, the Seasons an what not. The soloists in the preser instance were Margaret Matzenauer, ontralto of the Metropolitan, and Richa Crooks, tenor not of the Metropol n. Especially notable was Mme. Ma enauer's singing of the contralto sec ns. As someone said of her in ra, when she comes on the stage, know someone is there. This qu y of personality extends to Mm Matzenauer's concert singing as well, nd very beautiful was all she did with Mahler's work. Admirers of Mr. rooks' singing, Edo, must have found uch that gave them pleasur ge con- ducting, s to say was done w the direction of a the pair of concerts of the Bos- Symphony Kousse vitzky pro- vided interesting programs, giving at the second the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven and Ravel's rather dull La Valse. At the first, the Unfinished of Schubert was played, Handel's B Minor Concerto Grosso, Carpenter's Skyscrapers Suite with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lauther as soloists. At both concerts Jesus Sanroma, pianist, was heard in Toch's Concerto, a novelty.

Naturally, Mr. Sanroma and the Toch work are the apices of interest. One may take for granted that the two symphonies were impeccably given, as well as Mr. Carpenter's highly-contrasting work, and that of Mr. Handel; also, if Mr. Koussevitzky will play the Ravel Valse at all, he played it well.

The Toch Concerto is some three years old and after two or three hearings in various music centres of Europe, it was one of the admired numbers at the Congress of Cacophony at Frankfort in 1927. The work is lengthy, almost of symphonic length, and besides a piano part of Herculean proportions and difficulties, utilizes an immense orchestra. Not the least feat in the performances was the team-work between soloist and conductor. Mr. Sanroma is said to have studied the work with the composer, which accounts for his very obvious familiarity with the score, as well as with his solo parts.

The Concerto leaves one with a curious galvanized feeling. It is all so rapid, so sharply cut with a quality of steel about it. There is no sentimentality, no romanticism. It is all power, brilliancy, the efficiency of metal, metal with a sardonic sense of humor, if such a thing were possible. One could never lie back with closed eyes during a performance, as in the Schumann A Minor, or the Tchaikovsky, or the Rubinstein. You have to keep sitting up and taking notice. Just by this much one is left fatigued.

Mr. Sanroma's performance was magnificent in every way. His technique was more than equal to the difficulties encountered, and it must be supposed that hsi interpretation was an authentic one. By way of contrast, and probably in order to show that his talents were not confined to ultra modern things, Mr. Sanroma played the Schumann A Minor Concerto at a concert in Brooklyn between his two performances of the Toch in Manhattan. Unfortunately, the writer was unable to attend this concert.

With regard to the concert by t Leaderless Orchestra, or the A ially called, must be recorded that their p rmance was a improvement upon the previous one. he program included the Jupiter Sy phony of Mozart, Tchaikovsky's "Ro o and Juliet" and the Prokofieff Pia Concerto played by Paul Sassievitch who acts as concert master for the Ensemble.

The hypothesis the conductorless orchestra still seem to beg the question. Doubtless it members, freed from the stigma of ving to follow the leadership of anyo play with their souls unfettered in mood which the musicians under the ateful domination of Mr. Koussevitzk or Mr. Gabrilowitsch never feel. his is true, however, results would m to prove that the unfettering of so uch soul-stuff at one time is not an mitigated blessing musica'ly speak g, that is. The Ensemble plays we but it cannot honestly be said to ave any soaring quality of brilliance shading which the best personally- conducted orchestras do not exhibit. Perhaps the evocations of one soul neutralize those of another. It might easily happen, this way. So far as can yet be seen, the only thing in its favor is that it saves the salary of a nductor, but one suspects that this amount, however small or large, is st ightway swallowed up in extra rehears s. Who knows?

Mr. Sassievitch been heard before. He appeared with some orchestra or other, within the last few years, as a double-barrelled soloist, playing a piano concerto a a violin ditto. He did well with th Prokofieff, which is not an easy wo under any circumstances, and it ust be said that the orchestra gave h careful and musicianly support.

The Schubert morial gave its second concert, br ging forth Isabelle Yakovsky, pianis in the Tchaikovsky Concerto, and G ham Harris, conductor, in the Brah C Minor Symphony.

How they do go on, these young things; Hardene symphonic angels of years of experie e put off the shoes from their feet efore attempting this Brahms Symphe y, and only an artist with the matu y which Life alone can give, can br forth what is in the Tchaikovsky. T results in this case were what migh have been expected, good, even exce nt performances, but nothing to write ome about. Mr. Harris has had a lo of experience and is even now gettin some more, conducting one of the motion picture orchestras here, can this help him with his mighty hms? And does one swallow in Carne Hall make a symphonic summer? e wonders.

At the Metropoli h La Jeritza did the handsome thing, a although she had not sung "Ros nkavalier" for four years and had no costume s here, and though she was booked for the first "Carmen" of the season the following day at the matinee, she vol teered to fill in for Grete Stueckgold, who was still ill, and thus save the ma agement from having to substitute ano er opera. They had had to do this night before when Ponselle was u able to appear in "Norma."

Octavian still sees La Jeritza's handpiest part, for in this role alone of all she has played at the Metropolitan does she have a chance to show her superlative abilities as a comedienne. And who, among all who have sung it, can look as she looks at her entrance in the second act with the silver rose? Her work throughout this performance was of a high order and reflected great credit upon her. Florence Easton, as the Feldmarschallin, repeated her splendid characterization, and sang even better than usual.

Another substitute in the cast was Queena Mario, who ar e from a sick bed to sing Editha Fl cher's role of Sophie, a role which fo merly was her own property. Miss M rio obviously saved her voice in the s cond act, but in the third sang with her accustomed beauty of tone. Richard Mayr's Baron Ochs was indifferent, as usual. He is the least satisfactory singer heard to date in the part.

The following day La Jeritza sang "Carmen" at the matinee. It is not her best part, nor even her second best, but it has improved since last season. Martinelli was the Jose, and in the third act the two fought with pretty fightings that threatened to become serious. Queena Mario again substituted, this time for Lucrezia Bori as Micaela, and won rounds of applause for her Prayer.

It was a week of substitutions. Instead of "Norma" on Thursday, "Aida" was sung, with Jacobo in the part, though why this singer was not put into Miss Ponselle's role in "Norma" and the opera let to stay, is the management's affair. Miss Jacobo knows "Norma," and, as a matter of fact, made her first American appearance in the role several years back at the Manhattan Opera House. The night before that flu played the deuce with things. "Walkuere" was the opera, with Easton as Bruennhilde and Stueckgold as Sieglinde, while Matzenauer was cast for Fricka, Mme. Stueckgold being still hors de combat, Mme. Easton sang her part. Mme. Matzenauer sang Mme. Easton's part, and Julia Claussen was pressed into service to substitute for Mme. Matzenauer as Fricka.

An impressario's life is not a happy one!

EDMUND ABBEY,

one of the popular artists of the New Empire Company. Mr. Abbey will play an important role in "Too Much Family," Harry Delf's comedy, which will be enacted in Toronto for the first time next week at the Empire Theatre.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 12 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

In establishing the orchestra in 1881, Mr. Higginson wished to add interest and stimulation by securing a more romantic and exotic figure as conductor. George Henschel, then a versatile composer, had just made a spectacular appearance at a concert of the Harvard Musical association, Higginson was amazed by the effects that Henschel achieved from the orchestra, approached him with an offer to lead the new organization. He made a tremendous success and created a profound impression, and as time went on, the concerts grew steadily in popularity.

Gericke was ideally fitted to carry on. He was a drill master, whose insatiable desire for perfection was only equalled by his foresight in obtaining it. Following the classical period of Mr. Gericke, came the romantic ones of Nikish and Pauer. The former found a body of musicians at his disposal exquisitely trained and perfected in their technique. Emil Paur succeeded him. Again brilliance and energy held the stage. Dr. Karl Muck, by special permission of the German emperor, was taken from the conductorship of the Royal Opera House in Berlin. To many he represents the peak of musicianship and the perfection of the art of conducting. Of Max Fiedler, another fine musician it is hard to speak adequately. Rabaud, the French composer took the reins for a single season, to be succeeded by Pierre Monteaux. Koussevitzky came next. His dynamic personality and the dramatic power swept all before him. To the old ones Koussevitzky brought daring ideas which have had the undeniable effect of stimulating renewed interest in the classics. Tickets for the Hartford concert February 3, on sale at McCoy's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

JAN 12 1929

NOTED SPANIARD TO CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

A program featuring notable contemporary Spanish music is announced by E. Fernandez Arbos, the celebrated Spanish conductor, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as guest, at its second Providence concert, in the Albee theatre, next Tuesday evening. Mr. Arbos will open the evening with Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and also perform the symphony of Joseph Haydn in G-major. The latter part of the program will consist of Spanish music, in the performance of which Arbos holds a special reputation. This will include two numbers, "Triana" and "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," from the piano suite, "Iberia" by Albeniz, which Mr. Arbos has arranged for orchestra. There will also be three dances from de Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat"), and Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1929

Arbos Prepares Program for Symphony Orchestra

The program will be as follows at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, in the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening.

E. Ferandez Arbos, celebrated Spanish conductor, will open the evening with Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and also perform the Symphony of Joseph Haydn, in G major (B. & H. No 13). The latter part of the programme will consist of Spanish music, in the performance of which Arbos holds a special reputation. This will include two numbers—"Triana" and "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," from the Piano Suite, "Iberia" by Albeniz, which Mr. Arbos has arranged for orchestra. There will also be three dances from de Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three Cornered Hat"), and Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso."

Arbos arrived in America last Tuesday on his special trip here for the purpose of conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and Providence. He conducted the same Spanish scores with much success in a series of guest appearances in New York last season. The Spanish musician began his career as violin virtuoso of great brilliance, and is remembered by some as concertmaster of this orchestra, following Franz Kneisel in the season of 1903-4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

JAN 13 1929

BOSTON IS STILL HUB OF MUSIC

Symphony Hall Continues to Rest Proudly on Its Four Walls.

By GEORGE SMITH
Music Critic of The Syracuse Harald

THE very word "Boston" is practically certain to call up pictures in our minds. To some it immediately suggests Beacon Hill, the Common, Trinity Church, and Harvard. To others there appear fabulous visions of well browned Baked Beans, or of sea-food dinners fresh from Cape Cod. To those who enjoy the more exact arrangement of our more modern American cities, there may arise a painful remembrance of crooked streets, paths always bringing the bewildered visitor back to Scollay Square with a sort of pitiless certainty.

Strangers holding such pleasantly romantic pictures in their minds' eyes would be somewhat non-plussed to see the city of their particular dreams today. They might find that there are Bostonians of several years residence who are only dimly aware that Beacon Street has an internationally broadcast legend; many of these present-day citizens will clamly tell you that Beacon Street is that street which crosses Commonwealth Avenue at Kenmore Subway Station. Thousands of its busy denizens flitter across Boston Common without a passing thought for the ground they tramp. And as for baked beans in a Boston restaurant! they are as prevalent as chop suey in Hong Kong, from all accounts.

THE old byways, in the old section, are, to be sure, tortuously enough arranged, but the new Boston is spacious, regular, "New Yorkish," and all suits the ladies who use it as a background for clothes of the vintage 1904. It may safely be said that for a person engaged in a research study of millinery of the past, this charming city is without peer as hunting ground. The hats, to say the least, go back many years. Some of the younger generation succeed with appalling accuracy in resembling their grandparents.

Boston is not without theaters. To name a few of the legitimate playhouses we might cite: The theaters Plymouth, Hollis, Wilbur, Colonial, Tremont, Copley, Repertory, Schubert, Majestic. There are motion picture palaces, great and small, without count. But the inhabitants of this extraordinary city, once notable for its enthusiastic reception of Shaw plays, go quietly and decorously to renderings of such nursery-room playlets as "Charley's Aunt"—and consider it a racy bit. Books of the more audacious sort, usually published in naughty New York, are carefully kept away from impressionable Bostonians by discerning and upright censors.

IT IS scarcely necessary to relate that Symphony Hall continues to rest proudly on its four walls bordering Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues. In this solemn building the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds forth under the baton of the popular and talented M. Koussevitzky. The concerts are attended as ever by loyal patrons who at times are a bit alarmed at the array of Russian music on the programs. Beethoven looks clamly down upon both the Boston families and the Russian pianists from his personal Symphony Hall. Of late, Beethoven has a right to appear satisfied; his music has been royally treated in Symphony Hall. Of late, Beethovan has also witnessed, along with the Boston gentry, the triumphant pianism of M. Horowitz, who, be it said, has stirred the Bostonese to what might fairly be called their very depths.

Recitals continue at a great rate in Jordan Hall, scene of hundreds of debuts. The Peoples Symphony Orchestra plays in the ball-room of the new Hotel Statler, led by Mr. Wendt. The sumptuous opera house (The Boston Opera House) provides the scene for an annual short season of opera, generally given by the Chicago Opera Company—for Boston has no opera company of its own.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1929

Mengelberg Ends Season Here; Honegger Leads Two Concerts

Willem Mengelberg will close his season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this week, conducting a concert at the Metropolitan Opera House this afternoon and the Thursday night and Friday afternoon pair at Carnegie Hall, bidding farewell to the subscribers to these three series with Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," which Strauss dedicated to him and his Amsterdam orchestra, the Concertgebouw. The Dutch conductor sails Friday midnight on the Majestic to resume his direction of the latter organization.

Scipione Guidi, concertmaster of the Philharmonic-Symphony, and Hans Lange, assistant concertmaster, will be the soloists on Thursday and Friday in Bach's concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra. In his other capacity of assistant conductor Mr. Lange will lead the Philharmonic-Symphony in the students' concert next Saturday night and the concert of next Sunday afternoon, January 20, both at Carnegie Hall, in Brahms's fourth symphony. The rest of these concerts will be devoted to compositions of Arthur Honegger, who will make his New York debut as concertmaster.

For the conservative "Pastorale d'Ete" Mr. Honegger has substituted as his first number one of his latest works, "Rugby," first heard in Paris last fall and introduced to America last Friday by Mr. Honegger with the Boston Symphony. The second number, a concertino for piano and orchestra, in which the composer's wife, Andree Vaurabourg, will be the soloist, is also new to New York, though it has been heard in Cincinnati and Boston.

According to an article by the French critic, Henry Prunieres, published in "The New York Times," Honegger, who is a sport fan, told a sports writer that when looking at a football game he felt the musical equivalent of the feelings aroused and could visualize an orchestral piece expressing them. The sports writer forthwith announced that Honegger was working on a piece named "Rugby" and, while the composer had not thought of doing so, he began to consider the idea, and wrote the piece at the request of the new Paris Symphonic Orchestra for its first concert, under Ansermet. "Abrupt, broken, syncopated rhythms marvelously express the feeling of frustrated effort we experience on seeing a Rugby game," wrote M. Prunieres. Mr. Honegger, on his arrival here, said that the work had won him considerable publicity in the French sporting press and had been played recently between the halves of the France-England international Rugby match at Paris.

Mr. Honegger will conclude his program with his well known "Pacific 231."

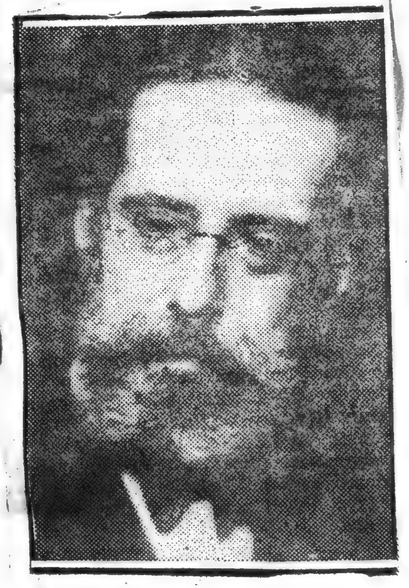
Arturo Toscanini was to have begun his half of the Philharmonic-Symphony season next week, but, tired by his season at La Scala, in Milan, which included special activities to celebrate his thirtieth year at that opera house, he has put off his arrival to February 14 and his first concerts to Thursday night and Friday afternoon, February 21-22. Who will act as guest conductors for the intervening twelve concerts has not yet been announced. There are a number of conductors active in this country at the moment, but, as two orchestras, the Detroit and St. Louis Symphonies, are having entire seasons under guest conductors, and many of the others are having guest leaders for part of their seasons, the delay in Mr. Toscanini's arrival offers Arthur Judson no slight problem.

According to the revised schedule, Mr. Toscanini will conduct twenty-seven Philharmonic-Symphony subscription concerts in Manhattan and two in Brooklyn from February 21 to April 14.

Enrique Fernandez Arbos, the Spanish conductor, who appeared as a guest last season with the New York Symphony, arrived last week for an American visit, which includes four weeks with the St. Louis Symphony, four concerts with the Detroit Symphony and a week with the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1929

Enrique Fernandez Arbos



Celebrated Spanish conductor will officiate at next Tuesday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 13 1929

Studies Orchestral Score— Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear in concert at the City Auditorium this month, gives intense study daily to proper interpretation of the great instrumental classics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 13 1929

Music Notes

Noted Spanish Conductor and Spanish Music Feature Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Tuesday Night.—Other Programs of Week. Roland Hayes on Spirituals.

In Segovia last night and E. Fernandez Arbos, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre, Providence is having a somewhat concentrated Spanish wave not only in music but in that country's eminent musical personalities.

Though the Symphony's program is not so near all-Spanish as was first intimated—it had to await Mr. Arbos's arrival in this country last week for final adjustment—there are interesting examples of Spain's modern awakening in the musical world. There are Albeniz's "Iberia" suite and three dances from De Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" or "The Three-Cornered Hat." Then there will be a Spanish number by the Frenchman, Ravel, "Alborada del Grazioso."

Mr. Arbos has a special reputation for the performance of Spanish works and during his career as a conductor has brought much of his countrymen's music to the orchestral stage. The Albeniz suite, originally a work for the piano, Mr. Arbos transcribed for orchestra. It is a sort of Spanish panorama and considered the most important of Albeniz's piano compositions. From it Arbos will present two movements, "Fete Dieu a Seville" and "Triana."

From De Falla's ballet three dances have been selected, "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller" and "Final Dance." The action of the ballet is taken from a Spanish tale by Pedro de Alaracon, which had served previously as the basis for Hugo Wolf's single opera, "Der Corregidor." This Corregidor, the wearer of the three-cornered hat as badge of office, is a petty, pompous magistrate of a Spanish village, and an elderly amorist as well. Brilliant and straightforward, as critics have called it, the music tells its own story. The three dances, by the way, were introduced hereabouts by Mr. Monteux.

If the late 19th and 20th centuries have witnessed indisputably a gradual disappearance of the truly great from the sphere of musical composition, these periods have, for compensation, seen a recrudence of musical activity in countries long moribund in this respect, such as Spain and England, together with an emancipation in Italy from the thralldom of the opera house.

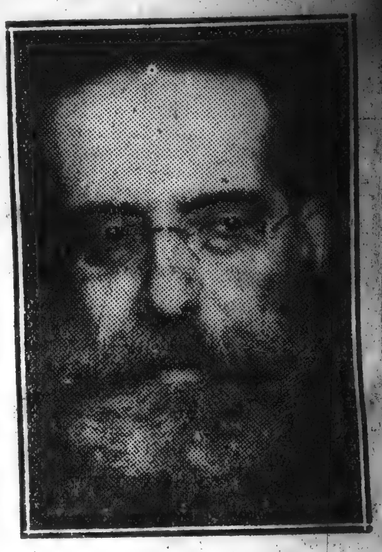
The first of the present-day crop of Spanish composers of note was Isaac Albeniz (1861-1909), a musician of French and Germain training, but of strongly patriotic leanings. Though he wrote an oratorio and some orchestral pieces, Albeniz was chiefly active as composer for the pianoforte and as such has long been represented liberally on recital programs. Manual de Falla is an outstanding figure among the living music-makers of Spain. Mr. Arbos has become a sort of apostle of them and others among the newer Spanish composers.

He conducted some Spanish scores with much success in a series of guest appearances in New York last season and is making a special trip to the United States this season to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence and Boston.

Mr. Arbos is no stranger to this part of the country nor to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1903 he followed Franz Kneisel as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony for a season; and played now and then a solo violinist. He began his career as a violin virtuoso but of late years has devoted himself to orchestral conducting in which he has gained renown and is considered by common consent the most eminent among Spanish wielders of the baton.

In addition to hearing his famed interpretations of Spanish music the audience at the Symphony will have a demonstration of what he can do with Wagner, in the "Meistersinger" prelude, and Haydn, in the G-major Symphony, No. 13. The symphony has been played by Mr. Koussevitzky in practically every city in which the orchestra has appeared except Providence. The first of a second set of symphonies, it was written in 1787. Haydn's first set of six was written for a society in Paris known as the "Concert de la Loge Olympique." The symphonies got such names as "The Bear," "The Hen," "The Queen of France."

The Haydn Symphony will close the first half of the program which is arranged as follows: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg," Wagner; Symphony in G-major (Breitkopf and Hartel, No. 13), Haydn, Adagio, Allegro; Largo; Menuetto. Trio; Finale, Allegro con spirito. Suite, "Iberia" (arranged for orchestra by Arbos), Albeniz, "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," "Triana;" three dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos," ballet, de Falla, "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller," "Final Dance;" "Alborada del Grazioso," Ravel.



E. Fernandez Arbos
Who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 13 1929

Critic Praises Work of Leader Koussevitzky

Will Conduct the Boston Symphony in Concert Here End of Month

That Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be heard at the City Auditorium on January 29, is one of the world's foremost musicians is the opinion of Alfred H. Meyer, critic of the Boston Transcript, expressed in the current issue of the Phonograph Monthly Review. Mr. Meyer said: "To see genius at work one need only to go to Boston's Symphony Hall when the orchestra is giving its concerts whose leadership is in the hands of a true genius in the art of conducting—Serge Koussevitzky."

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here marks the third attraction in the artists' course of five concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer, seats for which are now obtainable at the box office at Walter D. Moses and Company.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has always believed in the power of music to make its appeal to the masses," continued Mr. Meyer. "But the music in his opinion, must be the best of music and must be superlatively performed. He is thus dead set against the idea of 'playing down' to the masses in order gradually to 'educate' them. With his own orchestra he was able to perform experiments, putting to the test his convictions. In the summer of 1909 he chartered a steamer plying the Volga, embarked with his Russian orchestra, and gave concerts in the river towns. The scheme proved so successful that it was repeated each summer until Mr. Koussevitzky came to America in 1924."

This conductor goes to Paris each summer where he gives a series of concerts. Mrs. Wilson-Greene was in the audience at one of them last season and she has declared that Mr. Koussevitzky is quite as popular there as he is in Boston, where he has been asked to head the orchestra for the remainder of his active career.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 13 1929

Boston Symphony Concert February 3

In establishing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, Mr. Higginson, while deciding to employ as musicians those already living in Boston, wished to add interest and stimulation by securing a more romantic and exotic figure as conductor. George Henschel, then a young man of versatile musicianship, a composer, singer, conductor, had just made a spectacular appearance at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association, where he had conducted his own concert overture.

Higginson, in common with many others, was amazed by the effects that Henschel achieved from the orchestra, and immediately approached him with an offer to lead the new organization. He made a tremendous success and created a profund impression, and as time went on, the concerts grew steadily in popularity.

Wilhelm Gericke was ideally fitted to carry on. He was a drill master, whose insatible desire for perfection was only equalled by his foresight in obtaining it. His comment when he first came, "There are some musicians, but it is hardly an orchestra!" was no longer true when he left at the end of five seasons. Following the classical period of Mr. Gericke, came the romantic ones of Nikish and Pauer. The former found a body of musicians at his disposal exquisitely trained and perfected in their technique. A poet, a rhapsodist by nature, Mr. Nikish had an instrument by which he could give full expression to the emotional imagination.

Emil Paur succeeded him. Again brilliance and energy held the stage. Pauer substituted a "dramatic intensity" that found high favor with his audience and critics. Dr. Karl Muck, by special permission of the German Emperor, was taken from the conductorship of the Royal Opera House in Berlin. To many he represents the peak of musicianship and the perfection of the art of conducting. A man of broader sweep of mind and imagination, he went beyond Gericke in his capacity for expression, while still keeping the same powerful grip on the technical abilities and training of the orchestra.

Of Max Fiedler, another fine musician, it is hard to speak adequately. Rabaud, the French composer took the reins for a single season, to be succeeded by Pierre Monteaux, and through his sturdy labors, his polished and graceful bearing won a deep respect and the friendship of all who heard him.

Koussevitzky came next. His dynamic personality and the dramatic power swept all before him. There were new works to be sure, but not so comprehensible after all, while to the old ones Koussevitzky brought new and daring ideas and readings, which have had the undeniable effect of stimulating renewed interest in the classics.

Tickets for the Hartford concert February 3, are on sale at McCoy's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1929

Mengelberg Ends Season Here; Honegger Leads Two Concerts

Willem Mengelberg will close his season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this week, conducting a concert at the Metropolitan Opera House this afternoon and the Thursday night and Friday afternoon pair at Carnegie Hall, bidding farewell to the subscribers to these three series with Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," which Strauss dedicated to him and his Amsterdam orchestra, the Concertgebouw. The Dutch conductor sails Friday midnight on the Majestic to resume his direction of the latter organization.

Scipione Guidi, concertmaster of the Philharmonic-Symphony, and Hans Lange, assistant concertmaster, will be the soloists on Thursday and Friday in Bach's concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra. In his other capacity of assistant conductor Mr. Lange will lead the Philharmonic-Symphony in the students' concert next Saturday night and the concert of next Sunday afternoon, January 20, both at Carnegie Hall, in Brahms's fourth symphony. The rest of these concerts will be devoted to compositions of Arthur Honegger, who will make his New York debut as concertmaster.

For the conservative "Pastorale d'Ete" Mr. Honegger has substituted as his first number one of his latest works, "Rugby," first heard in Paris last fall and introduced to America last Friday by Mr. Honegger with the Boston Symphony. The second number, a concertino for piano and orchestra, in which the composer's wife, Andree Vaurabourg, will be the soloist, is also new to New York, though it has been heard in Cincinnati and Boston.

According to an article by the French critic, Henry Prunieres, published in "The New York Times," Honegger, who is a sport fan, told a sports writer that when looking at a football game he felt the musical equivalent of the feelings aroused and could visualize an orchestral piece expressing them. The sports writer forthwith announced that Honegger was working on a piece named "Rugby" and, while the composer had not thought of doing so, he began to consider the idea, and wrote the piece at the request of the new Paris Symphonic Orchestra for its first concert, under Ansermet. "Abrupt, broken, syncopated rhythms marvelously express the feeling of frustrated effort we experience on seeing a Rugby game," wrote M. Prunieres. Mr. Honegger, on his arrival here, said that the work had won him considerable publicity in the French sporting press and had been played recently between the halves of the France-England international Rugby match at Paris.

Mr. Honegger will conclude his program with his well known "Pacific 231."

Arturo Toscanini was to have begun his half of the Philharmonic-Symphony season next week, but, tired by his season at La Scala, in Milan, which included special activities to celebrate his thirtieth year at that opera house, he has put off his arrival to February 14 and his first concerts to Thursday night and Friday afternoon, February 21-22. Who will act as guest conductors for the intervening twelve concerts has not yet been announced. There are a number of conductors active in this country at the moment, but, as two orchestras, the Detroit and St. Louis Symphonies, are having entire seasons under guest conductors, and many of the others are having guest leaders for part of their seasons, the delay in Mr. Toscanini's arrival offers Arthur Judson no slight problem.

According to the revised schedule, Mr. Toscanini will conduct twenty-seven Philharmonic-Symphony subscription concerts in Manhattan and two in Brooklyn from February 21 to April 14.

Enrique Fernandez Arbos, the Spanish conductor, who appeared as a guest last season with the New York Symphony, arrived last week for an American visit, which includes four weeks with the St. Louis Symphony, four concerts with the Detroit Symphony and a week with the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1929

Enrique Fernandez Arbos

Celebrated Spanish conductor will officiate at next Tuesday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 13 1929

Studies Orchestral Score— Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear in concert at the City Auditorium this month, gives intense study daily to proper interpretation of the great instrumental classics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 13 1929

Music Notes

Noted Spanish Conductor and Spanish Music Feature Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Tuesday Night.—Other Programs of Week. Roland Hayes on Spirituals.

In Segovia last night and E. Fernandez Arbos, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre, Providence is having a somewhat concentrated Spanish wave not only in music but in that country's eminent musical personalities.

Though the Symphony's program is not so near all-Spanish as was first intimated—it had to await Mr. Arbos's arrival in this country last week for final adjustment—there are interesting examples of Spain's modern awakening in the musical world. There are Albeniz's "Iberia" suite and three dances from De Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" or "The Three-Cornered Hat." Then there will be a Spanish number by the Frenchman, Ravel, "Alborada del Grazioso."

Mr. Arbos has a special reputation for the performance of Spanish works and during his career as a conductor has brought much of his countrymen's music to the orchestral stage. The Albeniz suite, originally a work for the piano, Mr. Arbos transcribed for orchestra. It is a sort of Spanish panorama and considered the most important of Albeniz's piano compositions. From it Arbos will present two movements, "Fete Dieu a Seville" and "Triana."

From De Falla's ballet three dances have been selected, "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller" and "Final Dance." The action of the ballet is taken from a Spanish tale by Pedro de Alaracon, which had served previously as the basis for Hugo Wolf's single opera, "Der Corregidor." This Corregidor, the wearer of the three-cornered hat as badge of office, is a petty, pompous magistrate of a Spanish village, and an elderly amorist as well. Brilliant and straightforward, as critics have called it, the music tells its own story. The three dances, by the way, were introduced hereabouts by Mr. Monteux.

If the late 19th and 20th centuries have witnessed indisputably a gradual disappearance of the truly great from the sphere of musical composition, these periods have, for compensation, seen a recrudence of musical activity in countries long moribund in this respect, such as Spain and England, together with an emancipation in Italy from the thralldom of the opera house.

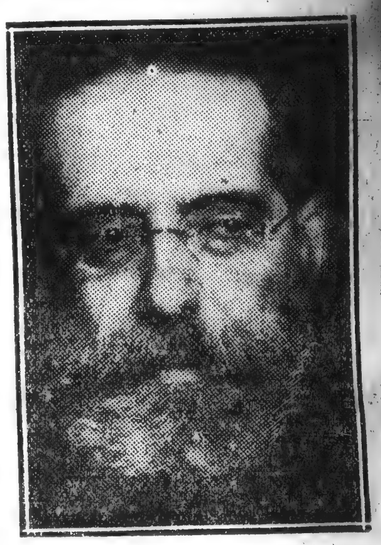
The first of the present-day crop of Spanish composers of note was Isaac Albeniz (1861-1909), a musician of French and Germain training, but of strongly patriotic leanings. Though he wrote an oratorio and some orchestral pieces, Albeniz was chiefly active as composer for the pianoforte and as such has long been represented liberally on recital programs. Manual de Falla is an outstanding figure among the living music-makers of Spain. Mr. Arbos has become a sort of apostle of them and others among the newer Spanish composers.

He conducted some Spanish scores with much success in a series of guest appearances in New York last season and is making a special trip to the United States this season to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence and Boston.

Mr. Arbos is no stranger to this part of the country nor to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1903 he followed Franz Kneisel as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony for a season; and played now and then a solo violinist. He began his career as a violin virtuoso but of late years has devoted himself to orchestral conducting in which he has gained renown and is considered by common consent the most eminent among Spanish wielders of the baton.

In addition to hearing his famed interpretations of Spanish music the audience at the Symphony will have a demonstration of what he can do with Wagner, in the "Meistersinger" prelude, and Haydn, in the G-major Symphony, No. 13. The symphony has been played by Mr. Koussevitzky in practically every city in which this orchestra has appeared except Providence. The first of a second set of symphonies, it was written in 1787. Haydn's first set of six was written for a society in Paris known as the "Concert de la Loge Olympique." The symphonies got such names as "The Bear," "The Hen," "The Queen of France."

The Haydn Symphony will close the first half of the program which is arranged as follows: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg," Wagner; Symphony in G-major (Breitkoph and Hartel, No. 13), Haydn. Adagio, Allegro; Largo; Menuetto. Trio; Finale, Allegro con spirito. Suite, "Iberia" (arranged for orchestra by Arbos), Albeniz, "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," "Triana;" three dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos," ballet, de Falla, "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller," "Final Dance;" "Alborada del Grazioso," Ravel.



E. Fernandez Arbos
Who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 13 1929

Critic Praises Work of Leader Koussevitzky

Will Conduct the Boston Symphony in Concert Here End of Month

That Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be heard at the City Auditorium on January 29, is one of the world's foremost musicians is the opinion of Alfred H. Meyer, critic of the Boston Transcript, expressed in the current issue of the Phonograph Monthly Review. Mr. Meyer said: "To see genius at work one need only to go to Boston's Symphony Hall when the orchestra is giving its concerts whose leadership is in the hands of a true genius in the art of conducting—Serge Koussevitzky."

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here marks the third attraction in the artists' course of five concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer, seats for which are now obtainable at the box office at Walter D. Moses and Company.

"Mr. Koussevitzky has always believed in the power of music to make its appeal to the masses," continued Mr. Meyer. "But the music in his opinion, must be the best of music and must be superlatively performed. He is thus dead set against the idea of 'playing down' to the masses in order gradually to 'educate' them. With his own orchestra he was able to perform experiments, putting to the test his convictions. In the summer of 1909 he chartered a steamer plying the Volga, embarked with his Russian orchestra, and gave concerts in the river towns. The scheme proved so successful that it was repeated each summer until Mr. Koussevitzky came to America in 1924."

This conductor goes to Paris each summer where he gives a series of concerts. Mrs. Wilson-Greene was in the audience at one of them last season and she has declared that Mr. Koussevitzky is quite as popular there as he is in Boston, where he has been asked to head the orchestra for the remainder of his active career.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 13 1929

Boston Symphony Concert February 3

In establishing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, Mr. Higginson, while deciding to employ as musicians those already living in Boston, wished to add interest and stimulation by securing a more romantic and exotic figure as conductor. George Henschel, then a young man of versatile musicianship, a composer, singer, conductor, had just made a spectacular appearance at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association, where he had conducted his own concert overture.

Higginson, in common with many others, was amazed by the effects that Henschel achieved from the orchestra, and immediately approached him with an offer to lead the new organization. He made a tremendous success and created a profund impression, and as time went on, the concerts grew steadily in popularity.

Wilhelm Gericke was ideally fitted to carry on. He was a drill master, whose insatible desire for perfection was only equalled by his foresight in obtaining it. His comment when he first came, "There are some musicians, but it is hardly an orchestra!" was no longer true when he left at the end of five seasons. Following the classical period of Mr. Gericke, came the romantic ones of Nikish and Pauer. The former found a body of musicians at his disposal exquisitely trained and perfected in their technique. A poet, a rhapsodist by nature, Mr. Nikish had an instrument by which he could give full expression to the emotional imagination.

Emil Paur succeeded him. Again brilliance and energy held the stage. Pauer substituted a "dramatic intensity" that found high favor with his audience and critics. Dr. Karl Muck, by special permission of the German Emperor, was taken from the conductorship of the Royal Opera House in Berlin. To many he represents the peak of musicianship and the perfection of the art of conducting. A man of broader sweep of mind and imagination, he went beyond Gericke in his capacity for expression, while still keeping the same powerful grip on the technical abilities and training of the orchestra.

Of Max Fiedler, another fine musician, it is hard to speak adequately. Rabaud, the French composer took the reins for a single season, to be succeeded by Pierre Monteaux, and through his sturdy labors, his polished and graceful bearing won a deep respect and the friendship of all who heard him.

Koussevitzky came next. His dynamic personality and the dramatic power swept all before him. There were new works to be sure, but not so comprehensible after all, while to the old ones Koussevitzky brought new and daring ideas and readings, which have had the undeniable effect of stimulating renewed interest in the classics.

Tickets for the Hartford concert February 3, are on sale at McCoy's.

78

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
JAN 13 1929

Music Steps Forward In New York

Active And Interesting Events Follow Doldrums Which Overcast Season Earlier

Philharmonic, Leaderless Orchestra And Jeritza's Singing At Metropolitan Provide High Spots

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON
Special Correspondence.
NEW YORK.

WITH the Philharmonic giving Mahler's Lied von der Erde, the Boston Symphony introduced a new pianist in a new concerto, and the leaderless orchestra at it again, things took a step upward after the musical doldrums of the previous week. The resumption of Carmen into the repertoire of the Metropolitan also added interest, as did the reappearance of La Jeritza in Rosenkavalier the previous evening, after all she had said on the subject, but of this more later.

Mr. Mengelberg, as has been said before, is bent upon making Americ like Mahler whether it wants to or not. Remembering, perhaps, the timidity with which Wagner was received on this side of the Atlantic and the furor he created when once a foothold was obtained, the Dutch conductor hopes possibly to repeat the phenomenon. But alas! Mahler is no Wagner and Mengelberg is no Leopold Damrosch. And Mahler does not seem to be making much of a dent in our musical consciousness.

Nevertheless and notwithstanding, as was said in the story of Miss Betty Arundale, the performance was an impressive one which Mengelberg gave of Mahler's Lied von der Erde, which, for the benefit of those unfamiliar with it, is a longish symphony with solo parts for contralto and tenor, suggested by some Chinese meditation on life, death, the seasons and whatnot. The soloists in the present instance were Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, of the Metropolitan, and Richard Crooks, tenor, not of the Metropolitan.

Especially notable was Mme. Matzenauer's singing of the contralto sections. As some one said of her in opera, when she comes on the stage you know some one is there. This quality of personality extends to Mme. Matzenauer's concert singing as well, and very beautiful was all she did with Mahler's work. Admirers of Mr. Crooks' singing also must have found much that gave them pleasure. Mr. Mengelberg needless to say, with the direction of a true disciple.

Interesting Programs For Boston Symphony

For the pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky provided interesting programs, giving at the second the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven and Ravel's rather dull La Valse. At the first the Unfinished of Schubert was played, Handel's B Minor Concerto Grosso, Carpenter's Skyscrapers Suite, with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lauther as soloists. At both concerts Jesus Sanroma, pianist, was heard in Toch's Concerto, a novelty.

Naturally, Mr. Sanroma and the Toch work are the apices of interest. One may take for granted that the two symphonies were impeccably given, as well as Mr. Carpenter's highly contrasting work, and that of Mr. Handel, also that if Mr. Koussevitzky played the Ravel Valse at all, he played it well.

The Toch Concerto is some three years old and after two or three hearings in various music centers of Europe it was one of the admired numbers at the Congress of Cacophony at Frankfort in 1927. The work is lengthy, almost of symphonic length, and, besides a piano part of Herculean proportions and difficulties, utilizes an immense orchestra. Not the least feat in the performances was the teamwork between soloist and conductor. Mr. Sanroma is said to have studied the work with the composer, which accounts for his very obvious familiarity with the score as well as with his solo parts.

The Concerto leaves one with a curious galvanized feeling. It is all so rapid, so sharply cut with a quality of steel about it. There is no sentimentality, no romanticism. It is all power, brilliancy, the efficiency of metal with a sardonic sense of humor, if such a thing were possible. One could never lie back with closed eyes during a performance as in the Schumann A Minor, or the Rubinstein, or the Tchaikovsky, or the Rubinstein. You have to keep sitting up and taking notice. Just by this much one is left fatigued.

Mr. Sanroma's performance was magnificent in every way. His technique was more than equal to the difficulties encountered, and it must be supposed that his interpretation was an authentic one. By way of contrast, and probably in order to show that his talents were not confined to ultra-modern things, Mr. Sanroma played the Schumann A Minor Concerto at a cooncert in Brooklyn between his two performances of the Toch in Manhattan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
JAN 16 1929

-:- MUSIC -:-

A SPANISH LEADER

It would have been wiser of Senor E. Fernandez Arbos who led the Boston Symphony Orchestra here last night to put the overture from "Die Meistersinger" at the end of his programme instead of at the beginning. In spots the interpretation of Wagner's comic masterpiece was so brilliant that we cannot recall having heard any more brilliant; in spots it was so dull, and the players were so unresponsive, that we have seldom heard anything duller. But whatever we may say of the interpretation, this music was so far ahead as music of anything that followed that we felt like the guest at the feast who was faced with the roast before the hors d'oeuvres..

In his conduting of the overture we noted in Senor Arbos a certain inclination, which was even more emphasized in the Haydn symphony which was the second number on the programme. This was what may be called a pedagogical inclination; we had the unpleasant feeling that Senor Arbos was either inordinately proud of his reading, thus falling into the error of over-emphasizing it, or inordinately anxious as to our ignorance, thus falling into the error of overdoing his willingness to enlighten us.

Senor Arbos introduced the majority of the audience to some Spanish music with which it was not on familiar terms. In his interpretation of these pieces he showed a thoroughly Spanish knowledge of the internal rhythms of dance forms, and he showed also, in one piece especially, his knowledge that in his country. west and east, orientalism and occidentalism, mysticism and realism blend as they do nowhere else.

R. de A. J.

PROV. JOURNAL JAN. 16

Allowing a Glimpse of Iberian Music

Arbos of Madrid, Exponent of the New Spanish School, Brings an Exotic Note in Conducting as Guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Here

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played the second concert of the season, under the direction of E. Fernandez Arbos, the guest-conductor for the occasion at the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Senor Arbos was rather coolly received as he took his place on the stand for the first time, possibly because in appearance he did not meet the requirements of the popular prima donna-conductor of the day; but he grew phenomenally during the performance of the first two numbers, and at the close of the Symphony he received a veritable ovation, audience and orchestra alike

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
JAN 16 1929

Boston Symphony Concert Is Most Delightful

Audience Recalls Senor Arbos, Guest Conductor, Several Times

A delighted audience recalled Maestro E. Fernandez Arbos several times at the conclusion of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Providence season in the E. F. Albee Theater, last night. Senor Arbos, who is director of the Orquesta Sinfonica in Madrid, was the guest conductor. M. Koussevitsky has upon several occasions led the symphony at Madrid.

Senor Arbos, who has taken a leading part in his own country encouraging the development of musical talent and furthering the works of young Spanish modernists, urging them to tune their new conceptions to the rhythm of Spain, is a short man, somewhat shy and without the monumental eccentricities of Sir Henry Beecham that so amused a Providence audience last season. Bearded and haloed by baldness, he did not conform to the type we associate with Spain. But his graciousness and the spell of the music he drew from the ensemble won him the plaudits of the evening before the concert was over.

Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" and Haydn's Symphony in G major were the conventional numbers with which Senor Arbos opened the concert. Every conductor interprets Wagner and Haydn to his heart's desire, reading into them his own creative faculties. Arbos differed from the scholarly Koussevitsky as Koussevitsky differs from the flashy Stokowski. Though there is a difference of opinion as to the worth of the various conductors and composers, according to the individual's own standard, the fact remains that there is a general standard, and Senor Arbos satisfied.

The Spanish numbers particularly pleased the audience.

Two numbers from Albeniz's suite, "Iberia," arranged by Senor Arbos were rich in coloring matter and the tempo and sounds of Spain. Three dances from "The Three Cornered Hat" by Manuel de Falla, the musical idol of Spain, the adopted son of at least four provinces, had a swing and a verve that were delightful. Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso," which the program informs us is impossible of translation, was a typically modernist number, bringing to music that laughing irony, that delicate joshing, which cause many people to believe that the new school is not substantially erected.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 18 1929

Wide Interest Shown In Boston Orchestra

An order has just been received from Hampton, Va., for thirty seats for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the City Auditorium the night of January 29, which indicates the wide interest being created in the visit of this great body of 112 musicians with its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Demands on the box office at Walter D. Moses and Company are such as to show emphatically that the orchestra will be greeted by an audience like the one that welcomed Fritz Kreisler on his recent visit here when the house was completely filled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 18 1929

Boston Symphony

Several numbers of unusual interest and brilliance should make an event of the first significance in the coming concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Capitol Theater, on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

Serge Koussevitzky will present as the principal number on the program Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D-minor," which has been called the greatest symphony of the last half century and certainly the greatest of the French school of music. Cesar Franck, the Belgian composer, filled his masterpiece with imposing sonorities and lyric beauty. The course of the symphony from its slow and mysterious introduction to its exalted close is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of the "organist of St. Clothilde." The middle movement and Allegretto has a beautiful song for the English horn solo and is the first instance of the use of this instrument in a symphony.

Like Bach, Franck was a man of strong faith and like the earlier master, he loved to compose in the seclusion of his organ loft. The orchestral music of both is often suggestive of the organ and this symphony in particular has an organ-like resonance in the stirring course of the brass choir.

Franck's mighty score has taken its permanent place in the repertories of symphony orchestras the world over and he is universally accepted as probably the most glorious affirmation of faith in modern music.

The seat sale is at McCoy's.

78

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
JAN 13 1929

Music Steps Forward In New York

Active And Interesting Events Follow Doldrums Which Overcast Season Earlier

Philharmonic, Leaderless Orchestra And Jeritza's Singing At Metropolitan Provide High Spots

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON
Special Correspondence.
NEW YORK.

WITH the Philharmonic giving Mahler's Lied von der Erde, the Boston Symphony introduced a new pianist in a new concerto, and the leaderless orchestra at it again, things took a step upward after the musical doldrums of the previous week. The resumption of Carmen into the repertoire of the Metropolitan also added interest, as did the reappearance of La Jeritza in Rosenkavalier the previous evening, after all she had said on the subject, but of this more later.

Mr. Mengelberg, as has been said before, is bent upon making Americans like Mahler whether it wants to or not. Remembering, perhaps, the timidity with which Wagner was received on this side of the Atlantic and the furor he created when once a foothold was obtained, the Dutch conductor hopes possibly to repeat the phenomenon. But alas! Mahler is no Wagner and Mengelberg is no Leopold Damrosch. And Mahler does not seem to be making much of a dent in our musical consciousness.

Nevertheless and notwithstanding, as was said in the story of Miss Betty Arundale, the performance was an impressive one which Mengelberg gave of Mahler's Lied von der Erde, which, for the benefit of those unfamiliar with it, is a longish symphony with solo parts for contralto and tenor, suggested by some Chinese meditation on life, death, the seasons and whatnot. The soloists in the present instance were Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, of the Metropolitan, and Richard Crooks, tenor, not of the Metropolitan.

Especially notable was Mme. Matzenauer's singing of the contralto sections. As some one said of her in opera, when she comes on the stage you know some one is there. This quality of personality extends to Mme. Matzenauer's concert singing as well, and very beautiful was all she did with Mahler's work. Admirers of Mr. Crooks' singing also must have found much that gave them pleasure. Mr. Mengelberg's [illegible] needless to say, [illegible] with the de[illegible]n of a tr[illegible]ciple.

Interesting Programs For Boston Symphony

For the pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky provided interesting programs, giving at the second the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven and Ravel's rather dull La Valse. At the first the Unfinished of Schubert was played, Handel's B Minor Concerto Grosso, Carpenter's Skyscrapers Suite, with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lauther as soloists. At both concerts Jesus Sanroma, pianist, was heard in Toch's Concerto, a novelty.

Naturally, Mr. Sanroma and the Toch work are the apices of interest. One may take for granted that the two symphonies were impeccably given, as well as Mr. Carpenter's highly contrasting work, and that of Mr. Handel, also that if Mr. Koussevitzky played the Ravel Valse at all, he played it well.

The Toch Concerto is some three years old and after two or three hearings in various music centers of Europe it was one of the admired numbers at the Congress of Cacophony at Frankfort in 1927. The work is lengthy, almost of symphonic length, and, besides a piano part of Herculean proportions and difficulties, utilizes an immense orchestra. Not the least feat in the performances was the teamwork between soloist and conductor. Mr. Sanroma is said to have studied the work with the composer, which accounts for his very obvious familiarity with the score as well as with his solo parts.

The Concerto leaves one with a curious galvanized feeling. It is all so rapid, so sharply cut with a quality of steel about it. There is no sentimentality, no romanticism. It is all power, brilliancy, the efficiency of metal with a sardonic sense of humor, if such a thing were possible. One could never lie back with closed eyes during a performance as in the Schumann A Minor, or the Tchaikovsky, or the Rubinstein. You have to keep sitting up and taking notice. Just by this much one is left fatigued.

Mr. Sanroma's performance was magnificent in every way. His technique was more than equal to the difficulties encountered, and it must be supposed that his interpretation was an authentic one. By way of contrast, and probably in order to show that his talents were not confined to ultra-modern things, Mr. Sanroma played the Schumann A Minor Concerto at a cooncert in Brooklyn between his two performances of the Toch in Manhattan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
JAN [illegible]

-:- MUSIC -:-

A SPANISH LEADER

It would have been wiser of Senor E. Fernandez Arbos who led the Boston Symphony Orchestra here last night to put the overture from "Die Meistersinger" at the end of his programme instead of at the beginning. In spots the interpretation of Wagner's comic masterpiece was so brilliant that we cannot recall having heard any more brilliant; in spots it was so dull, and the players were so unresponsive, that we have seldom heard anything duller. But whatever we may say of the interpretation, this music was so far ahead as music of anything that followed that we felt like the guest at the feast who was faced with the roast before the hors d'oeuvres.

In his conduting of the overture we noted in Senor Arbos a certain inclination, which was even more emphasized in the Haydn symphony which was the second number on the programme. This was what may be called a pedagogical inclination; we had the unpleasant feeling that Senor Arbos was either inordinately proud of his reading, thus falling into the error of over-emphasizing it, or inordinately anxious as to our ignorance, thus falling into the error of overdoing his willingness to enlighten us.

Senor Arbos introduced the majority of the audience to some Spanish music with which it was not on familiar terms. In his interpretation of these pieces he showed a thoroughly Spanish knowledge of the internal rhythms of dance forms, and he showed also, in one piece especially, his knowledge that in his country, west and east, orientalism and occidentalism, mysticism and realism blend as they do nowhere else.

R. de A. J.

PROV. JOURNAL JAN. 16

Allowing a Glimpse of Iberian Music

Arbos of Madrid, Exponent of the New Spanish School, Brings an Exotic Note in Conducting as Guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Here

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played the second concert of the season, under the direction of E. Fernandez Arbos, the guest-conductor for the occasion at the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Senor Arbos was rather coolly received as he took his place on the stand for the first time, possibly because in appearance he did not meet the requirements of the popular prima donna-conductor of the day; but he grew phenomenally during the performance of the first two numbers, and at the close of the Symphony he received a veritable ovation, audience and orchestra alike giving him the acclaim of an Olympian victor.

The concert opened with the number that happened to close the concert of the guest-conductor of last year, Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," that fine old "war-horse," ever ready, when needed, to take his place in line to serve the call of the hour. As we recall the performance last year, Sir Henry Beecham took the old steed at a clip that made the tempos of such men as Carl Muck, Anton Seidl, Theodore Thomas and many of the later generation sound like a funeral procession. Senor Arbos, more conservative in his tempo, gave the seekers after sensation few thrills from any eccentric interpretation.

The symphony on the whole, despite the applause that greeted its close, was something of a disappointment to those who still think well of Haydn. The playing of the orchestra was far from flawless, the very first attack being a crow-hop, as they say in athletics, with others more exaggerated following here and there through the various movements.

The tone of the strings was often hard and forced, as though every violinist and 'cellist were testing the power of his instrument. The 'cellos got the great tone that they were striving for, but they sacrificed all quality for mere power. The violins lost their resonance and the rich string quality that one is accustomed to hear, and the whole effect, instead of being restful and pleasant to hear, became at times nerve-racking because of its very roughness. Or should we expect Haydn to sound like a wooden-shoe performance, angular and mechanical, with nothing of that larger humanity that the classic is thought to comprehend?

The second part of the concert was interesting on account of the richness of colors depicted and the virtuosity demanded of the players, and their quick response to that demand. Here, too, Senor Arbos seemed to put the orchestra more at ease, becoming more economical of gesture and so less confusing. His arrangement of the Albeniz Suite is fully capable of arousing in the curious an uncommon interest, the Triana number being in itself as unusual as it is lovely.

The three dances of De Falla were played with zest and verve that made them strong favorites of the concert, while Ravel's Alborada del Grazioso was as enigmatical as its title, and capable of expressing anything that the admirers of that ironical and mildly cynical composer came to read into his text.

The audience came curious to hear what the newer composers of Spain have been accomplishing, and there was a fitness that the two glimpses at Iberian music should have been afforded under the baton of the chief exponent of that school.

M. C. W.

Guest Conductor, eral Times

A delighted audience recalled Maestro E. Fernandez Arbos several times at the conclusion of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Providence season in the E. F. Albee Theater, last night. Senor Arbos, who is director of the Orquesta Sinfonica in Madrid, was the guest conductor. M. Koussevitsky has upon several occasions led the symphony at Madrid.

Senor Arbos, who has taken a leading part in his own country encouraging the development of musical talent and furthering the works of young Spanish modernists, urging them to tune their new conceptions to the rhythm of Spain, is a short man, somewhat shy and without the monumental eccentricities of Sir Henry Beecham that so amused a Providence audience last season. Bearded and haloed by baldness, he did not conform to the type we associate with Spain. But his graciousness and the spell of the music he drew from the ensemble won him the plaudits of the evening before the concert was over.

Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" and Haydn's Symphony in G major were the conventional numbers with which Senor Arbos opened the concert. Every conductor interprets Wagner and Haydn to his heart's desire, reading into them his own creative faculties. Arbos differed from the scholarly Koussevitsky as Koussevitsky differs from the flashy Stokowski. Though there is a difference of opinion as to the worth of the various conductors and composers, according to the individual's own standard, the fact remains that there is a general standard, and Senor Arbos satisfied.

The Spanish numbers particularly pleased the audience.

Two numbers from Albeniz's suite, "Iberia," arranged by Senor Arbos were rich in coloring matter and the tempo and sounds of Spain. Three dances from "The Three Cornered Hat" by Manuel de Falla, the musical idol of Spain, the adopted son of at least four provinces, had a swing and a verve that were delightful. Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso," which the program informs us is impossible of translation, was a typically modernist number, bringing to music that laughing irony, that delicate joshing, which cause many people to believe that the new school is not substantially erected.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 1 81929

Wide Interest Shown In Boston Orchestra

An order has just been received from Hampton, Va., for thirty seats for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the City Auditorium the night of January 29, which indicates the wide interest being created in the visit of this great body of 112 musicians with its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Demands on the box office at Walter D. Moses and Company are such as to show emphatically that the orchestra will be greeted by an audience like the one that welcomed Fritz Kreisler on his recent visit here when the house was completely filled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 18 1929

Boston Symphony

Several numbers of unusual interest and brilliance should make an event of the first significance in the coming concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Capitol Theater, on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

Serge Koussevitzky will present as the principal number on the program Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D-minor," which has been called the greatest symphony of the last half century and certainly the greatest of the French school of music. Cesar Franck, the Belgian composer, filled his masterpiece with imposing sonorities and lyric beauty. The course of the symphony from its slow and mysterious introduction to its exalted close is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of the "organist of St. Clothilde." The middle movement and Allegretto has a beautiful song for the English horn solo and is the first instance of the use of this instrument in a symphony.

Like Bach, Franck was a man of strong faith and like the earlier master, he loved to compose in the seclusion of his organ loft. The orchestral music of both is often suggestive of the organ and this symphony in particular has an organ-like resonance in the stirring course of the brass choir.

Franck's mighty score has taken its permanent place in the repertories of symphony orchestras the world over and he is universally accepted as probably the most glorious affirmation of faith in modern music.

The seat sale is at McCoy's.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 1 9 1929

FRANCK'S GREAT SYMPHONY

Several numbers of unusual interest and brilliance should make an event of the first significance in the coming concert here by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 3.

Serge Koussevitsky will present as the principal number on the program Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, which has been called the greatest symphony of the last half century and certainly the greatest of the French School of Music. Cesar Franck, the Belgian composer, filled his masterpiece with imposing sonorities and lyric beauty. The course of the symphony from its slow and mysterious introduction to its exalted close is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of the "organist of St. Clothilde." The middle movement and Allegretto has a beautiful song for the English horn solo and is the first instance of the use of this instrument in a symphony.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Like Bach, Franck was a man of strong faith and, like the earlier master, he loved to compose in the seclusion of his organ loft. The orchestral music of both is often suggestive of the organ and this symphony in particular, has an organ-like resonance in the stirring course of the brass choir.

Franck's mighty score has taken its permanent place in the repertories of symphony orchestras the world over. He is universally accepted as probably the most glorious affirmative of faith in modern music.

Seats are on sale at McCoy's, No. 89

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 2 9 1929

Boston Founder Of Symphony Saw Success

Established Popular Group in 1881, Paying Deficit Out of His Own Pocket

The founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be heard at the City Auditorium Tuesday night, January 29, came into existence through the generosity of one of Boston's citizens, the late Henry Lee Higginson, through whose efforts the orchestra was established in 1881. That it is one of the most popular bodies of musicians, as well as one of the greatest, will be evidenced here it is said, when its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, steps onto the rostrum. Tickets are on sale at the box office at Walter D. Moses & Company ofr this third attraction in the artists' course presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

With rare thoroughness, Mr. Higginson worked out a plan by which he founded the orchestra and hired a conductor, guaranteeing all the musicians a season's salary. Concerts were to be given at nominal prices, the deficit to be paid from h's own pocket. During the first season, 1881-82, a series of twenty concerts was given. This policy has continued uninterrputedly, only the number presented in Boston alone this season is sixty-five, besides several in New York and other cities.

Mr. Higginson was not only the founder, but he was the director and the guiding intelligence of the orchestra until 1918, one year before his death. He left its management in the hands of a board of directors with Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president, that carries on the task he begun. Salaries and other expenses have risen so amazingly that the work of managing the orchestra is declared now more difficult than ever. A deficit is said to be inevitable, the big job being to keep it down to a minimum. The founder is said to have spent more than $1,000,000 on the Boston Symphony, which is now regarded as probably the foremost orchestra in this country and one of the greatest in the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 2 0 1929

The Conductor of the Boston Symphony With His Boston Bull, "Droll"

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will bring his famous orchestra to Richmond on Tuesday, January 29th. (Schervee Photo)

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 2 0 1929

Albany, N. Y.

Please state whether Serge Koussevitzky is to continue to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra after this season. If he is to leave, who will be his successor?

R. M. Q.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to remain for another year at the head of the Boston Symphony. When he does, with draw his successor will then be chosen. It would be mere guesswork to try to indicate at this time who is to succeed him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

JAN 2 0 1929

[illegible] Boston [illegible] the Del[illegible] program of Spanish music Tuesday evening, Jan. 29, in the Elmwood Music hall, has been winning plaudits and acclaim in Boston the past week. Senor Arbos is famous for his interpretation of the composers of his native country, and these, with the exception of the Strauss "Don Juan" with which he opens the Buffalo program, will constitute the concert here. Ernesto Halffter's Sinfonietta in D major will be the chief offering, and Albeniz-Arbos, De Falla and Turina will be represented by charming numbers, whose very names seem to suggest fragrance and romance.

A conductor of energy and fire, Arbos is Spanish to his finger tips. He is closely identified with the rise of the modern Spanish school.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 2 0 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY TO HOLD BATON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make the first of two concert appearances in Washington during the present season at Poli's Theater, on Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The complete program of this concert, which will be the third attraction in the artists' course, will be announced within a short time.

In the four years that have elapsed since Mr. Koussevitzky took over the baton, he has enormously developed the orchestra's technical and interpretative resources with the result that popular attendance, which has grown at an amazing rate, has reached an unprecedented mark this season. To the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, of Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evenings Koussevitzky has added performances until today, it has become necessary to avoid lengthy trips in order that Boston's demand for concerts may be more nearly met.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 2 0 1929

Boston Symphony Coming Here Soon

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will [redacted] first of two concert appearances in Washington this season at Poli's Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The complete program will be announced shortly.

In the four years since Mr. Koussevitzky took over the baton, he has enormously developed the orchestra's technical and interpretative resources. To the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, Koussevitzky has added performances until today, it has become necessary to avoid lengthy trips in order that Boston's demand for concerts may be more nearly met.

Seats for this concert are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 2 2 1929

Amusements

Nn Interruption to Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its concert next Tuesday night at the City Auditorium no one will be seated during the rendering of the symphony, which constitutes half the program, according to Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, who are presenting the orchestra. The audience, therefore, is urged to be in place promptly, as Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, always begins on time and permits no interruption. The symphony will be the third of Beethoven's, known as "Eroica," while the other numbers include two by Wagner and one by Honegger, a contemporary French composer now in this country. There are still a few desirable seats at the box office at Walter D. Moses and Company.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 2 2 1929

THEATRES

TO PLAY "RUGBY."

An interesting new score will be played here next Tuesday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra, called "Rugby," [illegible] composer, Arthur Honegger, foremost of younger French composers, now in America for the first time. The piece was given its American premiere last Sunday in New York by the Philharmonic orchestra, while M. Honegger's first public appearance was as conductor of the Boston orchestra in its own city a few weeks ago. The concert will take place at the city auditorium with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and there are still a few good seats available at Walter D. Moses & Co.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 1 9 1929

FRANCK'S GREAT SYMPHONY

Several numbers of unusual interest and brilliance should make an event of the first significance in the coming concert here by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 3.

Serge Koussevitsky will present as the principal number on the program Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, which has been called the greatest symphony of the last half century and certainly the greatest of the French School of Music. Cesar Franck, the Belgian composer, filled his masterpiece with imposing sonorities and lyric beauty. The course of the symphony from its slow and mysterious introduction to its exalted close is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of the "organist of St. Clothilde." The middle movement and Allegretto has a beautiful song for the English horn solo and is the first instance of the use of this instrument in a symphony.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Like Bach, Franck was a man of strong faith and, like the earlier master, he loved to compose in the seclusion of his organ loft. The orchestral music of both is often suggestive of the organ and this symphony in particular, has an organ-like resonance in the stirring course of the brass choir.

Franck's mighty score has taken its permanent place in the repertories of symphony orchestras the world over. He is universally accepted as probably the most glorious affirmative of faith in modern music.

Seats are on sale at McCoy's, No. 89 [illegible] street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 2[illegible] 1929

Boston Founder Of Symphony Saw Success

Established Popular Group in 1881, Paying Deficit Out of His Own Pocket

The founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be heard at the City Auditorium Tuesday night, January 29, came into existence through the generosity of one of Boston's citizens, the late Henry Lee Higginson, through whose efforts the orchestra was establisned in 1881. That it is one of the most popular bodies of musicians, as well as one of the greatest, will be evidenced here it is said, when its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, steps onto the rostrum. Tickets are on sale at the box office at Walter D. Moses & Company ofr this third attraction in the artists' course presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

With rare thoroughness, Mr. Higginson worked out a plan by which he founded the orchestra and hired a conductor, guaranteeing all [illegible] sicians a [illegible] associated are recorded only were...; in treatises on the stage, but "Blossom Time" continues touring the country with undimming glory, and if the box office receipts are any criterion with an increasing popularity.

The most detailed theatrical tou of this country will not consum seven years—nor half of seven years The long life of "Blossom Time" is no

Mr. Higginson was not only the founder, but he was the director and the guiding intelligence of the orchestra until 1918, one year before his death. He left its management in the hands of a board of directors with Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president, that carries on the task he begun. Salaries and other expenses have risen so amazingly that the work of managing the orchestra is declared now more difficult than ever. A deficit is said to be inevitable, the big job being to keep it down to a mini-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 20 1929

The Conductor of the Boston Symphony With His Boston Bull, "Droll"

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will bring his famous orchestra to Richmond on Tuesday, January 29th. (Schervee Photo)

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 2 0 1929

Albany, N. Y.

Please state whether Serge Koussevitzky is to continue to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra after this season. If he is to leave, who will be his successor?

R. M. Q.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to remain for another year at the head of the Boston Symphony. When he does, withdraw his successor will then be chosen. It would be mere guesswork to try to indicate at this time who is to succeed him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
JAN 19 1929

* *

[illegible]EST conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Enrique Fernandez Arbos, who will conduct the Detroit Symphony orchestra in a program of Spanish music Tuesday evening, Jan. 29, in the Elmwood Music hall, has been winning plaudits and acclaim in Boston the past week. Senor Arbos is famous for his interpretation of the composers of his native country, and these, with the exception of the Strauss "Don Juan" with which he opens the Buffalo program, will constitute the concert here. Ernesto Halffter's Sinfonietta in D major will be the chief offering, and Albeniz-Arbos, De Falla and Turina will be represented by charming numbers, whose very names seem to suggest fragrance and romance.

A conductor of energy and fire, Arbos is Spanish to his finger tips. He is closely identified with the rise of the modern Spanish school.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 2 0 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY TO HOLD BATON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make the first of two concert appearances in Washington during the present season at Poli's Theater, on Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The complete program of this concert, which will be the third attraction in the artists' course, will be announced within a short time.

In the four years that have elapsed since Mr. Koussevitzky took over the baton, he has enormously developed the orchestra's technical and interpretative resources with the result that popular attendance, which has grown at an amazing rate, has reached an unprecedented mark this season. To the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, of Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evenings Koussevitzky has added performances until today, it has become necessary to avoid lengthy trips in order that Boston's demand for concerts may be more nearly met.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 2 0 1929

Boston Symphony Coming Here Soon

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will [illegible] first of two concert appearances in Washington this season at Poli's Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The complete program will be announced shortly.

In the four years since Mr. Koussevitzky took over the baton, he has enormously developed the orchestra's technical and interpretative resources. To the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, Koussevitzky has added performances until today, it has become necessary to avoid lengthy trips in order that Boston's demand for concerts may be more nearly met.

Seats for this concert are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CL. PING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 2 2 1929

Amusements

Nn Interruption to Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its concert next Tuesday night at the City Auditorium no one will be seated during the rendering of the symphony, which constitutes half the program, according to Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, who are presenting the orchestra. The audience, therefore, is urged to be in place promptly, as Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, always begins on time and permits no interruption. The symphony will be the third of Beethoven's, known as "Eroica," while the other numbers include two by Wagner and one by Honegger, a contemporary French composer now in this country. There are still a few desirable seats at the box office at Walter D. Moses and Company.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 2 2 1929

THEATRES

TO PLAY "RUGBY."

An interesting new score will be played here next Tuesday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra, called "Rugby," [illegible] composer, Arthur Honegger, foremost of younger French composers, now in America for the first time. The piece was given its American premiere last Sunday in New York by the Philharmonic orchestra, while M. Honegger's first public appearance was as conductor of the Boston orchestra in its own city a few weeks ago. The concert will take place at the city auditorium with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and there are still a few good seats available at Walter D. Moses & Co.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 1 9 1929

FRANCK'S GREAT SYMPHONY

Several numbers of unusual interest and brilliance should make an event of the first significance in the coming concert here by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at the Capitol theater, on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

Serge Koussevitsky will present as the principal number on the program Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, which has been called the greatest symphony of the last half century and certainly the greatest of the French School of Music. Cesar Franck, the Belgian composer, filled his masterpiece with imposing sonorities and lyric beauty. The course of the symphony from its slow and mysterious introduction to its exalted close is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of the "organist of St. Clothilde." The middle movement and Allegretto has a beautiful song for the English horn solo and is the first instance of the use of this instrument in a symphony.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Like Bach, Franck was a man of strong faith and, like the earlier master, he loved to compose in the seclusion of his organ loft. The orchestral music of both is often suggestive of the organ and this symphony in particular, has an organ-like resonance in the stirring course of the brass choir.

Franck's mighty score has taken its permanent place in the repertories of symphony orchestras the world over. He is universally accepted as probably the most glorious affirmative of faith in modern music.

Seats are on sale at McCoy's, No. 89

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Boston Founder Of Symphony Saw Success

Established Popular Group in 1881, Paying Deficit Out of His Own Pocket

The founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be heard at the City Auditorium Tuesday night, January 29, came into existence through the generosity of one of Boston's citizens, the late Henry Lee Higginson, through whose efforts the orchestra was established in 1881. That it is one of the most popular bodies of musicians, as well as one of the greatest, will be evidenced here it is said, when its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, steps onto the rostrum. Tickets are on sale at the box office at Walter D. Moses & Company ofr this third attraction in the artists' course presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer.

With rare thoroughness, Mr. Higginson worked out a plan by which he founded the orchestra and hired a conductor, guaranteeing all the musicians a salary. Records are recorded only were associated are recorded only in treatises on the stage, but "Blossom Time" continues touring the country with undimming glory, and if the box office receipts are any criterion with an increasing popularity.

The most detailed theatrical tour of this country will not consume seven years—nor half of seven years. The long life of "Blossom Time" in New York

Mr. Higginson was not only the founder, but he was the director and the guiding intelligence of the orchestra until 1918, one year before his death. He left its management in the hands of a board of directors with Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president, that carries on the task he begun. Salaries and other expenses have risen so amazingly that the work of managing the orchestra is declared now more difficult than ever. A deficit is said to be inevitable, the big job being to keep it down to a mini-

The Conductor of the Boston Symphony With His Boston Bull, "Droll"

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will bring his famous orchestra to Richmond on Tuesday, January 29th. (Schervee Photo)

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 2 9 1929

Albany, N. Y.

Please state whether Serge Koussevitzky is to continue to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra after this season. If he is to leave, who will be his successor?

R. M. Q.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to remain for another year at the head of the Boston Symphony. When he does withdraw his successor will then be chosen. It would be mere guesswork to try to indicate at this time who is to succeed him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
JAN 1 9 1929

* * *

...EST conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Enrique Fernandez Arbos, who will conduct the Detroit Symphony orchestra in a program of Spanish music Tuesday evening, Jan. 29, in the Elmwood Music hall, has been winning plaudits and acclaim in Boston the past week. Senor Arbos is famous for his interpretation of the composers of his native country, and these, with the exception of the Strauss "Don Juan" with which he opens the Buffalo program, will constitute the concert here. Ernesto Halffter's Sinfonietta in D major will be the chief offering, and Albeniz-Arbos, De Falla and Turina will be represented by charming numbers, whose very names seem to suggest fragrance and romance.

A conductor of energy and fire, Arbos is Spanish to his finger tips. He is closely identified with the rise of the modern Spanish school.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 2 0 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY TO HOLD BATON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make the first of two concert appearances in Washington during the present season at Poli's Theater, on Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The complete program of this concert, which will be the third attraction in the artists' course, will be announced within a short time.

In the four years that have elapsed since Mr. Koussevitzky took over the baton, he has enormously developed the orchestra's technical and interpretative resources with the result that popular attendance, which has grown at an amazing rate, has reached an unprecedented mark this season. To the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, of Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evenings Koussevitzky has added performances until today, it has become necessary to avoid lengthy trips in order that Boston's demand for concerts may be more nearly met.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 2 0 1929

Boston Symphony Coming Here Soon

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make the first of two concert appearances in Washington this season at Poli's Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The complete program will be announced shortly.

In the four years since Mr. Koussevitzky took over the baton, he has enormously developed the orchestra's technical and interpretative resources. To the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, Koussevitzky has added performances until today, it has become necessary to avoid lengthy trips in order that Boston's demand for concerts may be more nearly met.

Seats for this concert are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 2 ? 1929

Amusements

An Interruption to Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its concert next Tuesday night at the City Auditorium no one will be seated during the rendering of the symphony, which constitutes half the program, according to Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, who are presenting the orchestra. The audience, therefore, is urged to be in place promptly, as Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, always begins on time and permits no interruption. The symphony will be the third of Beethoven's, known as "Eroica," while the other numbers include two by Wagner and one by Honegger, a contemporary French composer now in this country. There are still a few desirable seats at the box office at Walter D. Moses and Company.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 2 2 1929

THEATRES

TO PLAY "RUGBY."

An interesting new score will be played here next Tuesday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra, called "Rugby," the composer, Arthur Honegger, foremost of younger French composers, now in America for the first time. The piece was given its American premiere last Sunday in New York by the Philharmonic orchestra, while M. Honegger's first public appearance was as conductor of the Boston orchestra in its own city a few weeks ago. The concert will take place at the city auditorium with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and there are still a few good seats available at Walter D. Moses & Co.

80

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLUB FELLOW
JAN 23 1929

DURING A CONCERTO FOR STRINGS

By SERGE MACHINOFF

"HERE I am at another Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert when I should be attending my Domestic Science class this afternoon, but what can one do, when one's very uttermost soul cries out for melody? Just as some women are sex-starved I have always felt this insatiable hunger for good music.

"But, nevertheless, I feel somewhat guilty. There was a very special class today on how to make salad dressing as the Russians prepare it. And I always feel so much better when I can brings thoughts home to our Chef. He is really a most talented person: used to own a restaurant of his own near Monte Carlo, and can create dishes he himself doesn't know the name of.

"When I gave that affair in honor of the English poet who is over here lecturing—oh, what is his name? I can never remember poets . . . Jules served the most gorgeous combination of the hearts of artichokes stuffed with real, imported caviar. Then, over that, there was a sauce made of ground Gorgonzola and alligator pears. You never tasted anything like it in your life. So few people understand the art of making French or Russian dressing, and this Domestic Science teacher is a darling. She spent two years studying in Sweden alone. Last week we were all so thrilled: she introduced a novel method of making whipped cream without whipping it!

"What is that thing they're playing now? It doesn't sound familiar to me, and I do so dislike to refer to a program: type disillusions one so and reduces the classics to mere words and things mechanical. What's more, those around you think that because you glance at a program, you are not familiar with fine music. I think I have a natural ear for the best. I can remember pieces so well. Last week, I went with Jim to 'Whoopee' and, would you believe it, I could hum all the tunes on the suburban train returning to Scarsdale!

"Is that Koussevitzky conducting? I thought so. I can pronounce these Russian names rather well but if you asked me to spell his name, I'd go into a trance. Ah, the Concerto Grosso for Strings, No. 12, in B Minor! Isn't it delicious! They say that, when Handel composed this number, he was disappointed in love. Do you know, I think some of the parts suggest as much. It sounds a little mad. There wouldn't be any great music if there were no women and no heartaches. Now and then I deliberately snub my husband. And he profits by it. Concentrates more on his business. One of the luckiest deals he ever made came right after we quarreled over a Pekingese dog he bought. It was a nasty-tempered little beast, but Jim was crazy over it, because it resembled some very old relation of his, now living in China.

"Isn't that Margey Lane over there in that wine-colored ensemble? I thought I recognized her! They say she is leaving her husband because of his affair with that actress. Of all the stupid things! It is as natural for a man to stray around a little as for cats to walk back fences. Let them see the moon occasionally, is my motto. The radio has all but ruined me for classic music. When one of those dance orchestras plays 'I can't give you anything but love, Baby', I can't keep my feet still. Isn't that a frightful admission to make?

Do you really think these compositions by old masters have a meaning? Or are we all fooled? I have heard many lively discussions as to whether Schubert's 'Unfinished' means anything, or is just a lot of notes jumbled together. The last time I heard it, I was almost ready to admit I was pleased over his not finishing it. If there had been ten more notes, I would have screamed.

"A friend of mine, who has studied music for years at the Fontainebleau Conservatory, and who wrote and had published a little piece called 'Bookstalls on the Seine', tells me that all music means some emotional experience. Thus if, when I hear 'I can't give you anything but love, Baby' causes my feet to dance, I should yield to this impulse. The quality of the music is of less importance than the reactions which are stimulated. Oh, dear, I think I must be getting confused. What was I saying? Now I know—that pianist resembles a Maitre d'Hotel I knew in Italy last season. It's his hair or his complexion or something.

"This fellow was forever buzzing around our table. He called my husband 'Count' and you know, as well as I do, that Jim resembles royalty as much as Irish Bacon resembles grouse. He would put fresh-cut flowers on our table three times a day. But it wasn't until we were well on our way to Rome, I discovered one of my diamond pendants had mysteriously disappeared. And, while I'm not suspicious by nature, I remember how thoughtfully that chap used to help me remove my wraps at dinner. Toch is a comparatively young composer, isn't he? The piece they are playing, Concerto for Orchestra and Piano, was written in the Spring of 1926. Imagine that! It's really too young to be real music, of course! It has its moments, nevertheless. I really came just to hear Carpenter's 'Skyscrapers'. What an odd name. It must be descriptive. Which reminds me, the Bradleys have a new pent house on the very top floor of one of the highest buildings in New York, and the way the wind howls at night up there, makes one think of souls in torment. Jim calls it the 'Punk House'. Jim is so dreadfully whimsical! He thinks up the most curious things!

"I'm so partial to the Philharmonic-Symphony and Mengelberg. Carnegie Hall must be saturated with music of all kinds by this time. Think of the millions of notes that have splintered against its walls. I heard Mahler's 'Das Lied von der Erde', with all its trimmings of tenor, contralto and orchestra, and it's still ringing in my ears. I had been up late just the evening before, at the Opera, and I couldn't hold my eyes open. It was amusingly embarrassing. A venerable and quite splendid old dowager, wearing quarts of jewels, sat next to me and my head probably bobbed over in her direction. Finally she poked me with her lace fan and said: 'Pardon me, Madam, but if you'd be any more comfortable, I'll take you in my lap.' Wasn't that a piece of gigantic impudence!

"'This Song of the Earth' was as complicated as an eight-day clock and was composed of at least six Chinese poems. You know what the Chinese do when they write a poem; there may be a sufficient number of words to reach seven times around the Great Wall and then back to where they started. I didn't understand any of it, but then that's my weakness now—not understanding the classics.

"I'll never forget attempting to bluff it through, while attending a Symphony afternoon at Carnegie Hall last year. A friend I had not seen for years was my guest and she appeared not to know very much on the subject. They were playing a long, long affair by Handel. I described it from pure imagination, just to keep conversation on the move. 'This part,' I remarked, 'undertakes to describe the fall of glacial water down the Alps in the time of William Tell. A little later on, you seem to hear the steady movement of a glacier, on its inexorable path to the grassy meadows, far below!'

"And when I had finished, she turned to me with the funniest expression on her face and said: 'Charlotte, you will have your joke. That episode is not in Switzerland; its theme is German, wholly. And it's not supposed to have any meaning whatsoever. Suppose we give up and go over to the Avenue for a sandwich and some tea. I'm almost starved.'

"I feel so unutterably sympathetic to Ganna Walska, and would give worlds to have a name as sweet-sounding. I vowed I would never marry a man named Smith or Jones, and then had to pick out Jim, whose name was Brown. Every time Ganna attempts to dash into operatic music, something happens to her. Influenza, or the critics or Customs officials, or housemaid's knee. Nevertheless, she's a brave little woman, and I do hope her new perfumery shops will make a go of it. I have found a new odor; they call it 'Lily of the Nile', but Jim claims it smells as if it came from the Seine. There is a faint suggestion of the exotic, but it exactly suits my personality. . . mystic, and all that.

"Well, they must have played Carpenter's 'Skyscrapers' and I missed it. One feels so clean and purged and educationally benefitted after one of these important concerts, don't you think?"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 24 1929

operation.

Koussevitzky

Soloists were once as customary with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as with most other orchestras. When Koussevitzky came to America to be the Boston Symphony conductor, he began by laying this tradition on the shelf. Soloists were not to be engaged simply for the sake of having soloists, but only when required by some score of symphonic interest which contained a solo part. The great concertos, of, say Beethoven or Brahms, had of course a legitimate place in the orchestral repertory, and called for a famous virtuoso to play them with the orchestra. An occasional modern score has solo voices; or a contemporary concerto of interest is written by such composers as Stravinsky, Prokokieff, Respighi, Tansman, Tailleferre, and these have appeared as guests of the orchestra in first performances of their scores. But a Boston Symphony concert remains in every case a symphony program, and does not lapse, in the middle, into a recital. "Praise the Lord," wrote Philip Hale, "the chief interest is no longer in the soloists at a symphony concert, what the woman will wear, whether Mme. Portamento is fatter than she was two seasons ago, whether Mr. Boanerges pounds the piano with more marked ferocity than when he first appeared with Lisztian arrangement of the hair. The orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky is the soloist." No soloists were announced in advance for Koussevitzky's first season, nor have any been announced for any season since. The innovation has been justified by the absence of any apparent regret on the part of the audiences. And symphonic interest and amplitude of the programs has been enriched accordingly. The Hartford concert is February 3, a week from next Sunday. Ticket sale at McCoy's, 98 Asylum Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 24 1929

Koussevitzky and Soloists

Soloists were once as customary with the Boston Symphony orchestra as with most other orchestras. When Koussevitzky came to America to be the Boston Symphony conductor, he began by laying this tradition on the shelf. Soloists were not to be engaged simply for the sake of having soloists, but only when required by some score of symphonic interest which contained a solo part. The great concertos of, say, Beethoven or Brahms, had of course a legitimate place in the orchestral repertory, and called for a famous virtuoso to play them with the orchestra. An occasional modern score has solo voices; or a contemporary concerto of interest is written by such composers as Stravinsky, Prokokieff, Respighi, Tansman, Tailleferre and these have appeared as guests of the orchestra in first performances of their scores, but a Boston Symphony concert remains in every case a symphony program, and does not lapse in the middle into a recital. "Praise the Lord," wrote Philip Hale, "the chief interest is no longer in the soloists at a symphony concert, what the woman will wear, whether Mme. Portamento is fatter than she was two seasons ago, whether Mr. Boanerges pounds the piano with more marked ferocity than when he first appeared with Lisztian arrangement of the hair. The orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky is the soloist." No soloists were announced in advance for Koussevitzky's first season, nor have any been announced for any season since. The innovation has been justified by the absence of any apparent regret on the part of the audiences. And symphonic interest and amplitude of the programs has been enriched accordingly. The Hartford concert is February 3, a week from next Sunday. Ticket sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 24 1929

SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY.

An interesting novelty to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert at the City Auditorium next Tuesday night will be "Rugby," by Arthur Honegger, a contemporary French composer now in this country. The piece was played between the halves in the France-England international rugby football match in Paris. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the great orchestra and nobody will be admitted during the Beethoven third symphony. There are a few seats remainging at Walter D. Moses & Co.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 24 1929

POLI'S—
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The symphony will be Brahms' Second in D Major, the performance of which is regarded as one of the outstanding achievements of the Boston Symphony. Other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; two of Erik Satie's "Gymnopedles," orchestrated by Debussy, and Maurice Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody in four movements. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JAN 26 1929

VISITING orchestras will be the feature next week while the Philharmonic-Symphony players are away on tour. Tuesday evening the Philadelphia Orchestra will make its last appearance of the seasor, under the direction of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Eugene Goossens conducting the concert of March 5. The program Tuesday evening in Carnegie Hall will consist of Brahms's Second Symphony, Josef Hofmann's Symphonic narrative, "The Haunted Castle," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in Carnegie Hall. The first program will consist of Ernest Bloch's Rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's "Rugby," both of which have been played here; Prokafieff's "Classical" Symphony and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes." Saturday the opening numbers will be Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and Satie's "Gymnopedies," with "America" and "Rugby" to follow.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
JAN 26 1929

World of Music

Arthur Honegger: Close-up Impressions of a Celebrated Contemporary Composer

By FELIX DEYO.

WHETHER ARTHUR HONEGGER is clearly the foremost of the so-called modern school of composers is a question for later generations to decide; he and his contemporaries are far too close for a legitimate perspective. But only one so hopelessly biased against the composer of "Pacific, 231," "Horace Victorieux," "Le Roi David" and "Rugby" (this latter, by the way, will be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky at next Friday night's concert in Brooklyn by the Boston symphony Orchestra), as to be unable to see worth in him, would deny that Honegger is the most independent worker of to-day's major musicians.

It has long been apparent that Honegger is working hand in hand with no one but Arthur Honegger. Schools that have long claimed him have been repudiated almost before the disputants could find space for their arguments in the columns of periodicals that specialize in such matters. Almost instinctively, Honegger has contrived to steer a course between the Charybdis of brotherhood and the deep, blue sea of deliberate attempt to be Different.

* * *

FOR ONE NEED SPEND only a few minutes in conversation with the heavily-built young man to realize that he does not give even the least part of a moment's care to the problem of avoiding similarity to other composers, past or present. Honegger goes to hear contemporary or classic works, appreciates them sometimes and likes them often, but the fact that he hears to-day an opus that has identical points in form and manner with one that is under progress on his own desk at home will not make him change his own. There is a supreme confidence, almost a mystic belief, in the Honegger mind that the products of his talents will bear their distinctive markings without any deliberate seeking. And further, he wishes his compositions to fully speak for themselves as music (per se), without recourse to literary explanation.

The psychologists may point to this as a fault; it is evidence of an inferior mentality, they say, that a man can be unconscious and unconcerned with contemporaneous activity that bears upon his own. It is true, as Honegger admits of his friend Pablo Picasso, the painter, that the greater intelligence tends to be all-concerned, interested in nearly everything. Picasso, Honegger will tell you, is a tremendous brain. "He goes in that direction, and if you follow him, immediately he turns about and steers another course," the composer will say of the man who has the art galleries of two continents constantly worried over what he will do next. Honegger has been in the United States a short few weeks, and speaks English more by a sense of feeling than by knowledge. But he is learning quickly. Of Swiss parentage and born in Havre thirty-four years ago, he has spent the major part of his life in Paris and may therefore be set down as Parisian, which, in music, is almost an international label.

* * *

IT IS LIKELY that the observer will be impressed by his adaptability to environment as among Honegger's outstanding traits. Recently, spending two hours with him in interview, we found that already he is as well acquainted with the ramifications of the New York transit system as is the average native of Brooklyn or of the Bronx. And he can tell you of some very good places to eat and—eat. He will remark in the tone of voice of one who believes he is being very droll that never before in his life had he so much to drink as since his arrival in the land of prohibition.

He is completely at ease with strangers, if they be cordial-spoken, and will protest volubly if you ask him to play anything upon the grand piano which stands in the sitting room of his hotel suite. If you override his insistence that he has not played a piano in lo! these many years, he will seat himself at the keyboard and play salient excerpts from his works. Honegger is still European enough to consider good manners the emblem of good breeding, and he is acutely distressed if one of his visitors is inconvenienced even to the extent of reaching for an ash receiver. He laughs indulgently if you tell him that in the United States courtesy is held a sign of inferiority. And then offer you a chocolate.

Arthur Honegger has had his hair trimmed shorter for his American tour, probably because of warnings that, on this side of the water, males only if they are charlatans wear their tresses long. His sturdy figure is belied by a none too rosy complexion; his brow, and for that matter, all the skin of his face is as unroughened and fine textured as a baby's. His hands are facile, but not very strong in appearance, and he is addicted to loose comfort in dress and the smoking of a new, uncolored briar pipe.

Publicity methods amuse him. "In Paris, we too have such business," he will say, "but it is not there such a beeg industry."

* * *

NATURALLY, we talked of music, of his music and of others. "Bach is representative to me of the Christian life and ideal," declared this modernist with intense earnestness. (Need we recall the masterly polyphony and counterpoint of Honegger's own writings?) In modern France, Ravel and Milhaud stand foremost; Debussy and Franck already are pillars; Berlioz is better known in other countries than his own.

Hindemith in Germany, Stravinsky in Russia, De Falla in Spain, Goossens and Holst in England, these are foremost, thinks Honegger, amongst European contemporaries. Americans—Carpenter, Antheil, MacDowell.

Opera? Puccini, yes; Verdi—no! With the possible exception of "Falstaff," Verdi's melody, his harmony, his orchestra, are "vulgar and banal" (M. Honegger stepped to the piano and played a Verdi passage illustrative of his contention). On this point, we cannot strike a chord of agreement. But we have not heard, as yet, Honegger's own "Judith" (Biblical opera), being presented, it so happens, this very day in Chicago, with Mary Garden in the title role. Nor his more recent "Antigone."

Honegger, we might add, writes music exactly in the terms in which he feels it. He is not consciously a polytonalist or an atonalist, a quarter-tonalist, or an impressionist, a diatonicist or a chromaticist, etc., etc. He may command these idioms of tonal converse, but does not employ them except for the purpose of precise and direct expression. Nor does he specifically harmonize his themes or melodies. Both grow simultaneously. His harmony creates itself, the vertical chord product of two or more horizontally moving parts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 21 1929

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitcky announces a program of special interest for the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford, in the Capitol theater, on Sunday afternoon, February 3. The symphony of the occasion will be the master score of Cesar Franck, the great Belgian composer. This symphony will comprise the latter part of the program, which will open with the 12th Concerto Grosso of Handel, for string orchestra. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," played by Koussevitsky here in his first season, will again be performed. This, one of the finest interpretations by the illustrious orchestra at the hands of its remarkable Russian conductor, has had particularly high praise for the poetic performances he has given it in this season's concerts. The only living composer figuring upon the program will be Richard Strauss, whose Dance of the Seven Veils from the opera, "Salome," will be played. This excerpt is filled with the characteristic voluptuous languors of the Orient and

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
JAN 27 1929

Honegger 'Rugby' to Be Played

Heinrich Schlusnus in Concert at Peabody Friday

By CARROLL DULANEY.

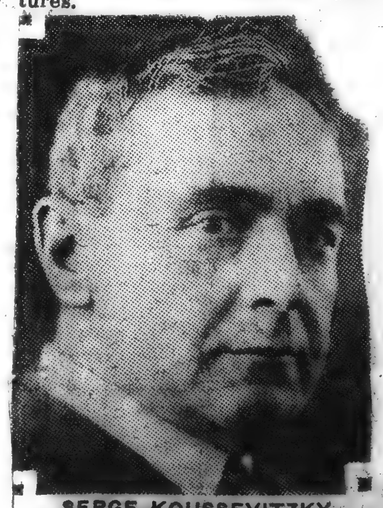
OUR music season is hitting on all cylinders just now. Tomorrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as director, gives its first concert of the season at the Lyric under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. And the program is one which should appeal in part to disciples of both the ancient and modern schools of music.

The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, which has a wealth of melody and haunting harmonies. It lacks the somber moods of the First and Fourth symphonies of the same master. Despite the oft-repeated assertion that no conductor not of Teutonic origin can understand Brahms' music, Mr. Koussevitzky has the reputation of giving it an interpretation that reveals much of its hidden beauty. How much of this is Brahms and how much of it Koussevitzky is for the captious hearer to judge, but certainly the result is very satisfying.

For those who like novelties Mr. Koussevitzky will present "Rugby," a new work by Honegger, which describes a football game. It attracted considerable attention in Europe when it was played between the halves of the international Rugby match in Paris.

Honegger's most famous work, perhaps, is his "Pacific 231," which is the composer's conception of an express train getting under way. It is a symphonic bedlam—one of those things which you should hear once.

The program will open with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," a delightful musical joke. The modern French school will be represented by Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," two brilliant impressionist pictures.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY HEINRI

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY will direct the Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric top nus will give the artist recital at the Peabod Tiefenbrun will dance at the Peabody teache

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 24 1929

operation.

Koussevitzky

Solists were once as customary with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as with most other orchestras. When Koussevitzky came to America to be the Boston Symphony conductor, he began by laying this tradition on the shelf. Soloists were not to be engaged simply for the sake of having soloists, but only when required by some score of symphonic interest which contained a solo part. The great concertos, of, say Beethoven or Brahms, had of course a legitimate place in the orchestral repertory, and called for a famous virtuoso to play them with the orchestra. An occasional modern score has solo voices; or a contemporary concerto of interest is written by such composers as Stravinsky, Prokokieff, Respighi, Tansman, Tailleferre, and these have appeared as guests of the orchestra in first performances of their scores. But a Boston Symphony concert remains in every case a symphony program, and does not lapse, in the middle, into a recital. "Praise the Lord," wrote Philip Hale, "the chief interest is no longer in the soloists at a symphony concert, what the woman will wear, whether Mme. Portamento is fatter than she was two seasons ago, whether Mr. Boanerges pounds the piano with more marked ferocity than when he first appeared with Lisztian arrangement of the hair. The orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky is the soloist." No soloists were announced in advance for Koussevitzky's first season, nor have any been announced for any season since. The innovation has been justified by the absence of any apparent regret on the part of the audiences. And symphonic interest and amplitude of the programs has been enriched accordingly. The Hartford concert is February 3, a week from next Sunday. Ticket sale at McCoy's, 98 Asylum Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 24 1929

Koussevitzky and Soloists

Soloists were once as customary with the Boston Symphony orchestra as with most other orchestras. When Koussevitzky came to America to be the Boston Symphony conductor, he began by laying this tradition on the shelf. Soloists were not to be engaged simply for the sake of having soloists, but only when required by some score of symphonic interest which contained a solo part. The great concertos of, say, Beethoven or Brahms, had of course a legitimate place in the orchestral repertory, and called for a famous virtuoso to play them with the orchestra. An occasional modern score has solo voices; or a contemporary concerto of interest is written by such composers as Stravinsky, Prokokieff, Respighi, Tansman, Tailleferre and these have appeared as guests of the orchestra in first performances of their scores, but a Boston Symphony concert remains in every case a symphony program, and does not lapse in the middle into a recital. "Praise the Lord," wrote Philip Hale, "the chief interest is no longer in the soloists at a symphony concert, what the woman will wear, whether Mme. Portamento is fatter than she was two seasons ago, whether Mr. Boanerges pounds the piano with more marked ferocity than when he first appeared with Lisztian arrangement of the hair. The orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky is the soloist." No soloists were announced in advance for Koussevitzky's first season, nor have any been announced for any season since. The innovation has been justified by the absence of any apparent regret on the part of the audiences. And symphonic interest and amplitude of the programs has been enriched accordingly. The Hartford concert is February 3, a week from next Sunday. Ticket sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 24 1929

SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY.

An interesting novelty to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert at the auditorium next Tuesday night will be "Rugby," by Arthur Honegger, a contemporary French composer now in this country. The piece was played between the halves in the France-England international rugby football match in Paris. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the great orchestra and nobody will be admitted during the Beethoven third symphony. There are a few seats remainging at Walter D. Moses & Co.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 24 1929

POLI'S—
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The symphony will be Brahms' Second in D Major, the performance of which is regarded as one of the outstanding achievements of the Boston Symphony. Other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; two of Erik Satie's "Gymnopedles," orchestrated by Debussy, and Maurice Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody in four movements. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
JAN 26 1929

VISITING orchestras will be the feature next week while the Philharmonic-Symphony players are away on tour. Tuesday evening the Philadelphia Orchestra will make its last appearance of the seasor, under the direction of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Eugene Goossens conducting the concert of March 5. The program Tuesday evening in Carnegie Hall will consist of Brahms's Second Symphony, Josef Hofmann's Symphonic narrative, "The Haunted Castle," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in Carnegie Hall. The first program will consist of Ernest Bloch's Rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's "Rugby," both of which have been played here; Prokafieff's "Classical" Symphony and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes." Saturday the opening numbers will be Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and Satie's "Gymnopedies," with "America" and "Rugby" to follow.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
JAN 26 1929

World of Music

Arthur Honegger: Close-up Impressions of a Celebrated Contemporary Composer

By FELIX DEYO.

WHETHER ARTHUR HONEGGER is clearly the foremost of the so-called modern school of composers is a question for later generations to decide; he and his contemporaries are far too close for a legitimate perspective. But only one so hopelessly biased against the composer of "Pacific, 231," "Horace Victorieux," "Le Roi David" and "Rugby" (this latter, by the way, will be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky at next Friday night's concert in Brooklyn by the Boston symphony Orchestra), as to be unable to see worth in him, would deny that Honegger is the most independent worker of to-day's major musicians.

It has long been apparent that Honegger is working hand in hand with no one but Arthur Honegger. Schools that have long claimed him have been repudiated almost before the disputants could find space for their arguments in the columns of periodicals that specialize in such matters. Almost instinctively, Honegger has contrived to steer a course between the Charybdis of brotherhood and the deep, blue sea of deliberate attempt to be Different.

* * *

FOR ONE NEED SPEND only a few minutes in conversation with the heavily-built young man to realize that he does not give even the least part of a moment's care to the problem of avoiding similarity to other composers, past or present. Honegger goes to hear contemporary or classic works, appreciates them sometimes and likes them often, but the fact that he hears to-day an opus that has identical points in form and manner with one that is under progress on his own desk at home will not make him change his own. There is a supreme confidence, almost a mystic belief, in the Honegger mind that the products of his talents will bear their distinctive markings without any deliberate seeking. And further, he wishes his compositions to fully speak for themselves as music (per se), without recourse to literary explanation.

The psychologists may point to this as a fault; it is evidence of an inferior mentality, they say, that a man can be unconscious and unconcerned with contemporaneous activity that bears upon his own. It is true, as Honegger admits of his friend Pablo Picasso, the painter, that the greater intelligence tends to be all-concerned, interested in nearly everything. Picasso, Honegger will tell you, is a tremendous brain. "He goes in that direction, and if you follow him, immediately he turns about and steers another course," the composer will say of the man who has the art galleries of two continents constantly worried over what he will do next. Honegger has been in the United States a short few weeks, and speaks English more by a sense of feeling than by knowledge. But he is learning quickly. Of Swiss parentage and born in Havre thirty-four years ago, he has spent the major part of his life in Paris and may therefore be set down as Parisian, which, in music, is almost an international label.

* * *

IT IS LIKELY that the observer will be impressed by his adaptability to environment as among Honegger's outstanding traits. Recently, spending two hours with him in interview, we found that already he is as well acquainted with the ramifications of the New York transit system as is the average native of Brooklyn or of the Bronx. And he can tell you of some very good places to eat and—eat. He will remark in the tone of voice of one who believes he is being very droll that never before in his life had he so much to drink as since his arrival in the land of prohibition.

He is completely at ease with strangers, if they be cordial-spoken, and will protest volubly if you ask him to play anything upon the grand piano which stands in the sitting room of his hotel suite. If you override his insistence that he has not played a piano in lo! these many years, he will seat himself at the keyboard and play salient excerpts from his works. Honegger is still European enough to consider good manners the emblem of good breeding, and he is acutely distressed if one of his visitors is inconvenienced even to the extent of reaching for an ash receiver. He laughs indulgently if you tell him that in the United States courtesy is held a sign of inferiority. And then offer you a chocolate.

Arthur Honegger has had his hair trimmed shorter for his American tour, probably because of warnings that, on this side of the water, males only if they are charlatans wear their tresses long. His sturdy figure is belied by a none too rosy complexion; his brow, and for that matter, all the skin of his face is as unroughened and fine textured as a baby's. His hands are facile, but not very strong in appearance, and he is addicted to loose comfort in dress and the smoking of a new, uncolored briar pipe.

Publicity methods amuse him. "In Paris, we too have such business," he will say, "but it is not there such a beeg industry."

* * *

NATURALLY, we talked of music, of his music and of others. "Bach is representative to me of the Christian life and ideal," declared this modernist with intense earnestness. (Need we recall the masterly polyphony and counterpoint of Honegger's own writings?) In modern France, Ravel and Milhaud stand foremost; Debussy and Franck already are pillars; Berlioz is better known in other countries than his own.

Hindemith in Germany, Stravinsky in Russia, De Falla in Spain, Goossens and Holst in England, these are foremost, thinks Honegger, amongst European contemporaries. Americans—Carpenter, Antheil, MacDowell.

Opera? Puccini, yes; Verdi—no! With the possible exception of "Falstaff," Verdi's melody, his harmony, his orchestra, are "vulgar and banal" (M. Honegger stepped to the piano and played a Verdi passage illustrative of his contention). On this point, we cannot strike a chord of agreement. But we have not heard, as yet, Honegger's own "Judith" (Biblical opera), being presented, it so happens, this very day in Chicago, with Mary Garden in the title role. Nor his more recent "Antigone."

Honegger, we might add, writes music exactly in the terms in which he feels it. He is not consciously a polytonalist or an atonalist, a quarter-tonalist, or an impressionist, a diatonicist or a chromaticist, etc., etc. He may command these idioms of tonal converse, but does not employ them except for the purpose of precise and direct expression. Nor does he specifically harmonize his themes or melodies. Both grow simultaneously. His harmony creates itself, the vertical chord product of two or more horizontally moving parts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 21 1929

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitcky announces a program of special interest for the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford, in the Capitol theater, on Sunday afternoon, February 3. The symphony of the occasion will be the master score of Cesar Franck, the great Belgian composer. This symphony will comprise the latter part of the program, which will open with the 12th Concerto Grosso of Handel, for string orchestra. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," played by Koussevitsky here in his first season, will again be performed. This, one of the finest interpretations by the illustrious orchestra at the hands of its remarkable Russian conductor, has had particularly high praise for the poetic performances he has given it in this season's concerts. The only living composer figuring upon the program will be Richard Strauss, whose Dance of the Seven Veils from the opera, "Salome," will be played. This excerpt is filled with the characteristic voluptuous languors of the Orient and [illegible]

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
JAN 27 1929

Honegger 'Rugby' to Be Played

Heinrich Schlusnus in Concert at Peabody Friday

By CARROLL DULANEY.

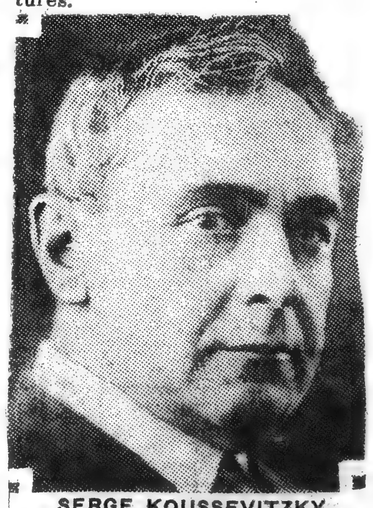
OUR music season is hitting on all cylinders just now. Tomorrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as director, gives its first concert of the season at the Lyric under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. And the program is one which should appeal in part to disciples of both the ancient and modern schools of music.

The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, which has a wealth of melody and haunting harmonies. It lacks the somber moods of the First and Fourth symphonies of the same master. Despite the oft-repeated assertion that no conductor not of Teutonic origin can understand Brahms' music, Mr. Koussevitzky has the reputation of giving it an interpretation that reveals much of its hidden beauty. How much of this is Brahms and how much of it Koussevitzky is for the captious hearer to judge, but certainly the result is very satisfying.

For those who like novelties Mr. Koussevitzky will present "Rugby," a new work by Honegger, which describes a football game. It attracted considerable attention in Europe when it was played between the halves of the international Rugby match in Paris.

Honegger's most famous work, perhaps, is his "Pacific 231," which is the composer's conception of an express train getting under way. It is a symphonic bedlam—one of those things which you should hear once.

The program will open with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," a delightful musical joke. The modern French school will be represented by Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," two brilliant impressionist pictures.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY HEINRI

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY will direct the co Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tom nus will give the artist recital at the Peabod Tiefenbrun will dance at the Peabody teacher

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 24 1929

operation.

Koussevitzky

Solists were once as customary with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as with most other orchestras. When Koussevitzky came to America to be the Boston Symphony conductor, he began by laying this tradition on the shelf. Soloists were not to be engaged simply for the sake of having soloists, but only when required by some score of symphonic interest which contained a solo part. The great concertos, of, say Beethoven or Brahms, had of course a legitimate place in the orchestral repertory, and called for a famous virtuoso to play them with the orchestra. An occasional modern score has solo voices; or a contemporary concerto of interest is written by such composers as Stravinsky, Prokokieff, Respighi, Tansman, Tailleferre, and these have appeared as guests of the orchestra in first performances of their scores. But a Boston Symphony concert remains in every case a symphony program, and does not lapse, in the middle, into a recital. "Praise the Lord," wrote Philip Hale, "the chief interest is no longer in the soloists at a symphony concert, what the woman will wear, whether Mme. Portamento is fatter than she was two seasons ago, whether Mr. Boanerges pounds the piano with more marked ferocity than when he first appeared with Lisztian arrangement of the hair. The orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky is the soloist." No soloists were announced in advance for Koussevitzky's first season, nor have any been announced for any season since. The innovation has been justified by the absence of any apparent regret on the part of the audiences. And symphonic interest and amplitude of the programs has been enriched accordingly. The Hartford concert is February 3, a week from next Sunday. Ticket sale at McCoy's, 98 Asylum Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 24 1929

Koussevitzky and Soloists

Soloists were once as customary with the Boston Symphony orchestra as with most other orchestras. When Koussevitzky came to America to be the Boston Symphony conductor, he began by laying this tradition on the shelf. Soloists were not to be engaged simply for the sake of having soloists, but only when required by some score of symphonic interest which contained a solo part. The great concertos of, say, Beethoven or Brahms, had of course a legitimate place in the orchestral repertory, and called for a famous virtuoso to play them with the orchestra. An occasional modern score has solo voices; or a contemporary concerto of interest is written by such composers as Stravinsky, Prokokieff, Respighi, Tansman, Tailleferre and these have appeared as guests of the orchestra in first performances of their scores, but a Boston Symphony concert remains in every case a symphony program, and does not lapse in the middle into a recital. "Praise the Lord," wrote Philip Hale, "the chief interest is no longer in the soloists at a symphony concert, what the woman will wear, whether Mme. Portamento is fatter than she was two seasons ago, whether Mr. Boanerges pounds the piano with more marked ferocity than when he first appeared with Lisztian arrangement of the hair. The orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky is the soloist." No soloists were announced in advance for Koussevitzky's first season, nor have any been announced for any season since. The innovation has been justified by the absence of any apparent regret on the part of the audiences. And symphonic interest and amplitude of the programs has been enriched accordingly. The Hartford concert is February 3, a week from next Sunday. Ticket sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

JAN 24 1929

SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY.

An interesting novelty to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert at the city auditorium next Tuesday night will be "Rugby," by Arthur Honegger, a contemporary French composer now in this country. The piece was played between the halves in the France-England international rugby football match in Paris. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the great orchestra and nobody will be admitted during the Beethoven third symphony. There are a few seats remainging at Walter D. Moses & Co.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JAN 24 1929

POLI'S—
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The symphony will be Brahms' Second in D Major, the performance of which is regarded as one of the outstanding achievements of the Boston Symphony. Other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; two of Erik Satie's "Gymnopedles," orchestrated by Debussy, and Maurice Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody in four movements. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

JAN 26 1929

VISITING orchestras will be the feature next week while the Philharmonic-Symphony players are away on tour. Tuesday evening the Philadelphia Orchestra will make its last appearance of the seasor, under the direction of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Eugene Goossens conducting the concert of March 5. The program Tuesday evening in Carnegie Hall will consist of Brahms's Second Symphony, Josef Hofmann's Symphonic narrative, "The Haunted Castle," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in Carnegie Hall. The first program will consist of Ernest Bloch's Rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's "Rugby," both of which have been played here; Prokafieff's "Classical" Symphony and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes." Saturday the opening numbers will be Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and Satie's "Gymnopedies," with "America" and "Rugby" to follow.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

JAN 26 1929

World of Music

Arthur Honegger: Close-up Impressions of a Celebrated Contemporary Composer

By FELIX DEYO.

WHETHER ARTHUR HONEGGER is clearly the foremost of the so-called modern school of composers is a question for later generations to decide; he and his contemporaries are far too close for a legitimate perspective. But only one so hopelessly biased against the composer of "Pacific, 231," "Horace Victorieux," "Le Roi David" and "Rugby" (this latter, by the way, will be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky at next Friday night's concert in Brooklyn by the Boston symphony Orchestra), as to be unable to see worth in him, would deny that Honegger is the most independent worker of to-day's major musicians.

It has long been apparent that Honegger is working hand in hand with no one but Arthur Honegger. Schools that have long claimed him have been repudiated almost before the disputants could find space for their arguments in the columns of periodicals that specialize in such matters. Almost instinctively, Honegger has contrived to steer a course between the Charybdis of brotherhood and the deep, blue sea of deliberate attempt to be Different.

* * *

FOR ONE NEED SPEND only a few minutes in conversation with the heavily-built young man to realize that he does not give even the least part of a moment's care to the problem of avoiding similarity to other composers, past or present. Honegger goes to hear contemporary or classic works, appreciates them sometimes and likes them often, but the fact that he hears to-day an opus that has identical points in form and manner with one that is under progress on his own desk at home will not make him change his own. There is a supreme confidence, almost a mystic belief, in the Honegger mind that the products of his talents will bear their distinctive markings without any deliberate seeking. And further, he wishes his compositions to fully speak for themselves as music (per se), without recourse to literary explanation.

The psychologists may point to this as a fault; it is evidence of an inferior mentality, they say, that a man can be unconscious and unconcerned with contemporaneous activity that bears upon his own. It is true, as Honegger admits of his friend Pablo Picasso, the painter, that the greater intelligence tends to be all-concerned, interested in nearly everything. Picasso, Honegger will tell you, is a tremendous brain. "He goes in that direction, and if you follow him, immediately he turns about and steers another course," the composer will say of the man who has the art galleries of two continents constantly worried over what he will do next. Honegger has been in the United States a short few weeks, and speaks English more by a sense of feeling than by knowledge. But he is learning quickly. Of Swiss parentage and born in Havre thirty-four years ago, he has spent the major part of his life in Paris and may therefore be set down as Parisian, which, in music, is almost an international label.

* * *

IT IS LIKELY that the observer will be impressed by his adaptability to environment as among Honegger's outstanding traits. Recently, spending two hours with him in interview, we found that already he is as well acquainted with the ramifications of the New York transit system as is the average native of Brooklyn or of the Bronx. And he can tell you of some very good places to eat and—eat. He will remark in the tone of voice of one who believes he is being very droll that never before in his life had he so much to drink as since his arrival in the land of prohibition.

He is completely at ease with strangers, if they be cordial-spoken, and will protest volubly if you ask him to play anything upon the grand piano which stands in the sitting room of his hotel suite. If you override his insistence that he has not played a piano in lo! these many years, he will seat himself at the keyboard and play salient excerpts from his works. Honegger is still European enough to consider good manners the emblem of good breeding, and he is acutely distressed if one of his visitors is inconvenienced even to the extent of reaching for an ash receiver. He laughs indulgently if you tell him that in the United States courtesy is held a sign of inferiority. And then offer you a chocolate.

Arthur Honegger has had his hair trimmed shorter for his American tour, probably because of warnings that, on this side of the water, males only if they are charlatans wear their tresses long. His sturdy figure is belied by a none too rosy complexion; his brow, and for that matter, all the skin of his face is as unroughened and fine textured as a baby's. His hands are facile, but not very strong in appearance, and he is addicted to loose comfort in dress and the smoking of a new, uncolored briar pipe.

Publicity methods amuse him. "In Paris, we too have such business," he will say, "but it is not there such a beeg industry."

* * *

NATURALLY, we talked of music, of his music and of others. "Bach is representative to me of the Christian life and ideal," declared this modernist with intense earnestness. (Need we recall the masterly polyphony and counterpoint of Honegger's own writings?) In modern France, Ravel and Milhaud stand foremost; Debussy and Franck already are pillars; Berlioz is better known in other countries than his own.

Hindemith in Germany, Stravinsky in Russia, De Falla in Spain, Goossens and Holst in England, these are foremost, thinks Honegger, amongst European contemporaries. Americans—Carpenter, Antheil, MacDowell.

Opera? Puccini, yes; Verdi—no! With the possible exception of "Falstaff," Verdi's melody, his harmony, his orchestra, are "vulgar and banal" (M. Honegger stepped to the piano and played a Verdi passage illustrative of his contention). On this point, we cannot strike a chord of agreement. But we have not heard, as yet, Honegger's own "Judith" (Biblical opera), being presented, it so happens, this very day in Chicago, with Mary Garden in the title role. Nor his more recent "Antigone."

Honegger, we might add, writes music exactly in the terms in which he feels it. He is not consciously a polytonalist or an atonalist, a quarter-tonalist, or an impressionist, a diatonicist or a chromaticist, etc., etc. He may command these idioms of tonal converse, but does not employ them except for the purpose of precise and direct expression. Nor does he specifically harmonize his themes or melodies. Both grow simultaneously. His harmony creates itself, the vertical chord product of two or more horizontally moving parts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 21 1929

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitcky announces a program of special interest for the coming appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford, in the Capitol theater, on Sunday afternoon, February 3. The symphony of the occasion will be the master score of Cesar Franck, the great Belgian composer. This symphony will comprise the latter part of the program, which will open with the 12th Concerto Grosso of Handel, for string orchestra. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," played by Koussevitsky here in his first season, will again be performed. This, one of the finest interpretations by the illustrious orchestra at the hands of its remarkable Russian conductor, has had particularly high praise for the poetic performances he has given it in this season's concerts. The only living composer figuring upon the program will be Richard Strauss, whose Dance of the Seven Veils from the opera, "Salome," will be played. This excerpt is filled with the characteristic voluptuous languors of the Orient, and is a graphic musical portrayal of biblical episode. It is a masterpiece of dark and splendid orchestral coloring. Ticket sale at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street. A splendid educational opportunity is afforded the music student to hear this great orchestra.

'Rugby' to Be Played

Heinrich Schlusnus in Concert at Peabody Friday

By CARROLL DULANEY.

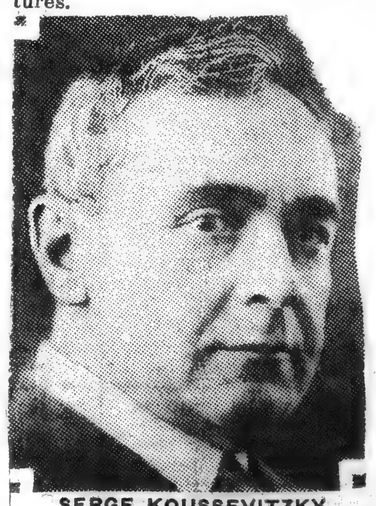
OUR music season is hitting on all cylinders just now. Tomorrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as director, gives its first concert of the season at the Lyric under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. And the program is one which should appeal in part to disciples of both the ancient and modern schools of music.

The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, which has a wealth of melody and haunting harmonies. It lacks the somber moods of the First and Fourth symphonies of the same master. Despite the oft-repeated assertion that no conductor not of Teutonic origin can understand Brahms' music, Mr. Koussevitzky has the reputation of giving it an interpretation that reveals much of its hidden beauty. How much of this is Brahms and how much of it Koussevitzky is for the captious hearer to judge, but certainly the result is very satisfying.

For those who like novelties Mr. Koussevitzky will present "Rugby," a new work by Honegger, which describes a football game. It attracted considerable attention in Europe when it was played between the halves of the international Rugby match in Paris.

Honegger's most famous work, perhaps, is his "Pacific 231," which is the composer's conception of an express train getting under way. It is a symphonic bedlam—one of those things which you should hear once.

The program will open with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," a delightful musical joke. The modern French school will be represented by Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," two brilliant impressionist pictures.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY HEINRI

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY will direct the c Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric to nus will give the artist recital at the Peabod Tiefenbrun will dance at the Peabody teache

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 27 1929

Boston Symphony in Concert—

Distinguished musical organization which will appear Tuesday night at the City Auditorium under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky (inset) in a program of important compositions, including several modern works. The concert is a conspicuously interesting event in the series under the direction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer. The orchestra numbers 112 musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 27 1929

Feature 'Eroica Of Beethoven Tuesday Night

One of the outstanding musical events of the current season will take place Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its 112 musicians and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at the City Auditorium as the third attraction in the series of five concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer. There will be a filled house to greet the event, it was said.

The symphony of the evening, which will open the program, will be the third of Beethoven, the "Eroica," and during its rendition no one will be seated, the management has announced. As this number represents half the program, it is important for the audience to be in place promptly, for Mr. Koussevitzky will step on the stage at the minute of the appointed time. This symphony was inspired by the early exploits of Beethoven's contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, in whom Beethoven, the idealist, saw the liberation of mankind from the tyranny of oppressive rules. When the composer learned that Napoleon was abusing his power and was becoming another tyrant, he destroyed the dedication in anger, but the great symphony remained. The slow movement is generally regarded the greatest funeral march ever conceived. Wagner and the ultra-modern French composer, Arthur Honegger, now in this country for the first time, will complete the list, which in detail is as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E flat major ..... Beethoven
- Allegro con brio
- Marcia fenebre: Adagio assai
- Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio
- Finale: Allegro molto

"Rugby," orchestral movement ..... Honegger

"Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner

Prelude to "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
JAN 27 1929

Under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following program in the Academy of Music on Friday evening:

Handel ..... Concerto Grosso in B minor
Debussy ..... "Nuage" and "Fetes"
Honegger ..... "Rugby," Football-piece
Bloch ..... "America"

Both the Honegger and the Bloch works will be heard for the first time in Brooklyn at this concert. It will be recalled that Mr. Bloch's "epic rhapsody" won the Musical America prize for the best orchestral work submitted in a contest which it held. "America" was first performed in New York by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch some weeks ago.

For the choral finale of "America," the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the assistance of a chorus comprised of members of the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 27 1929

Newman Gives Boston Symphony High Praises

Ernest Newman, the famous English critic heard the Boston Symphony and his estimate in part follows: "Certainly the prefection of the ensemble, the beauty of detail, and the rightness of the proportions in such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony are at once a delight and and a source of envy to a visitor from England. I never want or expect to hear more exquisite orchestral playing than I have heard during the last few days in Boston. The strings are lucid and lustrous, and the wood wind tone ravishing. But what has impressed me most in the orchestral playing has been the ensemble, the perfect fitting of detail to detail. The great tests of this have been the lighter Beethoven symphonies. To a certain extent any one can 'get away with it' in the big, pounding, full-blooded dramatic stuff, whether it be in concert room or in the theater. The real test is always the quieter stuff of art. The loud voice compels us to listen by virtue merely of loudness, but it takes brains and personality to be impressive over a long stretch of conversation in quiet tones.

"Mr. Koussevitzky's bigger Beethoven has been mighty" moving, as it always is for me; but it has been in the lighter Beethoven that both he and the orchestra have given me the delight of a first experience and 'Any one,' said Garrick, who was brilliant in both genres 'can do tradgedy; but to do comedy well is the very devil.' An inferior orchestra under Koussevitzky can, as we know in London, be made for a brief hour or so to rise beyond itself in the Eroica or the No. 9; it means that so strong an electric current has been sent through the conductor that for the moment it is raised to an incandescence of which we should have hardly though it capable. But the more delicate work finds an inferior orchestra out at once; it is easier to wield the hammer of Thor than spin the spider's web. I thought I knew Beethoven fairly well, but Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, have shown me aspects of his genius that have not been revealed to me before."

Seats are now on sale at McCoy's Inc., 89 Asylum Street, for the Hartford Concert which comes next Sunday, Feb. 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 27 1929

Boston Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY announces the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Poli's Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30, as follows:

The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, characterized by a semilyricism. It has none of the somber moods found in many pages of the first and fourth. The performance of this symphony at the hands of Koussevitzky is considered one of the most eloquent achievements of the great orchestra. Beethoven's famous overture to "Leonore," No. 3, will open the program. Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, will be played. The Spanish rhapsody of Maurice Ravel, foremost of living French composers, will also be played. The suite ends with a festal movement, entitled "The Fair."

Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 27 1929

ENRIQUE FERNANDEZ ARBOS conducted the thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 18 in Symphony Hall, where twenty-five years ago he sat on the platform as the concert master of that orchestra. Philip Hale, writing in The Boston Herald, pays the Spanish conductor the following tribute:

"Mr. Koussevitzky handed over to Mr. Arbos the superb orchestra which during the years of his engagement he has shaped and fashioned until, according to the testimony of visiting conductors acquainted with bands in Europe and this country, it is now without an equal. Mr. Arbos played upon this instrument as a musician and a virtuoso; a conductor, respecting the composer; ever mindful of them, without disturbing and unwelcome personal display, yet shining by the service he rendered them. To speak in detail of his qualities as a conductor would be superfluous, if not impertinent, for his reputation has long been established in Europe; his ability was fully recognized last season in New York, where he conducted several concerts.

"Take for example his interpretation yesterday of Wagner's Prelude. He remembered first of all that 'The Mastersingers' is a comedy; that the Prelude is joyous.

"Joyous, but with due consideration of the sections representing the square-toed, pedantic mastersingers; not forgetful of the lyric passages for Walther and Eva; a performance characterized by clarity even when there was extreme contrapuntal complexity; a buoyant spirit maintained throughout; a continuous flow of melody in which various episodes were not separate streams but tributaries to the mighty rush of the musical river, indispensable to the continuity. While there was an ever-present regard for details, they too contributed to the general effect and did not appear as if they were all-important.

"The spirit, the beauty and the strength of the performance were at once appreciated by the audience. The conductor and the orchestra were enthusiastically applauded; the former was thrice called to the platform. And enthusiasm reigned throughout the concert."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 27 1929

Three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third visit to New York this week will repeat performances of two notable "new" scores of the season. These are Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's football piece, "Rugby."

Mr. Koussevitzky was one of the judges with Mr. Damrosch and others who awarded "America" its prize, and this conductor introduced the score in Boston on Dec. 21. At his New York performances the final hymn will be sung by members of the Oratorio Society of this city and the New York University Glee Club.

Arthur Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" in Cambridge and Boston on Jan. 10, 11 and 12, and has likewise introduced it in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky will at each concert repeat performances of two notable new scores of the season—Ernest Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's football piece, "Rugby."

Koussevitzky was one of the judges who awarded "America" its prize, and this conductor introduced the score to Boston, Dec. 21. At the New York performances, the final hymn will be sung by members of the Oratorio Society of New York, and the New York University Glee Club. The plan of this rhapsody, now familiar, includes three parts, depicting the Indians and early settlers, the Civil War and the present and future of this American people, according to the vision of the composer.

Arthur Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" in Cambridge and Boston on Jan. 10, 11 and 12, and has likewise introduced it in New York.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the Thursday concert with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, and Debussy's "Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fetes." The opening numbers of the matinee will be Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Satie's "Gymnopedies" as orchestrated by Debussy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY—WEDNESDAY.

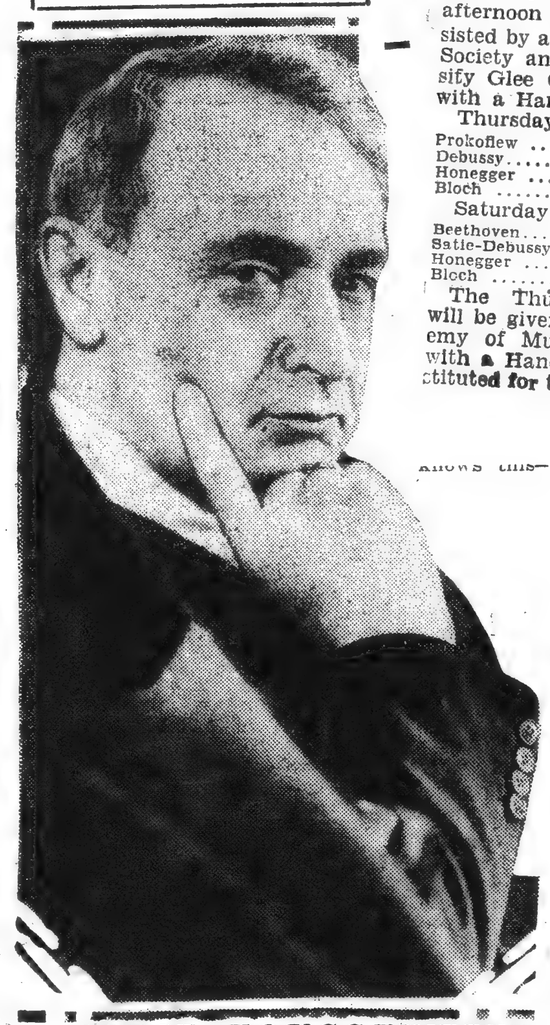
Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of two concerts to be given this season in Washington, Wednesday afternoon at 4:30, at Poli's Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Beethoven's famous Overture No. 3, to "Leonore," will open the program, which also will include "Gymnopedies," by Erik Satie, arranged for orchestra by Debussy; "Spanish Rhapsody," by Maurice Ravel, and "Symphony in D Major," by Brahms.

Tickets are on sale at the concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 27

CONDUCTS



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, with Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
JAN 27

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two Manhattan concerts during the coming week, on Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon in Carniegie Hall. Assisted by a chorus from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club, Serge Koussewitsky with a Handel concerto grosso sub-

Thursday evening:

Prokoflew ..... Classical Symphony
Debussy ..... "Nuage" and "Fetes"
Honegger ..... "Rugby"
Bloch ..... "America"

Saturday afternoon:

Beethoven ..... Overture, Leonora No. 3
Satie-Debussy ..... Gymnopedies
Honegger ..... "Rugby"
Bloch ..... "America"

The Thursday evening program will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, with a Handel concerto grosso substituted for the Prokoflew symphony.

...KOWS THIS—

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JAN 27 1929

Boston Symphony in Concert— Distinguished musical organization which will appear Tuesday night at the City Auditorium under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky (inset) in a program of important compositions, including several modern works. The concert is a conspicuously interesting event in the series under the direction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer. The orchestra numbers 112 musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky will at each concert repeat performances of two notable new scores of the season—Ernest Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's football piece, "Rugby."

Koussevitzky was one of the judges who awarded "America" its prize, and this conductor introduced the score to Boston, Dec. 21. At the New York performances, the final hymn will be sung by members of the Oratorio Society of New York, and the New York University Glee Club. The plan of this rhapsody, now familiar, includes three parts, depicting the Indians and early settlers, the Civil War and the present and future of this American people, according to the vision of the composer.

Arthur Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" in Cambridge and Boston on Jan. 10, 11 and 12, and has likewise introduced it in New York.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the Thursday concert with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, and Debussy's "Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fetes." The opening numbers of the matinee will be Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Satie's "Gymnopedies" orchestrated by Debussy.

THIS CL. PING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Feature 'Eroica Of Beethoven Tuesday Night

One of the outstanding musical events of the current season will take place Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its 112 musicians and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at the City Auditorium as the third attraction in the series of five concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer. There will be a filled house to greet the event, it was said.

The symphony of the evening, which will open the program, will be the third of Beethoven, the "Eroica," and during its rendition no one will be seated, the management has announced. As this number represents half the program, it is important for the audience to be in place promptly, for Mr. Koussevitzky will step on the stage at the minute of the appointed time. This symphony was inspired by the early exploits of Beethoven's contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, in whom Beethoven, the idealist, saw the liberation of mankind from the tyranny of oppressive rules. When the composer learned that Napoleon was abusing his power and was becoming another tyrant, he destroyed the dedication in anger, but the great symphony remained. The slow movement is generally regarded the greatest funeral march ever conceived. Wagner and the ultra-modern French composer, Arthur Honegger, now in this country for the first time, will complete the list, which in detail is as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E flat major ..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia fenebre: Adagio assai
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio
Finale: Allegro molto
"Rugby," orchestral movement ..... Honegger
"Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
Prelude to "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

JAN

Under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following program in the Academy of Music on Friday evening:

Handel ..... Concerto Grosso in B minor
Debussy ..... "Nuage" and "Fetes"
Honegger ..... "Rugby," Football-piece
Bloch ..... "America"

Both the Honegger and the Bloch works will be heard for the first time in Brooklyn at this concert. It will be recalled that Mr. Bloch's "epic rhapsody" won the Musical America prize for the best orchestral work submitted in a contest which it held. "America" was first performed in New York by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch some weeks ago.

For the choral finale of "America," the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the assistance of a chorus comprised of members of the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Newman Gives Boston Symphony High Praises

Ernest Newman, the famous English critic heard the Boston Symphony and his estimate in part follows: "Certainly the prefection of the ensemble, the beauty of detail, and the rightness of the proportions in such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony are at once a delight and and a source of envy to a visitor from England. I never want or expect to hear more exquisite orchestral playing than I have heard during the last few days in Boston. The strings are ... and lustrous, and the wood ... ravishing. But what has ... the most in the orchestral ... been the ensemble, the ... of detail to detail. The ... of this have been the ... Beethoven symphonies. To a ... extent any one can get away ... in the ... sounding, full-... sound to start, whether it ... concert room or in the theater, ... always the quicker ... of art. The loud voice compels ... to listen by virtue merely of loud-... but strikes brains and personal ... impressive over a long ... conversation in quiet tones. ... Koussevitzky's bigger Beethoven ... been mighty" moving, as it always is for me, but it has been in the Master Beethoven that both he and the orchestra have given me the delight of a first experience and 'Any ... and Garrick, who was brilliant ... both genres' 'can do tragedy; but ... to do comedy well is the very devil.' ... interior orchestra under Koussevitzky can, as we know in London, be made for a brief hour or so to rise ... itself in the Eroica or the No. 9; it means that so strong an electric current has been sent through the mass from the conductor that for the moment it is raised to an incandescence of which we should have hardly thought it capable. But the more delicate work finds an interior orchestra ... as on ... It is easier to wield the hammer of Thor than spin the spider's web. I thought I knew Beethoven fairly well, but Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, have shown me aspects of his genius that have not been revealed to me before."

Seats are now on sale at McCoy's Inc., 89 Asylum Street, for the Hartford Concert which comes next Sunday, Feb. 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

Boston Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY announces the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Poli's Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30, as follows:

The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, characterized by a semilyricism. It has none of the somber moods found in many pages of the first and fourth. The performance of this symphony at the hands of Koussevitzky is considered one of the most eloquent achievements of the great orchestra. Beethoven's famous overture to "Leonore," No. 3, will open the program. Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, will be played. The Spanish rhapsody of Maurice Ravel, foremost of living French composers, will also be played. The suite ends with a festal movement, entitled "The Fair."

Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

* * *

ENRIQUE FERNANDEZ ARBOS conducted the thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 18 in Symphony Hall, where twenty-five years ago he sat on the platform as the concert master of that orchestra. Philip Hale, writing in The Boston Herald, pays the Spanish conductor the following tribute:

"Mr. Koussevitzky handed over to Mr. Arbos the superb orchestra which during the years of his engagement he has shaped and fashioned until, according to the testimony of visiting conductors acquainted with bands in Europe and this country, it is now without an equal. Mr. Arbos played upon this instrument as a musician and a virtuoso; a conductor, respecting the composer; ever mindful of them, without disturbing and unwelcome personal display, yet shining by the service he rendered them. To speak in detail of his qualities as a conductor would be superfluous, if not impertinent, for his reputation has long been established in Europe; his ability was fully recognized last season in New York, where he conducted several concerts.

"Take for example his interpretation yesterday of Wagner's Prelude. He remembered first of all that 'The Mastersingers' is a comedy; that the Prelude is joyous.

"Joyous, but with due consideration of the sections representing the square-toed, pedantic mastersingers; not forgetful of the lyric passages for Walther and Eva; a performance characterized by clarity even when there was extreme contrapuntal complexity; a buoyant spirit maintained throughout; a continuous flow of melody in which various episodes were not separate streams but tributaries to the mighty rush of the musical river, indispensable to the continuity. While there was an ever-present regard for details, they too contributed to the general effect and did not appear as if they were all-important.

"The spirit, the beauty and the strength of the performance were at once appreciated by the audience. The conductor and the orchestra were enthusiastically applauded; the former was thrice called to the platform. And enthusiasm reigned throughout the concert."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES

JAN

Three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third visit to New York this week will repeat performances of two notable "new" scores of the season. These are Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's football piece, "Rugby."

Mr. Koussevitzky was one of the judges with Mr. Damrosch and others who awarded "America" its prize, and this conductor introduced the score in Boston on Dec. 21. At his New York performances the final hymn will be sung by members of the Oratorio Society of this city and the New York University Glee Club.

Arthur Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" in Cambridge and Boston on Jan. 10, 11 and 12, and has likewise introduced it in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

BOSTON SYMPHONY—WEDNESDAY.

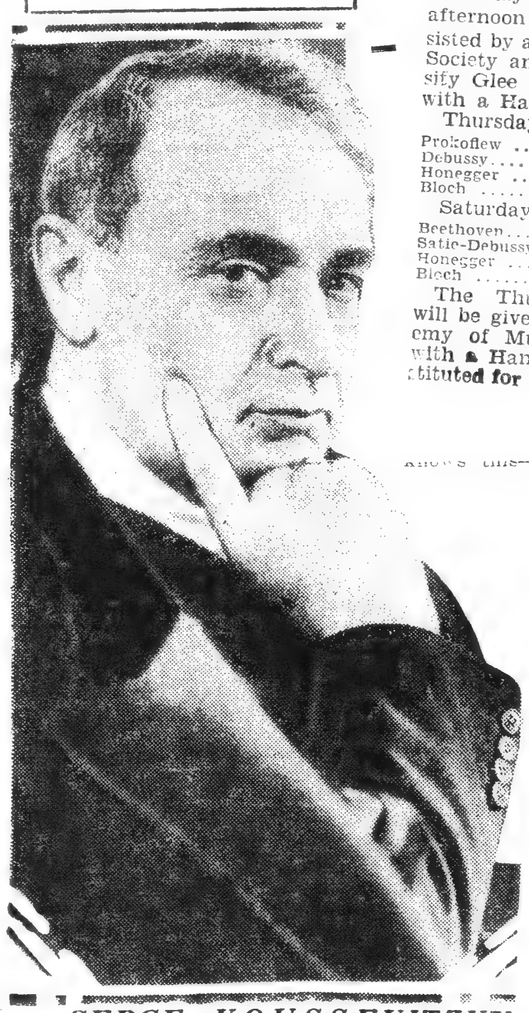
Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of two concerts to be given this season in Washington, Wednesday afternoon at 4:30, at Poli's Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Beethoven's famous Overture No. 3 to "Leonore," will open the program, which also will include "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie, arranged for orchestra by Debussy; "Spanish Rhapsody" by Maurice Ravel, and "Symphony in D Major," by Brahms.

Tickets are on sale at the concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

CONDUCTS



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, with Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN [illegible]

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two Manhattan concerts during the coming week, Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon in Carniegie Hall, assisted by a chorus from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, with a Handel concerto grosso on Thursday evening:

Prokoflew ..... Classical Debussy ..... "Nuage"
Honegger .....
Bloch .....

Saturday afternoon.

Beethoven ..... Overture, [illegible]
Satie-Debussy .....
Honegger .....
Bloch .....

The Thursday evening [illegible] will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening with a Handel concerto grosso substituted for the Prokoflew sym[illegible]

[illegible] knows this—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

82

...ert— Distinguished musical organization which will appear Tuesday night at the City Auditorium under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky (inset) in a program of important compositions, including several modern ... interesting event in the ... under the direction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by ... The orchestra numbers 112 musicians.

THIS CL...PPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 27 1929

Feature 'Eroica Of Beethoven Tuesday Night

One of the outstanding musical events of the current season will take place Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its 112 musicians and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at ...y Auditorium as the third attraction in the series of five concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer. There will be a filled house to greet the event, it was said.

The symphony of the evening, which will open the program, will be the third of Beethoven, the "Eroica," and during its rendition no one will be seated, the management has announced. As this number represents half the program, it is important for the audience to be in place promptly, for Mr. Koussevitzky will step on the stage at the minute of the appointed time. This symphony was inspired by the early exploits of Beethoven's contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, in whom Beethoven, the idealist, saw the liberation of mankind from the tyranny of oppressive rules. When the composer learned that Napoleon was abusing his power and was becoming another tyrant, he destroyed the dedication in anger, but the great symphony remained. The slow movement is generally regarded the greatest funeral march ever conceived. Wagner and the ultra-modern French composer, Arthur Honegger, now in this country for the first time, will complete the list, which in detail is as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E flat major ..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia fenebre: Adagio assai
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio
Finale: Allegro molto
"Rugby," orchestral movement ..... Honegger
"Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
Prelude to "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 27 1929

Newman Gives Boston Symphony High Praises

Ernest Newman, the famous English critic heard the Boston Symphony and his estimate in part follows: "Certainly the prefection of the ensemble, the beauty of detail, and the rightness of the proportions in such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony are at once a delight and and a source of envy to a visitor from England. I never want or expect to hear more exquisite orchestral playing than I have heard during the last few days in Boston. The strings are lucid and lustrous, and the wood wind tone ravishing. But what has impressed me most in the orchestral playing has been the ensemble, the perfect fitting of detail to detail. The great tests of this have been the lighter Beethoven symphonies. To a certain extent any one can 'get away with it' in the big, pounding, full-blooded dramatic stuff, whether it be in concert room or in the theater. The real test is always the quieter stuff of art. The loud voice compels us to listen by virtue merely of loudness, but it takes brains and personality to be impressive over a long stretch of conversation in quiet tones.

"Mr. Koussevitzky's bigger Beethoven has been mighty" moving, as it always is for me; but it has been in the lighter Beethoven that both he and the orchestra have given me the delight of a first experience and 'Any one,' said Garrick, who was brilliant in both genres, 'can do tradgedy: but to do comedy well is the very devil.' An inferior orchestra under Koussevitzky can, as we know in London, be made for a brief hour or so to rise beyond itself in the Eroica or the No. 9; it means that so strong an electric current has been sent through the mass from the conductor that for the moment it is raised to an incandescence of which we should have hardly though it capable. But the more delicate work finds an inferior orchestra out at once; it is easier to wield the hammer of Thor than spin the spider's web. I thought I knew Beethoven fairly well, but Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, have shown me aspects of his genius that have not been revealed to me before."

Seats are now on sale at McCoy's Inc., 89 Asylum Street, for the Hartford Concert which comes next Sunday, Feb. 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 27 1929

ENRIQUE FERNANDEZ ARBOS conducted the thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 18 in Symphony Hall, where twenty-five years ago he sat on the platform as the concert master of that orchestra. Philip Hale, writing in The Boston Herald, pays the Spanish conductor the following tribute:

"Mr. Koussevitzky handed over to Mr. Arbos the superb orchestra which during the years of his engagement he has shaped and fashioned until, according to the testimony of visiting conductors acquainted with bands in Europe and this country, it is now without an equal. Mr. Arbos played upon this instrument as a musician and a virtuoso; a conductor, respecting the composer; ever mindful of them, without disturbing and unwelcome personal display, yet shining by the service he rendered them. To speak in detail of his qualities as a conductor would be superfluous, if not impertinent, for his reputation has long been established in Europe; his ability was fully recognized last season in New York, where he conducted several concerts.

"Take for example his interpretation yesterday of Wagner's Prelude. He remembered first of all that 'The Mastersingers' is a comedy; that the Prelude is joyous.

"Joyous, but with due consideration of the sections representing the square-toed, pedantic mastersingers; not forgetful of the lyric passages for Walther and Eva; a performance characterized by clarity even when there was extreme contrapuntal complexity; a buoyant spirit maintained throughout; a continuous flow of melody in which various episodes were not separate streams but tributaries to the mighty rush of the musical river, indispensable to the continuity. While there was an ever-present regard for details, they too contributed to the general effect and did not appear as if they were all-important.

"The spirit, the beauty and the strength of the performance were at once appreciated by the audience. The conductor and the orchestra were enthusiastically applauded; the former was thrice called to the platform. And enthusiasm reigned throughout the concert."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 27 1929

Three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third visit to New York this week will repeat performances of two notable "new" scores of the season. These are Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's football piece, "Rugby."

Mr. Koussevitzky was one of the judges with Mr. Damrosch and others who awarded "America" its prize, and this conductor introduced the score in Boston on Dec. 21. At his New York performances the final hymn will be sung by members of the Oratorio Society of this city and the New York University Glee Club.

Arthur Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" in Cambridge and Boston on Jan. 10, 11 and 12, and has likewise introduced it in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
JAN 27 1929

Under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following program in the Academy of Music on Friday evening:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso in B minor
Debussy ......"Nuage" and "Fetes"
Honegger.....Rugby," Football-piece
Bloch .....America"

Both the Honegger and the Bloch works will be heard for the first time in Brooklyn at this concert. It will be recalled that Mr. Bloch's "epic rhapsody" won the Musical America prize for the best orchestral work submitted in a contest which it held. "America" was first performed in New York by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch some weeks ago.

For the choral finale of "America," the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the assistance of a chorus comprised of members of the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 27 1929

Boston Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY announces the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Poli's Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30, as follows:

The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, characterized by a semilyricism. It has none of the somber moods found in many pages of the first and fourth. The performance of this symphony at the hands of Koussevitzky is considered one of the most eloquent achievements of the great orchestra. Beethoven's famous overture to "Leonore" No. 3, will open the program. Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, will be played. The Spanish rhapsody of Maurice Ravel, foremost of living French composers, will also be played. The suite ends with a festal movement, entitled "The Fair."

Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky will at each concert rep...mances of two notable new scores of the season—Ernest Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America," and Arthur Honegger's football piece, "Rugby."

Koussevitzky was one of the judges who awarded "America" its prize, and this conductor introduced the score to Boston, Dec. 21. At the New York performances, the final hymn will be sung by members of the Oratorio Society of New York, and the New York University Glee Club. The plan of this rhapsody, now familiar, includes three parts, depicting the Indians and early settlers, the Civil War and the present and future of this American people, according to the vision of the composer.

Arthur Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" in Cambridge and Boston on Jan. 10, 11 and 12, and has likewise introduced it in New York.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the Thursday concert with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, and Debussy's "Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fetes." The opening numbers of the matinee will be Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Satie's "Gymnopedies" as orchestrated by Debussy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 27 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY—WEDNESDAY.

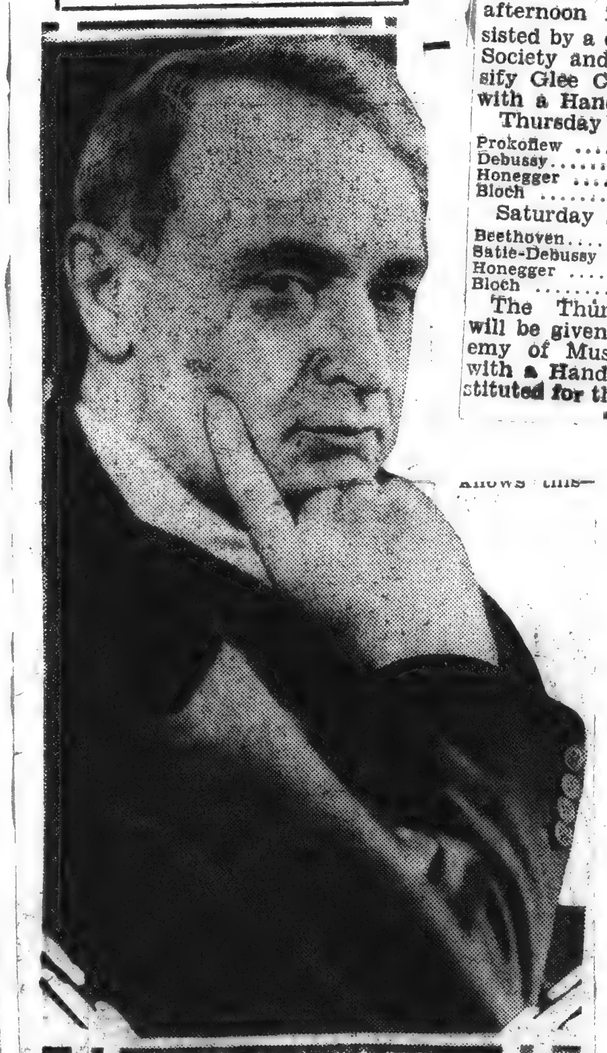
Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of two concerts to be given this season in Washington, Wednesday afternoon at 4:30, at Poli's Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Beethoven's famous Overture No. 3, to "Leonore," will open the program, which also will include "Gymnopedies," by Erik Satie, arranged for orchestra by Debussy; "Spanish Rhapsody," by Maurice Ravel, and "Symphony in D Major," by Brahms.

Tickets are on sale at the concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 27 1929

CONDUCTS



...KNOWS THIS—

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, with Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
JAN 27 ...

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two Manhattan concerts during the coming week, on Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon in Carniegie Hall. Assisted by a chorus from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club, Serge Koussewitsky with a Handel concerto grosso substituted Thursday evening:

Prokofiew ..... Classical Symphony
Debussy ....."Nuage" and "Fetes"
Honegger ..... Rugby"
Bloch ..... "America"

Saturday afternoon:

Beethoven.....Overture, Leonora No. 3
Satie-Debussy ..... Gymnopedies
Honegger ..... Rugby"
Bloch ..... "America"

The Thursday evening program will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, with a Handel concerto grosso substituted for the Prokofiew symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 27 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1928-29

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

MEET THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, which will be heard here in concert Sunday afternoon, February 3, at the Capitol Theater. This famous organization is above pictured for the first time by individual portraits of each player in his proper position as he appears at the symphony concerts this season. It will be seen at a glance how Conductor Koussevitzky masses the violins at his left, the violas and celli at his right, the wood-wind players directly before him and the brass behind them at rear right of stage.

FILMED AS BOUND

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1928-29

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

MEET THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, which will be heard here in concert Sunday afternoon, February 3, at the Capitol Theater. This famous organization is above pictured for the first time by individual portraits of each player in his proper position as he appears at the symphony concerts this season. It will be seen at a glance how Conductor Koussevitzky masses the violins at his left, the violas and celli at his right, the wood-wind players directly before him and the brass behind them at rear right of stage.

FILMED AS BOUND

84

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 27 1929

A CELEBRATED SYMPHONY BY BOSTON OUTFIT

Serge Koussevitzky announces the program for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Washington for its concert in Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30.

The symphony of the occasion will be the second of Brahms in D major. Of Brahms' four symphonies, this one perhaps is most characterized by a semilyricism. It has none of the somber moods found in many pages of the first and fourth. Brahms, the poet and romanticist, never found such noble expression as in this masterly score. Its themes are the inspiration of the great melodist, and in this respect this symphony alone places him beside Mozart and Schubert. The performance of this symphony at the hands of Koussevitzky is considered as one of the most eloquent achievements of the great orchestra under his regime.

The program will open with Beethoven's famous overture to "Leonore" No. 3. This score is particularly known by the trumpet calls played off stage, describing the deliverance of the imprisoned hero in Goethe's drama.

Erik Satie, the French composer, who died three years ago, wrote a succession of piano pieces, entitled "Gymnopedies." Two of these, as delicately orchestrated by Debussy, will be played on this program. "Gymnopedies" signifies ritual dances by naked youths in ancient Sparta. The boys danced about statues of the gods, performing slow, rhythmed movements.

The Spanish rhapsody of Maurice Ravel, foremost of living French composers, will also be played. The composers of France have long been intrigued by the characteristic dance rhythms and melodies of the land across the Pyrenees, and Ravel has most eloquently revealed this influence in his "Rapsodie Espagnole." The master colorist has scored in magnificent orchestral dress such characteristic dances of Spain as the "Habanera" and the "Malaguena." The suite ends with a festal movement entitled "The Fair."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 28 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

When Mr. Koussevitzky stands before his orchestra, though not in the sense a large man, he is a figure of commanding presence. His beat, though highly unconventional—and therefore exceedingly expressive—is remarkably clear. There is no such thing as getting lost for the musician who follows it conscientiously. The range of devices which Mr. Koussevitzky uses in making known his wishes to his men, in goading them on to heights of excitement are practically without limit. Hands are high or low or far to either side. Facial muscles are frequently in play and mouth and lips play no small part in making known the desired expressive effects. And despite such a wide range of conductor's signals, despite the ability of whipping his men to white heat by them, Mr. Koussevitzky knows how to remain within certain limits of poise. To his audience he never appears the madman wildly gesticulating. Of course the work of building his effects is done entirely in rehearsal. No conductor could depend upon personal magnetism alone to secure what he needs from his men. But to produce in them the proper state of mind at the exact moment when the effect is needed, to recall to them with utmost vividness the effect as planned and rehearsed, conductors' gesturing is calculated.

The Boston Symphony orchestra of the present he has made into an instrument unexcelled in responsiveness to his utmost demands. As an interpreter Mr. Koussevitzky is a musician who loves beauty of the sinuous, expressive, melodic line, who knows how to mould it artfully and exquisitely, to draw from it its last secret of expressive effect. He is supreme as an orchestral lyricist. Further emotion with him runs high. Never is the dramatic content of a work lost or understated. Mr. Koussevitzky is a great dramatizing force with whatever he undertakes. But at the same time his work remains as beautifully proportioned, as skilfully balanced as it is dramatically stimulating.

The Hartford concert is being presented by Frank A. Sedgwick at the Capitol theater February 3. Tickets at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 28 1929

SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY.

Every city and town in this section of Eastern Virginia will be represented in the audience that will be in the city auditorium tomorrow night to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, comprised of [illegible] musicians and headed by its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The program has been carefully chosen to suit all tastes, and indications are that there will not be a vacant seat.

Tickets in certain classes may still be had at Walter D. Moses & Company, but the number is now exceedingly limited, making immediate selection essential.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 28 1929

Boston Symphony

Several numbers of unusual interest and brilliance should make an event of the first significance in the coming concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Capitol Theater, on next Sunday afternoon, February 3.

Serge Koussevitzky will present as the principal number on the program Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D-minor," which has been called the greatest symphony of the last half century and certainly the greatest of the French school of music. Cesar Franck, the Belgian composer, filled his masterpiece with imposing sonorities and lyric beauty. The course of the symphony from its slow and mysterious introduction to its exalted close is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of the "organist of St. Clothilde." The middle movement and Allegretto has a beautiful song for the English horn solo and is the first instance of the use of this instrument in a symphony.

Franck's mighty score has taken its permanent place in the repertories of symphony orchestras the world over and he is universally

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 29 1929

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in a concert next Sunday at the Capitol Theater, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic Russian conductor whose readings and interpretations of the classics, and modern music, have placed him at the pinnacle of the world's greatest orchestral conductors. There is a slight change in the brilliant program announced; on account of the numerous requests for a Wagner number, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted the Tannhauser Overture instead of the Dance of Salome. The balance of the program is, Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra by Handel, Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussey, and Cesar Frank's symphony in D minor, which is considered one of the really great modern symphonies.

A special train will bring the Boston orchestra of 112 musicians here from New York. Several Pullman coaches and a baggage car is required to accommodate the men and their musical instruments, the larger instruments, such as basses, harps, brass instruments and tympanies, being packed in heavily padded trunks. When the concert at the Capitol theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence.

The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, playing also in Wilmington. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities visited by the orchestra. Seats for the concert may be secured at McCoy's, or mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 89 Asylum street, will be filled. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
JAN 29 1929

MUSIC

Boston Orchestra brings a Brahms Symphony to Poli's tomorrow afternoon; Harold Bauer and Beatrice Harrison play at Mayflower

By RUTH HOWELL

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the able baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will give one of two concerts here this season tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 at Poli's theater. To many this orchestra is the finest that visits Washington, and its greatness is largely attributed to its conductor, who has done wonders with the players during the short time he has been leading them.

The program tomorrow includes one of the most beautiful symphonies ever written, Brahms second in D major, a rich, happy, lovely thing. The complete program is:

Leonore Overture	Beethoven
Gymnopedies	Erik Satie
Spanish Rhapsody	Ravel
Symphony in D major	Brahms

* * *

Bauer and Miss Harrison

HAROLD BAUER, one of the great pianists of the last two decades, and Beatrice Harrison, brilliant English cellist, and called the greatest woman cellist, will offer the next to the last of Mrs. Lawrence Townsend's musical mornings at the Mayflower, tomorrow at 11:15. Bauer needs no introduction, tho he has not been heard here in popular recital in some time. Miss Harrison is new to the city. She was heard on the radio Sunday night, and her playing then promised great things for tomorrow morning.

The program will include a Brahms Sonata for cello and piano, Bach's Partita in B flat, Schumann's Novellette, a Tartini ario for cello, and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 29 1929

Capacity Crowd Expected To Hear Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is in Richmond accompanied by his 112 musicians and Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in order to appear tonight at the city auditorium at 8:30 o'clock before what promises to be a capacity audience. Patrons are urged to be on time, as nobody will be seated during the symphony, which comprises half the program.

Mr. Koussevitzky is regarded as one of the greatest orchestral conductors the world has known, and the concert here is an outstanding event in a gala season. A few seats can be had at Walter D. Moses & Company, and if any remain unsold they will be available at the auditorium after 7:30 o'clock.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 29 1929

Boston Symphony Will Present Beethoven's "Eroica" Tonight

By George Harris

Tonight in the City Auditorium, Richmond is to have its one symphony concert of the season. Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody are doing us the great kindness of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, for a concert of orchestral music. The program is one that contains the variety one would wish for in a single concert—a Beethoven Symphony, a piece by the extreme modernist, Honegger, and passages from two of Wagner's operas.

Beethoven's great Symphony No. 3, entitled "Eroica," opens the program. Although it is in four movements, Mr. Koussevitzky, in order to keep the proper unity of feeling throughout the work, does not wish to stop long enough between the movements to allow late comers to be seated. As this symphony lasts something like forty of forty-five minutes and as those that come late will therefore not get to their seats until the concert is nearly half over, it will be worth everybody's while to make the effort to be on time. These may seem like drastic measures, but for only too obvious reasons it is time that Richmond should follow the example of larger cities in adopting them. We only wish that a similar strictness had been employed during the performances of opera last week.

Inspired by Beethoven.

Beethoven's Third Symphony is the first of his symphonies that ranks with his greatest works. It was inspired by his stupendous admiration for Napoleon, and the work indeed has a marked feeling of heroism. But Beethoven's leanings were strongly toward Napoleon's republican ideals, and when he made himself emperor, which happened after the completion of the work, but before its publication or its first performance, Beethoven in fury tore up the title page, and substituted another, which read: "Heroic Symphony, to celebrate the memory of a great man."

The first of the four movements contains the strongest characterization of heroism in the whole work, a heroism that is, in turn, noble, tender, and strenuous. The second is a funeral march, in which spiritual uplift is contrasted with sorrow. Next comes a scherzo, excitedly joyful, relieved by a theme stated by a trio of trumpets, with its strongly military suggestion. The last movement is a theme with variations, the almost unchanging tonality that this form demands suggesting a strong integrity of character. It is a theme with variations, but strangely enough the real theme does not come until after there have been two or three variations. The bass part, over which the theme later soars, is stated first alone by plucked strings. It is only after this bass part has been improvised upon that the actual theme is allowed to pour itself fourth.

Honegger, the young Swiss composer, is one of the outstanding figures in the field of contemporaneous musical creation. He has, from what I hear, great powers of description, and has interpreted in music such things as the soul of a steam engine. His latest flight of imagination is along the line of school boys and football, with which "Rugby," which we are to hear tonight, deals. He is quite the greatest excitement of the present-day musical world, long articles about him appearing in the newspapers of big cities and even letters being written to the papers with strong feeling for and against. It will be interesting to see what impression this piece makes on us all tonight.

The passage out of "Siegfried" that we are to hear is connected with the old legend of the hero drinking the dragon's blood and gaining thereby miraculous powers. Siegfried has been born in the forest, his mother has died at his birth, and he has been reared by an ugly dwarf. Siegfried is the hero who knows no fear, and he has heard from the dwarf about a dragon, whom he is now in search of. The music we are to hear represents Siegfried resting in the forest, listening to a bird in the branches overhead.

The Language of the Bird.

After what we are to hear the dragon comes from his lair, Siegfried slays him, and in doing so tastes the dragon's blood on his hand. He immediately understands the language of the bird, who telis him of a beautiful maiden in an enchanted sleep on a rock surrounded by fire, and guides Siegfried thither, as he is the hero who is destined to spring through the fire and release the beautiful maiden from her enchantment. "Siegfried" is the third opera in Wagner's great cycle of four, "Der Ring des Nibelungen," but no more of the complicated story that runs through the four operas is necessary for the enjoyment of tonight's selection.

In "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner's one comedy, he philosophizes at length on the breaking down of old traditions in art. The kernel of the story is that Eva's hand is offered by her father to the man who sings the best. Walter, a stranger, comes before a committee of master singers for a preliminary trial, but is turned down because he does not conform to their traditions. But he is finally allowed to sing in the real contest, and sweeps them all before him with the inspired beauty of his song, thus winning the hand of the coveted Eva, who, of course, has been in love with him from the start. In the prelude we have music that portrays the pomposity of the tradition-ridden master singers, and also the music of Walter, free from tradition and inspired by sincere feeling. Walter's innovations do not seem very daring to us in this age, particularly tonight, after Honegger's "Rugby," but it is all very wonderful music, possibly Wagner's best.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 29 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a concert next Sunday at the Capitol theater, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic Russian conductor whose readings and interpretations of the classics and modern music have placed him at the pinnacle of the world's greatest orchestral conductors. There is a slight change in the brilliant program announced, on account of the numerous requests for a Wagner number, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted the Tannhauser Overture instead of the Dance of Salome. The balance of the program is: Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra by Handel; Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy, and Cesar Frank's symphony in D minor, which is considered one of the really great modern symphonies.

A special train will bring the Boston orchestra of 112 musicians here from New York. Several Pullman coaches and a baggage car is required to accommodate the men and their musical instruments, the larger instruments, such as basses, harps, brass instruments and tympanies, being packed in heavily padded trunks. When the concert at the Capitol theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence.

The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, playing also in Wilmington. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities visited by the orchestra. Seats for the concert may be secured at McCoy's, or mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 89 Asylum street, will be filled. Phone 2-2251.

84

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 27 1929

A CELEBRATED SYMPHONY BY BOSTON OUTFIT

Serge Koussevitzky announces the program for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Washington for its concert in Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30.

The symphony of the occasion will be the second of Brahms in D major. Of Brahms' four symphonies, this one perhaps is most characterized by a semilyricism. It has none of the somber moods found in many pages of the first and fourth. Brahms, the poet and romanticist, never found such noble expression as in this masterly score. Its themes are the inspiration of the great melodist, and in this respect this symphony alone places him beside Mozart and Schubert. The performance of this symphony at the hands of Koussevitzky is considered as one of the most eloquent achievements of the great orchestra under his regime.

The program will open with Beethoven's famous overture to "Leonore" No. 3. This score is particularly known by the trumpet calls played off stage, describing the deliverance of the imprisoned hero in Goethe's drama.

Erik Satie, the French composer, who died three years ago, wrote a succession of piano pieces, entitled "Gymnopedies." Two of these, as delicately orchestrated by Debussy, will be played on this program. "Gymnopedies" signifies ritual dances by naked youths in ancient Sparta. The boys danced about statues of the gods, performing slow, rhythmed movements.

The Spanish rhapsody of Maurice Ravel, foremost of living French composers, will also be played. The composers of France have long been intrigued by the characteristic dance rhythms and melodies of the land across the Pyrenees, and Ravel has most eloquently revealed this influence in his "Rapsodie Espagnole." The master colorist has scored in magnificent orchestral dress such characteristic dances of Spain as the "Habanera" and the "Malaguena." The suite ends with a festal movement entitled "The Fair."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 26 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

When Mr. Koussevitzky stands before his orchestra, though not in the sense a large man, he is a figure of commanding presence. His beat, though highly unconventional—and therefore exceedingly expressive—is remarkably clear. There is no such thing as getting lost for the musician who follows it conscientiously. The range of devices which Mr. Koussevitzky uses in making known his wishes to his men, in goading them on to heights of excitement are practically without limit. Hands are high or low or far to either side. Facial muscles are frequently in play and mouth and lips play no small part in making known the desired expressive effects. And despite such a wide range of conductor's signals, despite the ability of whipping his men to white heat by them, Mr. Koussevitzky knows how to remain within certain limits of poise. To his audience he never appears the madman wildly gesticulating. Of course the work of building his effects is done entirely in rehearsal. No conductor could depend upon personal magnetism alone to secure what he needs from his men. But to produce in them the proper state of mind at the exact moment when the effect is needed, to recall to them with utmost vividness the effect as planned and rehearsed, conductors' gesturing is calculated.

The Boston Symphony orchestra of the present he has made into an instrument unexcelled in responsiveness to his utmost demands. As an interpreter Mr. Koussevitzky is a musician who loves beauty of the sinuous, expressive, melodic line, who knows how to mould it artfully and exquisitely, to draw from it its last secret of expressive effect. He is supreme as an orchestral lyricist. Further emotion with him runs high. Never is the dramatic content of a work lost or understated. Mr. Koussevitzky is a great dramatizing force with whatever he undertakes. But at the same time his work remains as beautifully proportioned, as skilfully balanced as it is dramatically stimulating.

The Hartford concert is being presented by Frank A. Sedgwick at the Capitol theater February 3. Tickets at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 28 1929

SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY.

Every city and town in this section of Eastern Virginia will be represented in the audience that will be in the city auditorium tomorrow night to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, comprised of [illegible] musicians and headed by its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The program has been carefully chosen to suit all tastes, and indications are that there will not be a vacant seat.

Tickets in certain classes may still be had at Walter D. Moses & Company, but the number is now exceedingly limited, making immediate selection essential.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 28 1929

Boston Symphony

Several numbers of unusual interest and brilliance should make an event of the first significance in the coming concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Capitol Theater, on next Sunday afternoon, February 3.

Serge Koussevitzky will present as the principal number on the program Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D-minor," which has been called the greatest symphony of the last half century and certainly the greatest of the French school of music. Cesar Franck, the Belgian composer, filled his masterpiece with imposing sonorities and lyric beauty. The course of the symphony from its slow and mysterious introduction to its exalted close is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of the "organist of St. Clothilde." The middle movement and Allegretto has a beautiful song for the English horn solo and is the first instance of the use of this instrument in a symphony.

Franck's mighty score has taken its permanent place in the repertories of symphony orchestras the world over and he is universally

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in a concert next Sunday at the Capitol Theater, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic Russian conductor whose readings and interpretations of the classics, and modern music, have placed him at the pinnacle of the world's greatest orchestral conductors. There is a slight change in the brilliant program announced; on account of the numerous requests for a Wagner number, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted the Tannhauser Overture instead of the Dance of Salome. The balance of the program is, Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra by Handel, Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussey, and Cesar Frank's symphony in D minor, which is considered one of the really great modern symphonies.

A special train will bring the Boston orchestra of 112 musicians here from New York. Several Pullman coaches and a baggage car is required to accommodate the [illegible] their instruments, the larger instruments, such as basses, harps, brass instruments and tympanies, being packed in heavily padded trunks. When the concert at the Capitol theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence.

The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, playing also in Wilmington. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities visited by the orchestra. Seats for the concert may be secured at McCoy's, or mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 89 Asylum street, will be filled. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
JAN [illegible]

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 29 1929

Boston Symphony Will Present Beethoven's "Eroica" Tonight

By George Harris

Tonight in the City Auditorium, Richmond is to have its one symphony concert of the season. Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody are doing us the great kindness of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, for a concert of orchestral music. The program is one that contains the variety one would wish for in a single concert—a Beethoven Symphony, a piece by the extreme modernist, Honegger, and passages from two of Wagner's operas.

Beethoven's great Symphony No. 3, entitled "Eroica," opens the program. Although it is in four movements, Mr. Koussevitzky, in order to keep the proper unity of feeling throughout the work, does not wish to stop long enough between the movements to allow late comers to be seated. As this symphony lasts something like forty of forty-five minutes and as those that come late will therefore not get to their seats until the concert is nearly half over, it will be worth everybody's while to make the effort to be on time. These may seem like drastic measures, but for only too obvious reasons it is time that Richmond should follow the example of larger cities in adopting them. We only wish that a similar strictness had been employed during the performances of opera last week.

Inspired by Beethoven.

Beethoven's Third Symphony is the first of his symphonies that ranks with his greatest works. It was inspired by his stupendous admiration for Napoleon, and the work indeed has a marked feeling of heroism. But Beethoven's leanings were strongly toward Napoleon's republican ideals, and when he made himself emperor, which happened after the completion of the work, but before its publication or its first performance, Beethoven in fury tore up the title page, and substituted another, which read: "Heroic Symphony, to celebrate the memory of a great man."

The first of the four movements contains the strongest characterization of heroism in the whole work, a heroism that is, in turn, noble, tender, and strenuous. The second is a funeral march, in which spiritual uplift is contrasted with sorrow. Next comes a scherzo, excitedly joyful, relieved by a theme stated by a trio of trumpets, with its strongly military suggestion. The last movement is a theme with variations, the almost unchanging tonality that this form demands suggesting a strong integrity of character. It is a theme with variations, but strangely enough the real theme does not come until after there have been two or three variations. The bass part, over which the theme later soars, is stated first alone by plucked strings. It is only after this bass part has been improvised upon that the actual theme is allowed to pour itself fourth.

Honegger, the young Swiss composer, is one of the outstanding figures in the field of contemporaneous musical creation. He has, from what I hear, great powers of description, and has interpreted in music such things as the soul of a steam engine. His latest flight of imagination is along the line of school boys and football, with which "Rugby," which we are to hear tonight, deals. He is quite the greatest excitement of the present-day musical world, long articles about him appearing in the newspapers of big cities and even letters being written to the papers with strong feeling for and against. It will be interesting to see what impression this piece makes on us all tonight.

The passage out of "Siegfried" that we are to hear is connected with the old legend of the hero drinking the dragon's blood and gaining thereby miraculous powers. Siegfried has been born in the forest, his mother has died at his birth, and he has been reared by an ugly dwarf. Siegfried is the hero who knows no fear, and he has heard from the dwarf about a dragon, whom he is now in search of. The music we are to hear represents Siegfried resting in the forest, listening to a bird in the branches overhead.

The Language of the Bird.

After what we are to hear the dragon comes from his lair, Siegfried slays him, and in doing so tastes the dragon's blood on his hand. He immediately understands the language of the bird, who tells him of a beautiful maiden in an enchanted sleep on a rock surrounded by fire, and guides Siegfried thither, as he is the hero who is destined to spring through the fire and release the beautiful maiden from her enchantment. "Siegfried" is the third opera in Wagner's great cycle of four, "Der Ring des Nibelungen," but no more of the complicated story that runs through the four operas is necessary for the enjoyment of tonight's selection.

In "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner's one comedy, he philosophizes at length on the breaking down of old traditions in art. The kernel of the story is that Eva's hand is offered by her father to the man who sings the best. Walter, a stranger, comes before a committee of master singers for a preliminary trial, but is turned down because he does not conform to their traditions. But he is finally allowed to sing in the real contest, and sweeps them all before him with the inspired beauty of his song, thus winning the hand of the coveted Eva, who, of course, has been in love with him from the start. In the prelude we have music that portrays the pomposity of the tradition-ridden master singers, and also the music of Walter, free from tradition and inspired by sincere feeling. Walter's innovations do not seem very daring to us in this age, particularly tonight, after Honegger's "Rugby," but it is all very wonderful music, possibly Wagner's best.

MUSIC

Boston Orchestra brings a Brahms Symphony to Poli's tomorrow afternoon; Harold Bauer and Beatrice Harrison play at Mayflower

By RUTH HOWELL

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the able baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will give one of two concerts here this season tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 at Poli's theater. To many this orchestra is the finest that visits Washington, and its greatness is largely attributed to its conductor, who has done wonders with the players during the short time he has been leading them.

The program tomorrow includes one of the most beautiful symphonies ever written, Brahms second in D major, a rich, happy, lovely thing. The complete program is:

Leonore Overture	Beethoven
Gymnopedies	Erik Satie
Spanish Rhapsody	Ravel
Symphony in D major	Brahms

* * *

Bauer and Miss Harrison

HAROLD BAUER, one of the great pianists of the last two decades, and Beatrice Harrison, brilliant English cellist, and called the greatest woman cellist, will offer the next to the last of Mrs. Lawrence Townsend's musical mornings at the Mayflower, tomorrow at 11:15. Bauer needs no introduction, tho he has not been heard here in popular recital in some time. Miss Harrison is new to the city. She was heard on the radio Sunday night, and her playing then promised great things for tomorrow morning.

The program will include a Brahms Sonata for cello and piano, Bach's Partita in B flat, Schumann's Novellette, a Tartini ario for cello, and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 29 1929

Capacity Crowd Expected To Hear Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is in Richmond accompanied by his 112 musicians and Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in order to appear tonight at the city auditorium at 8:30 o'clock before what promises to be a capacity audience. Patrons are urged to be on time, as nobody will be seated during the symphony, which comprises half the program.

Mr. Koussevitzky is regarded as one of the greatest orchestral conductors the world has known, and the concert here is an outstanding event in a gala season. A few seats can be had at Walter D. Moses & Company, and if any remain unsold they will be available at the auditorium after 7:30 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 29 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a concert next Sunday at the Capitol theater, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic Russian conductor whose readings and interpretations of the classics and modern music have placed him at the pinnacle of the world's greatest orchestral conductors. There is a slight change in the brilliant program announced, on account of the numerous requests for a Wagner number, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted the Tannhauser Overture instead of the Dance of Salome. The balance of the program is: Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra by Handel; Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy, and Cesar Frank's symphony in D minor, which is considered one of the really great modern symphonies.

A special train will bring the Boston orchestra of 112 musicians here from New York. Several Pullman coaches and a baggage car is required to accommodate the men and their musical instruments, the larger instruments, such as basses, harps, brass instruments and tympanies, being packed in heavily padded trunks. When the concert at the Capitol theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence.

The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, playing also in Wilmington. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities visited by the orchestra. Seats for the concert may be secured at McCoy's, or mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 89 Asylum street, will be filled. Phone 2-2251.

84

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 27 1929

A CELEBRATED SYMPHONY BY BOSTON OUTFIT

Serge Koussevitzky announces the program for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Washington for its concert in Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, January 30, at 4:30.

The symphony of the occasion will be the second of Brahms in D major. Of Brahms' four symphonies, this one perhaps is most characterized by a semilyricism. It has none of the somber moods found in many pages of the first and fourth. Brahms, the poet and romanticist, never found such noble expression as in this masterly score. Its themes are the inspiration of the great melodist, and in this respect this symphony alone places him beside Mozart and Schubert. The performance of this symphony at the hands of Koussevitzky is considered as one of the most eloquent achievements of the great orchestra under his regime.

The program will open with Beethoven's famous overture to "Leonore" No. 3. This score is particularly known by the trumpet calls played off stage, describing the deliverance of the imprisoned hero in Goethe's drama.

Erik Satie, the French composer, who died three years ago, wrote a succession of piano pieces, entitled "Gymnopedies." Two of these, as delicately orchestrated by Debussy, will be played on this program. "Gymnopedies" signifies ritual dances by naked youths in ancient Sparta. The boys danced about statues of the gods, performing slow, rhythmed movements.

The Spanish rhapsody of Maurice Ravel, foremost of living French composers, will also be played. The composers of France have long been intrigued by the characteristic dance rhythms and melodies of the land across the Pyrenees, and Ravel has most eloquently revealed this influence in his "Rapsodie Espagnole." The master colorist has scored in magnificent orchestral dress such characteristic dances of Spain as the "Habanera" and the "Malaguena." The suite ends with a festal movement entitled "The Fair."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 28 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

When Mr. Koussevitzky stands before his orchestra, though not in the sense a large man, he is a figure of commanding presence. His beat, though highly unconventional—and therefore exceedingly expressive—is remarkably clear. There is no such thing as getting lost for the musician who follows it conscientiously. The range of devices which Mr. Koussevitzky uses in making known his wishes to his men, in goading them on to heights of excitement are practically without limit. Hands are high or low or far to either side. Facial muscles are frequently in play and mouth and lips play no small part in making known the desired expressive effects. And despite such a wide range of conductor's signals, despite the ability of whipping his men to white heat by them, Mr. Koussevitzky knows how to remain within certain limits of poise. To his audience he never appears the madman wildly gesticulating. Of course the work of building his effects is done entirely in rehearsal. No conductor could depend upon personal magnetism alone to secure what he needs from his men. But to produce in them the proper state of mind at the exact moment when the effect is needed, to recall to them with utmost vividness the effect as planned and rehearsed, conductors' gesturing is calculated.

The Boston Symphony orchestra of the present he has made into an instrument unexcelled in responsiveness to his utmost demands. As an interpreter Mr. Koussevitzky is a musician who loves beauty of the sinuous, expressive, melodic line, who knows how to mould it artfully and exquisitely, to draw from it its last secret of expressive effect. He is supreme as an orchestral lyricist. Further emotion with him runs high. Never is the dramatic content of a work lost or understated. Mr. Koussevitzky is a great dramatizing force with whatever he undertakes. But at the same time his work remains as beautifully proportioned, as skilfully balanced as it is dramatically stimulating.

The Hartford concert is being presented by Frank A. Sedgwick at the Capitol theater February 3. Tickets at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 28 1929

SYMPHONY HERE TUESDAY.

Every city and town in this section of Eastern Virginia will be represented in the audience that will be in the city auditorium tomorrow night to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, comprised of [illegible] musicians and headed by its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The program has been carefully chosen to suit all tastes, and indications are that there will not be a vacant seat.

Tickets in certain classes may still be had at Walter D. Moses & Company, but the number is now exceedingly limited, making immediate selection essential.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 28 1929

Boston Symphony

Several numbers of unusual interest and brilliance should make an event of the first significance in the coming concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Capitol Theater, on next Sunday afternoon, February 3.

Serge Koussevitzky will present as the principal number on the program Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D-minor," which has been called the greatest symphony of the last half century and certainly the greatest of the French school of music. Cesar Franck, the Belgian composer, filled his masterpiece with imposing sonorities and lyric beauty. The course of the symphony from its slow and mysterious introduction to its exalted close is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of the "organist of St. Clothilde." The middle movement and Allegretto has a beautiful song for the English horn solo and is the first instance of the use of this instrument in a symphony.

Franck's mighty score has taken its permanent place in the repertories of symphony orchestras the world over and he is universally accepted as probably the most glorious affirmation of faith in modern music.

Having received numerous requests for a Wagner number, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted the Tannhauser Overture, Wagner, for the Strauss Dance of Salome.

The seat sale is at McCoy's.

the dynamic Russian conductor whose readings and interpretations of the classics, and modern music, have placed him at the pinnacle of the world's greatest orchestral conductors. There is a slight change in the brilliant program announced; on account of the numerous requests for a Wagner number, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted the Tannhauser Overture instead of the Dance of Salome. The balance of the program is, Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra by Handel, Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy, and Cesar Frank's symphony in D minor, which is considered one of the really great modern symphonies.

A special train will bring the Boston orchestra of 112 musicians here from New York. Several Pullman coaches and a baggage car is required to accommodate the men and their musical instruments, the larger instruments, such as basses, harps, brass instruments and tympani, being packed in heavily padded trunks. When the concert at the Capitol Theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence

Seats for the concert may be secured at McCoy's; or mail [illegible] dressed to [illegible]

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 29 1929

Boston Symphony Will Present Beethoven's "Eroica" Tonight

By George Harris

Tonight in the City Auditorium, Richmond is to have its one symphony concert of the season. Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody are doing us the great kindness of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, for a concert of orchestral music. The program is one that contains the variety one would wish for in a single concert—a Beethoven Symphony, a piece by the extreme modernist, Honegger, and passages from two of Wagner's operas.

Beethoven's great Symphony No. 3, entitled "Eroica," opens the program. Although it is in four movements, Mr. Koussevitzky, in order to keep the proper unity of feeling throughout the work, does not wish to stop long enough between the movements to allow late comers to be seated. As this symphony lasts something like forty of forty-five minutes and as those that come late will therefore not get to their seats until the concert is nearly half over, it will be worth everybody's while to make the effort to be on time. These may seem like drastic measures, but for only too obvious reasons it is time that Richmond should follow the example of larger cities in adopting them. We only wish that a similar strictness had been employed during the performances of opera last week.

Inspired by Beethoven.

Beethoven's Third Symphony is the first of his symphonies that ranks with his greatest works. It was inspired by his stupendous admiration for Napoleon, and the work indeed has a marked feeling of heroism. But Beethoven's leanings were strongly toward Napoleon's republican ideals, and when he made himself emperor, which happened after the completion of the work, but before its publication or its first performance, Beethoven in fury tore up the title page, and substituted another, which read: "Heroic Symphony, to celebrate the memory of a great man."

The first of the four movements contains the strongest characterization of heroism in the whole work, a heroism that is, in turn, noble, tender, and strenuous. The second is a funeral march, in which spiritual uplift is contrasted with sorrow. Next comes a scherzo, excitedly joyful, relieved by a theme stated by a trio of trumpets, with its strongly military suggestion. The last movement is a theme with variations, the almost unchanging tonality that this form demands suggesting a strong integrity of character. It is a theme with variations, but strangely enough the real theme does not come until after there have been two or three variations. The bass part, over which the theme later soars, is stated first alone by plucked strings. It is only after this bass part has been improvised upon that the actual theme is allowed to pour itself fourth.

Honegger, the young Swiss composer, is one of the outstanding figures in the field of contemporaneous musical creation. He has, from what I hear, great powers of description, and has interpreted in music such things as the soul of a steam engine. His latest flight of imagination is along the line of school boys and football, with which "Rugby," which we are to hear tonight, deals. He is quite the greatest excitement of the present-day musical world, long articles about him appearing in the newspapers of big cities and even letters being written to the papers with strong feeling for and against. It will be interesting to see what impression this piece makes on us all tonight.

The passage out of "Siegfried" that we are to hear is connected with the old legend of the hero drinking the dragon's blood and gaining thereby miraculous powers. Siegfried has been born in the forest, his mother has died at his birth, and he has been reared by an ugly dwarf. Siegfried is the hero who knows no fear, and he has heard from the dwarf about a dragon, whom he is now in search of. The music we are to hear represents Siegfried resting in the forest, listening to a bird in the branches overhead.

The Language of the Bird.

After what we are to hear the dragon comes from his lair, Siegfried slays him, and in doing so tastes the dragon's blood on his hand. He immediately understands the language of the bird, who tells him of a beautiful maiden in an enchanted sleep on a rock surrounded by fire, and guides Siegfried thither, as he is the hero who is destined to spring through the fire and release the beautiful maiden from her enchantment. "Siegfried" is the third opera in Wagner's great cycle of four, "Der Ring des Nibelungen," but no more of the complicated story that runs through the four operas is necessary for the enjoyment of tonight's selection.

In "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner's one comedy, he philosophizes at length on the breaking down of old traditions in art. The kernel of the story is that Eva's hand is offered by her father to the man who sings the best. Walter, a stranger, comes before a committee of master singers for a preliminary trial, but is turned down because he does not conform to their traditions. But he is finally allowed to sing in the real contest, and sweeps them all before him with the inspired beauty of his song, thus winning the hand of the coveted Eva, who, of course, has been in love with him from the start. In the prelude we have music that portrays the pomposity of the tradition-ridden master singers, and also the music of Walter, free from tradition and inspired by sincere feeling. Walter's innovations do not seem very daring to us in this age, particularly tonight, after Honegger's "Rugby," but it is all very wonderful music, possibly Wagner's best.

C

Symphony
rold Bauer
eatrice Harrison play at Mayflower

By RUTH HOWELL

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the fine baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will give one of two concerts here this season tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 at Poli's theater. To many this orchestra is the finest that visits Washington, and its greatness is largely attributed to its conductor, who has done wonders with the players during the short time he has been leading them.

The program tomorrow includes one of the most beautiful symphonies ever written, Brahms second in D major, a rich, happy, lovely thing. The complete program is:

Leonore Overture	Beethoven
Gymnopedies	Erik Satie
Spanish Rhapsody	Ravel
Symphony in D major	Brahms

* * *

Bauer and Miss Harrison

HAROLD BAUER, one of the great pianists of the last two decades, and Beatrice Harrison, brilliant English cellist, and called the greatest woman cellist, will offer the next to the last of Mrs. Lawrence Townsend's musical mornings at the Mayflower, tomorrow at 11:15. Bauer needs no introduction, tho he has not been heard here in popular recital in some time. Miss Harrison is new to the city. She was heard on the radio Sunday night, and her playing then promised great things for tomorrow morning.

The program will include a Brahms Sonata for cello and piano, Bach's Partita in B flat, Schumann's Novellette, a Tartini ario for cello, and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 29 1929

Capacity Crowd Expected To Hear Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is in Richmond accompanied by his 112 musicians and Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in order to appear tonight at the city auditorium at 8:30 o'clock before what promises to be a capacity audience. Patrons are urged to be on time, as nobody will be seated during the symphony, which comprises half the program.

Mr. Koussevitzky is regarded as one of the greatest orchestral conductors the world has known, and the concert here is an outstanding event in a gala season. A few seats can be had at Walter D. Moses & Company, and if any remain unsold they will be available at the auditorium after 7:30 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 29 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a concert next Sunday at the Capitol theater, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic Russian conductor whose readings and interpretations of the classics and modern music have placed him at the pinnacle of the world's greatest orchestral conductors. There is a slight change in the brilliant program announced, on account of the numerous requests for a Wagner number, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted the Tannhauser Overture instead of the Dance of Salome. The balance of the program is: Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra by Handel; Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy, and Cesar Frank's symphony in D minor, which is considered one of the really great modern symphonies.

A special train will bring the Boston orchestra of 112 musicians here from New York. Several Pullman coaches and a baggage car is required to accommodate the men and their musical instruments, the larger instruments, such as basses, harps, brass instruments and tympanies, being packed in heavily padded trunks. When the concert at the Capitol theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence.

The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, playing also in Wilmington. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities visited by the orchestra. Seats for the concert may be secured at McCoy's, or mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 89 Asylum street, will be filled. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
JAN 29 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD AT LYRIC

Honegger's "Rugby" Presented As Novelty—Prokofieff Piece In Same Class

If we cannot have Arthur Honegger, distinguished member of the former Paris "Bix Six" and author of "Pacifique 231" of disturbing memory, with us in the flesh, we are at least able to hear one of the latest products of this modernist, his so-called Symphonic Movement "Rugby," thanks to the enterprise and catholic taste of Serge Koussevitzky, the stimulating conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which presented the latest of the Honegger creations to agitate the musical world at the Lyric last night.

A Paris reviewer informs us that "Rugby" belongs in the same category with "Pacifique 231," but that, in his opinion, it is superior to the earlier work, for, while "Pacifique" contained a quality of descriptive realism, especially in the locomotive scene theme, with its whistlings and puffings, which rather shocked him, in "Rugby" all materialistic descriptions have been omitted. Pursuing the argument, the reviewer says: "The different phases of the game, the tacklings, the escape of the player with the ball, the pursuits—all these incidents can be expressed by figures of geometric precision, which mysteriously find their equivalent in the play of the counterpoint."

Tonal Juggling

Even if this be admitted, the question which presents itself is what all the tonal juggling has to do with real music. There are certain manipulations in arithmetic which may be termed ingenious and belong in the class of tricks, but they still bear no real relationship to the science of figures, which has a serious and logical purpose.

"Rugby" unquestionably has numerous exceedingly clever orchestral devices and makes skillful use of them, but the resultant product is hardly of a kind that awakens sensations such as those commonly associated with music. There are climaxes, great crashes, pulsating and stirring as well as exceedingly novel tonal effects, but to the ordinary mind music is something sustained, orderly and susceptible of development. It is interesting to note that Mr. Honegger ends his picture in a decidedly orthodox manner with some appealing harmonies.

The "movement," of course, was brilliantly played, Mr. Koussevitzky having a flair for spectacular effects. His organization follows his directions and expresses his intentions with remarkable responsiveness.

Prokofieff's "Classical"

The Bostonians provided another novelty in the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony, wherein this Russian composer gives his ideas upon how Mozart might have written his works if he were living at the present time. Such speculations are more interesting than valuable. Mozart was a product of his time and the nature of his work was determined by the conditions that surrounded him. His compositions have an essentially aristocratic mold and superlative beauty of form largely, perhaps, because the period in which he lived stressed these qualities so far as the dominating classes were concerned. Had his environment been otherwise he might have developed a far different strain.

Mozart a la Prokofieff is a person in whom the sense of beauty is displaced by ingeniousness. He employs engaging rhythms and there is lightness, but this lightness is of a rather edgy sort, with the curves eliminated. This edginess is not pressed to the point of acridity, but its sharpness is constantly felt nonetheless. The interpretation given by the orchestra was masterly and the piece as a whole proved engrossing because of its novelty, even if it did not stir the emotions.

F. W. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
JAN 29 1929

Music

By FELIX DEYO

TWO NOVELTIES ON BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROGRAMME

TWO NEW SCORES which have made a notable impression this season, namely, Ernest Bloch's Epic Rhapsody "America" and Arthur Honegger's "Rugby," will have their first Brooklyn performances next Friday evening (Academy of Music), at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series. They will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The programme's other numbers are Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12, and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes."

Bloch's "America" is the composition awarded the $3,000 prize in "Musical America's" recent symphony contest. Judges were Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock and Alfred Hertz. Dedicated to Whitman and Abraham Lincoln, the rhapsody is divided into three parts, the first depicting the land of the Indians and the early Puritan settlers. The second movement entitled "Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow," takes the Civil War for its subject, giving a romantic picture of the old South, in which old Southern melodies are introduced. The serenity is broken by the coming of war. The third movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," sets forth to-day's Jazz age, and thence builds up hopes of an ideal future. The climax of the composition is a Hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. This final chorus will be sung by members of the Oratorio Society of New York and the New York University Glee Club.

Arthur Honegger, foremost of the younger French school composers, is now visiting America for the first time. Composer of the famous locomotive piece "Pacific, 231," Honegger in "Rugby" describes the more human rhythms and impacts of a football game.

The origin of "Rugby" was described last October by Henry Prunieres, eminent French critic, in a despatch from Paris to the New York "Times":

"Arthur Honegger is a sport 'fan.' In his adolescent years he participated in football games and bicycle races with the utmost enthusiasm. To-day he contents himself with attending the games of others, and he never misses an important match. He once said to a sports writer that when looking at a football or Rugby championship game he feels the musical equivalent of the sporting emotions, and that he can distinctly visualize an orchestral piece which would express them. The journalist promptly announced that Honegger was at work on a symphonic piece called 'Rugby.'

"Honegger was greatly amused by the news item, because previous to his conversation with the sports writer the idea of writing such a composition never entered his mind. Nevertheless he began to consider such a possibility and when the new Symphonic Orchestra of Paris asked him to present this much discussed 'Rugby' at its inauguration concert he decided to write it. The composition was revealed to us on Oct. 19, conducted by Ansermet.

"The composition is constructed somewhat in the manner of a symphonic scherzo. Abrupt, broken, syncopated rhythms marvelously express the feeling of frustrated effort we experience on seeing a Rugby game."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
JAN 30 1929

THE outlook from Thursday to Sunday musically is very felicitous.

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will play here tomorrow night and Saturday and in Brooklyn on Friday. Tomorrow he will repeat from his last appearance the classical symphony of Prokofieff. He will again present to us Debussy's "Nuages." He will then show us how Honegger's "Rugby" will sound in his hands. (We heard the work ten days ago under the direction of the composer.) Further, Mr. Koussevitsky will demonstrate how the epic rhapsody of Bloch, "America," ought to sound in his opinion. (We heard the work at its premiere done by Mr. Damrosch.)

Evidently it is Mr. Koussevitsky's intention not to depend on the audience, but it is announced that he will be assisted by a chorus from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club. On Saturday Mr. Koussevitsky repeats "Rugby" and "America" and in addition brings the Beethoven "Leonora Overture No. 3" and that pixie-like work of Satie-Debussy, "Gymnopedies." On Friday in Brooklyn the Symphony will play "Rugby," "America," "Nuages" and the Handel B Minor concerto Grosso for strings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS
JAN 30 1929

KOUSSEVITZY IN MUSICAL YAWNS

That suave Koussevitzky ambled onto the Lyric stage Monday, cocked his head on one side, yawned three smiles—or smiled three yawns—raised his baton on high and launched his Boston Symphony forth into one of the most elegant performances of orchestral music we have heard this season.

He played a "Classical Symphony" of the enfant terrible, Prokofieff, with a high sense of its brilliant simplicity, and ambled away.

He played the Debussy Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes"; the first with infinite sensitiveness; the second with all the circumstance of a clearly dreamed battle of ancient pageantry, and went for a little gossip among the 'celli.

He played a football hysteria of the obnoxious Honegger, and had his little joke.

An then he came and played the Brahms Second Symphony—oh, as it should be played—with all the naive earnestness of its maker, all the love of life and candid delight in building musical castles that stay where they are put because they are not built in sand.

The music of Prokofieff was that of a boy delighted with his own good behavior, and it has a personable sparkle beyond Mozart, beyond the exquisite handling it got by the Bostonians.

The Debussy Nocturnes are works of beguiling beauty, and probably the finest things the Frenchman ever wrote for orchestra, barring the score of "Peleas."

The Honegger football might, as someone said, be aptly named "O-O," and if this buffoon allows himself the luxury of calling his work "Rugby," why should we allow ourselves the luxury of calling it "bolognie"?

The Brahms, for all its great length and great earnestness, is a beautiful work, deeply musical and deeply sincere.

The playing of the Boston Orchestra has certainly not been surpassed in precision, in artistry, in broad vitality or exquisite subtlety here this season. To it and to its conductor we are infinitely grateful for a distinguished concert.

A. S. K.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 3 - 1929

THE President and Mrs. Coolidge were entertained at dinner last evening by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Roy O. West, in the presidential suite of the Willard Hotel. This is the eighth of the series of dinners given in honor of the Chief Executive and First Lady of the Land by the members of the President's official family.

Mrs. LeGrand Cannon of Indianapolis, daughter of the Secretary, who joined him yesterday, acted as hostess. This is her first visit to the Capital.

Invited to meet them were the Secretary of Commerce and Mrs. William F. Whiting, Senator and Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, Senator and Mrs. Otis F. Glenn, Senator Simeon D. Fess, Representative and Mrs. Fred A. Britten, Representative and Mrs. Louis W. Douglas, Representative and Mrs. Morton D. Hull, Mr. and Mrs. Owen A. West of Chicago, son and daughter-in-law of the host; Bishop and Mrs. Edwin Holt Hughes and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Meeker, all of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. John H. Harrison of Danville, Ill.; the president of De Pauw University, at Greencastle, Ind., and Mrs. G. Bromley Oxnam, Mr. and Mrs. William V. Hodges of Denver, Colo.; Bishop and Mrs. William F. McDowell, Col. and Mrs. Edward Clifford, Mr. and Mrs. Edward T. Clark, Mrs. Virginia White Speel, Miss Bina Day Deenen and Dr. George Otis Smith of Washington. Palms and ferns were in abundance in the suite, and the table had eight low bowls filled with tulips, jonquils, sweet peas, buddlea and pink roses.

Mrs. Coolidge will attend the concert this afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and she was among those at the concert yesterday afternoon of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Earlier in the day yesterday, Mrs. Coolidge atended the luncheon of the "Senate Ladies' Lunch Club."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 30 1929

Boston Symphony

Before coming to Hartford next Sunday for its concert at the Capitol Theater, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play three concerts in New York and will repeat performances of two notable "new" scores of the season, according to last Sunday's New York Times. These are Bloch's epic rhaphsody, "America" and Arthur Honegger's football piece "Rugby." Mr. Koussevitsky was one of the judges with Mr. Damrosch and others who awarded "America" its prize, and this conductor introduced the score in Boston on December 21.

Every music lover should hear a Boston Symphony concert. This celebrated orchestra is considered this season at the peak of its entire career, having been drilled for the past four seasons under the remarkable genius, Koussevitsky. Hailed everywhere they have appeared for his remarkable interpretations of the classics, and his readings of the modern compositions. The concert will start at 3 o'clock, and patrons are especially requested to come early, to be seated before the first number begins. A most interesting and brilliant program has been announced, which follows. Concerto Grosso for string orchestra by Handel, Prelude to an afternoon of a Faun, Debussy, Wagner's Tannhauser overture, and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. Tickets for the concert may be secured at McCoy's, and mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, 89 Asylum Street, will be filled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 30 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Before coming to Hartford next Sunday for its concert at the Capitol theater, the Boston Symphony orchestra plays three concerts, being the third visit to New York this season, and will repeat performances of two notable "new" scores of the season, according to last Sunday's New York Times. These are Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America" and Arthur Honegger's football piece, "Rugby." Mr. Koussevitzky was one of the judges with Mr. Damrosch and others who awarded "America" its prize and this conductor introduced the score in Boston on December 21. At his New York performances the final hymn will be sung by members of the Oratorio society of New York and the New York University Glee club. Arthur Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" in Cambridge and Boston with the Boston Symphony orchestra, on January 10, 11 and 12, and has likewise introduced it in New York. The concert will start at 3 o'clock, and patrons are especially requested to come early, to be seated before the first number begins. A most interesting and brilliant program has been announced, which follows: Concerto Grosso for string orchestra by Handel, Prelude to an Afternoon of a Faun, Debussy; Wagner's Tannhauser overture, and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor. Tickets for the concert may be secured at McCoy's and mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 89 Asylum street, will be filled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 31 1929

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony plays superbly this season, in fact, never have they played so exquisitely, and we doubt if any orchestra can measure up to the Boston Symphony, with Koussevitzky wielding the baton. Such fine shading of the musical phrases, perfect repose in the pianissimo passages, a warmth of color from the strings, and a breadth of sweeping tone through the crescendos.

There is something about a symphony concert that is totally different from any other musical performance, and no doubt a symphony program produces the finest form in music. Richard L. Stokes, eminent New York reviewer thus describes a Boston Symphony concert. "For the first time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday evening to Carnegie Hall, and was welcomed by a throng of rejoicing admirers which packed the auditorium. Mr. Koussevitzky, who had previously revisited the glimpses of this clime in the role of a solo contrabassist, was saluted with prolonged acclamations when he appeared on the platform. After the first few measures it was obvious that the Boston organization is still the premier orchestra of last season—robust and polished, munificent and refined."

Tickets for the Hartford concert next Sunday may be secured at McCoy's, and mail orders will be filled, addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, 89 Asylum Street. Concert begins at 3 o'clock and patrons are especially requested to be seated before the opening number. Good seats are still available.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
JAN 31 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY BRILLIANT AS CONDUCTOR

Guided by the inspiring and finest of conductors, Serge Koussevitzky, 110 musicians, comprising the internationally famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, were presented at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The stimulating Russian conductor, commanding every wealth of tone and expression from this truly great organization of artists, excelled past triumphs in the extraordinary rendition of the symphonic extravaganza "Rugby" by the distinguished French modernist, Arthur Honneger.

The piece as described by a reviewer depicts all the phases of a football game, the tackling, the escape of a player with the ball, the pursuit. Struggling, fighting, cheering are vividly sketched in an unusual treatment of syncopated rythms, colored with abrupt stops and polyphonies, defiant of all conservative codes of score, yet completely musical and rhythmic.

Metallic gestures surging into a cascade of eloquence summoned every spirit of expression from the assemblage of players as they blended climaxes, great crashes and unusual tonal effects into a sensation of harmony.

The Beethoven overture to "Leonore," discovered itself most effectively interpreted in the conception of Koussevitzky, while the festive "Gymopedies" of Erik Satie, as orchestrated by Debussy, was exhibited in all the abandonment of youth and merriment of an age-old celebration.

Truly a master of Brahms, Koussevitzky led the Bostonians through the four part "Symphony No. 2 in D Major," with profoundest reverence for the depths of peace and serenity, joy and meditation that are concealed in the difficult score.

The Adagio in B, develops scherzo themes of terpsichorean nature. The Presto in 2-4 ignites into a more brilliant composition of runs and sparkling trills, while the finale in D, 4-4, reverts to a subtle lyric of serenity, ornamented with a delicate fringe of rippling motives and a capricious mood.

The concert revealed all the wonders of a master musician leading a marvelous band of music masters.

MADELINE ENSIGN

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 31 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FINE ORCHESTRA TRIUMPHS AGAIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is always sure of a warm welcome from a capacity house when they come to Washington, and these conditions prevailed yesterday afternoon when they played at Poli's under the efficient and inspiring baton of their leader, Serge Koussevitzky, as one of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's attractions. The program began with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, which has not been heard here lately. It was sympathetically read and beautifully expressed, as one lovely melody followed another.

A new number to Washington was Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, and celebrating the "festival of naked youths" in Sparta. Debussy is not at his best in this orchestration; it is thin, and rather inadequate. The orchestra did their best with it, but the subject was at fault. In contrast was Honegger's "Rugby," also heard here for the first time. It is far more melodic than his "Pacific 231," and because of the human element ("Pacific 231" was mechanism), much more appealing. Honegger is fundamentally melodic but represses it in order to be original. The audience was delighted with "Rugby," and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky several times. It could not have been better played.

The beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D-major, came last, gloriously read. The first allegro, which presents the controlling theme, taking it from one set of instruments to another, and from key to key; the lovely adagio, so expressive and fine; the short allegretto, graceful and alluring, a favorite movement always; and the last stirring allegro, it was all a musical feast and Mr. Koussevitzky had many recalls, which he graciously shared with his men.—Florence Hyde.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
JAN 29 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD AT LYRIC

Honegger's "Rugby" Presented As Novelty—Prokofieff Piece In Same Class

If we cannot have Arthur Honegger, distinguished member of the former Paris "Bix Six" and author of "Pacifique 231" of disturbing memory, with us in the flesh, we are at least able to hear one of the latest products of this modernist, his so-called Symphonic Movement "Rugby," thanks to the enterprise and catholic taste of Serge Koussevitzky, the stimulating conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which presented the latest of the Honegger creations to agitate the musical world at the Lyric last night.

A Paris reviewer informs us that "Rugby" belongs in the same category with "Pacifique 231," but that, in his opinion, it is superior to the earlier work, for, while "Pacifique" contained a quality of descriptive realism, especially in the locomotive scene theme, with its whistlings and puffings, which rather shocked him, in "Rugby" all materialistic descriptions have been omitted. Pursuing the argument, the reviewer says: "The different phases of the game, the tacklings, the escape of the player with the ball, the pursuits—all these incidents can be expressed by figures of geometric precision, which mysteriously find their equivalent in the play of the counterpoint."

Tonal Juggling

Even if this be admitted, the question which presents itself is what all the tonal juggling has to do with real music. There are certain manipulations in arithmetic which may be termed ingenious and belong in the class of tricks, but they still bear no real relationship to the science of figures, which has a serious and logical purpose.

"Rugby" unquestionably has numerous exceedingly clever orchestral devices and makes skillful use of them, but the resultant product is hardly of a kind that awakens sensations such as those commonly associated with music. There are climaxes, great crashes, pulsating and stirring as well as exceedingly novel tonal effects, but to the ordinary mind music is something sustained, orderly and susceptible of development. It is interesting to note that Mr. Honegger ends his picture in a decidedly orthodox manner with some appealing harmonies.

The "movement," of course, was brilliantly played, Mr. Koussevitzky having a flair for spectacular effects. His organization follows his directions and expresses his intentions with remarkable responsiveness.

Prokofieff's "Classical"

The Bostonians provided another novelty in the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony, wherein this Russian composer gives his ideas upon how Mozart might have written his works if he were living at the present time. Such speculations are more interesting than valuable. Mozart was a product of his time and the nature of his work was determined by the conditions that surrounded him. His compositions have an essentially aristocratic mold and superlative beauty of form largely, perhaps, because the period in which he lived stressed these qualities so far as the dominating classes were concerned. Had his environment been otherwise he might have developed a far different strain.

Mozart a la Prokofieff is a person in whom the sense of beauty is displaced by ingeniousness. He employs engaging rhythms and there is lightness, but this lightness is of a rather edgy sort, with the curves eliminated. This edginess is not pressed to the point of acridity, but its sharpness is constantly felt nonetheless. The interpretation given by the orchestra was masterly and the piece as a whole proved engrossing because of its novelty, even if it did not stir the emotions.

F. W. S.

THI CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
JAN 29 1929

Music

By FELIX DEYO

TWO NOVELTIES ON BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROGRAMME

TWO NEW SCORES which have made a notable impression this season, namely, Ernest Bloch's Epic Rhapsody "America" and Arthur Honegger's "Rugby," will have their first Brooklyn performances next Friday evening (Academy of Music), at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series. They will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The programme's other numbers are Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12, and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes."

Bloch's "America" is the composition awarded the $3,000 prize in "Musical America's" recent symphony contest. Judges were Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock and Alfred Hertz. Dedicated to Whitman and Abraham Lincoln, the rhapsody is divided into three parts, the first depicting the land of the Indians and the early Puritan settlers. The second movement entitled "Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow," takes the Civil War for its subject, giving a romantic picture of the old South, in which old Southern melodies are introduced. The serenity is broken by the coming of war. The third movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," sets forth to-day's Jazz age, and thence builds up hopes of an ideal future. The climax of the composition is a Hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. This final chorus will be sung by members of the Oratorio Society of New York and the New York University Glee Club.

Arthur Honegger, foremost of the younger French school composers, is now visiting America for the first time. Composer of the famous locomotive piece "Pacific, 231," Honegger in "Rugby" describes the more human rhythms and impacts of a football game.

The origin of "Rugby" was described last October by Henry Prunieres, eminent French critic, in a despatch from Paris to the New York "Times":

"Arthur Honegger is a sport 'fan.' In his adolescent years he participated in football games and bicycle races with the utmost enthusiasm. To-day he contents himself with attending the games of others, and he never misses an important match. He once said to a sports writer that when looking at a football or Rugby championship game he feels the musical equivalent of the sporting emotions, and that he can distinctly visualize an orchestral piece which would express them. The journalist promptly announced that Honegger was at work on a symphonic piece called 'Rugby.'

"Honegger was greatly amused by the news item, because previous to his conversation with the sports writer the idea of writing such a composition never entered his mind. Nevertheless he began to consider such a possibility and when the new Symphonic Orchestra of Paris asked him to present this much discussed 'Rugby' at its inauguration concert he decided to write it. The composition was revealed to us on Oct. 19, conducted by Ansermet.

"The composition is constructed somewhat in the manner of a symphonic scherzo. Abrupt, broken, syncopated rhythms marvelously express the feeling of frustrated effort we experience on seeing a Rugby game."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
JAN 30 1929

THE outlook from Thursday to Sunday musically is very felicitous.

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will play here tomorrow night and Saturday and in Brooklyn on Friday. Tomorrow he will repeat from his last appearance the classical symphony of Prokofieff. He will again present to us Debussy's "Nuages." He will then show us how Honegger's "Rugby" will sound in his hands. (We heard the work ten days ago under the direction of the composer.) Further, Mr. Koussevitsky will demonstrate how the epic rhapsody of Bloch, "America," ought to sound in his opinion. (We heard the work at its premiere done by Mr. Damrosch.)

Evidently it is Mr. Koussevitsky's intention not to depend on the audience, but it is announced that he will be assisted by a chorus from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club. On Saturday Mr. Koussevitsky repeats "Rugby" and "America" and in addition brings the Beethoven "Leonora Overture No. 3" and that pixie-like work of Satie-Debussy, "Gymnopedies." On Friday in Brooklyn the Symphony will play "Rugby," "America," "Nuages" and the Handel B Minor concerto Grosso for strings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS
JAN 30 1929

KOUSSEVITZY IN MUSICAL YAWNS

That suave Koussevitzky ambled onto the Lyric stage Monday, cocked his head on one side, yawned three smiles—or smiled three yawns—raised his baton on high and launched his Boston Symphony forth into one of the most elegant performances of orchestral music we have heard this season.

He played a "Classical Symphony" of the enfant terrible, Prokofieff, with a high sense of its brilliant simplicity, and ambled away.

He played the Debussy Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes"; the first with infinite sensitiveness; the second with all the circumstance of a clearly dreamed battle of ancient pageantry, and went for a little gossip among the 'celli.

He played a football hysteria of the obnoxious Honegger, and had his little joke.

An then he came and played the Brahms Second Symphony—oh, as it should be played—with all the naive earnestness of its maker, all the love of life and candid delight in building musical castles that stay where they are put because they are not built in sand.

The music of Prokofieff was that of a boy delighted with his own good behavior, and it has a personable sparkle beyond Mozart, beyond the exquisite handling it got by the Bostonians.

The Debussy Nocturnes are works of beguiling beauty, and probably the finest things the Frenchman ever wrote for orchestra, barring the score of "Peleas."

The Honegger football might, as someone said, be aptly named "O-O," and if this buffoon allows himself the luxury of calling his work "Rugby," why should we allow ourselves the luxury of calling it "bolognie"?

The Brahms, for all its great length and great earnestness, is a beautiful work, deeply musical and deeply sincere.

The playing of the Boston Orchestra has certainly not been surpassed in precision, in artistry, in broad vitality or exquisite subtlety here this season. To it and to its conductor we are infinitely grateful for a distinguished concert.

A. S. K.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN

THE President and Mrs. Coolidge were entertained at dinner last evening by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Roy O. West, in the presidential suite of the Willard Hotel. This is the eighth of the series of dinners given in honor of the Chief Executive and First Lady of the Land by the members of the President's official family.

Mrs. LeGrand Cannon of Indianapolis, daughter of the Secretary, who joined him yesterday, acted as hostess. This is her first visit to the Capital.

Invited to meet them were the Secretary of Commerce and Mrs. William F. Whiting, Senator and Mrs. Charles S. Deneen, Senator and Mrs. Otis F. Glenn, Senator Simeon D. Fess, Representative and Mrs. Fred A. Britten, Representative and Mrs. Louis W. Douglas, Representative and Mrs. Morton D. Hull, Mr. and Mrs. Owen A. West of Chicago, son and daughter-in-law of the host; Bishop and Mrs. Edwin Holt Hughes and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Meeker, all of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. John H. Harrison of Danville, Ill.; the president of De Pauw University, at Greencastle, Ind., and Mrs. G. Bromley Oxnam, Mr. and Mrs. William V. Hodges of Denver, Colo.; Bishop and Mrs. William F. McDowell, Col. and Mrs. Edward Clifford, Mr. and Mrs. Edward T. Clark, Mrs. Virginia White Speel, Miss Bina Day Deenen and Dr. George Otis Smith of Washington. Palms and ferns were in abundance in the suite, and the table had eight low bowls filled with tulips, jonquils, sweet peas, buddlea and pink roses.

Mrs. Coolidge will attend the concert this afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and she was among those at the concert yesterday afternoon of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Earlier in the day yesterday, Mrs. Coolidge atended the luncheon of the "Senate Ladies' Lunch Club."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 30 1929

Boston Symphony

Before coming to Hartford next Sunday for its concert at the Capitol Theater, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play three concerts in New York and will repeat performances of two notable "new" scores of the season, according to last Sunday's New York Times. These are Bloch's epic rhaphsody, "America" and Arthur Honegger's football piece "Rugby." Mr. Koussevitsky was one of the judges with Mr. Damrosch and others who awarded "America" its prize, and this conductor introduced the score in Boston on December 21.

Every music lover should hear a Boston Symphony concert. This celebrated orchestra is considered this season at the peak of its entire career, having been drilled for the past four seasons under the remarkable genius, Koussevitsky. Hailed everywhere they have appeared for his remarkable interpretations of the classics, and his readings of the modern compositions. The concert will start at 3 o'clock, and patrons are especially requested to come early, to be seated before the first number begins. A most interesting and brilliant program has been announced, which follows. Concerto Grosso for string orchestra by Handel, Prelude to an afternoon of a Faun, Debussy, Wagner's Tannhauser overture, and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. Tickets for the concert may be secured at McCoy's, and mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, 89 Asylum Street, will be filled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
29

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Before coming to Hartford next Sunday for its concert at the Capitol theater, the Boston Symphony orchestra plays three concerts, being the third visit to New York this season, and will repeat performances of two notable "new" scores of the season, according to last Sunday's New York Times. These are Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America" and Arthur Honegger's football piece, "Rugby." Mr. Koussevitzky was one of the judges with Mr. Damrosch and others who awarded "America" its prize and this conductor introduced the score in Boston on December 21. At his New York performances the final hymn will be sung by members of the Oratorio society of New York and the New York University Glee club. Arthur Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" in Cambridge and Boston with the Boston Symphony orchestra, on January 10, 11 and 12, and has likewise introduced it in New York. The concert will start at 3 o'clock, and patrons are especially requested to come early, to be seated before the first number begins. A most interesting and brilliant program has been announced, which follows: Concerto Grosso for string orchestra by Handel, Prelude to an Afternoon of a Faun, Debussy; Wagner's Tannhauser overture, and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor. Tickets for the concert may be secured at McCoy's and mail orders addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 89 Asylum street, will be filled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 31

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony plays superbly this season, in fact, never have they played so exquisitely, and we doubt if any orchestra can measure up to the Boston Symphony, with Koussevitzky wielding the baton. Such fine shading of the musical phrases, perfect repose in the pianisimo passages, a warmth of color from the strings, and a breadth of sweeping tone through the crescendos.

There is something about a symphony concert that is totally different from any other musical performance, and no doubt a symphony program produces the finest form in music. Richard L. Stokes, eminent New York reviewer thus describes a Boston Symphony concert. "For the first time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday evening to Carnegie Hall, and was welcomed by a throng of rejoicing admirers which packed the auditorium. Mr. Koussevitzky, who had previously revisited the glimpses of this clime in the role of a solo contrabassist, was saluted with prolonged acclamations when he appeared on the platform. After the first few measures it was obvious that the Boston organization is still the premier orchestra of last season—robust and polished, munificent and refined."

Tickets for the Hartford concert next Sunday may be secured at McCoy's, and mail orders will be filled, addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, 89 Asylum Street. Concert begins at 3 o'clock and patrons are especially requested to be seated before the opening number. Good seats are still available.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
JAN 31 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY BRILLIANT AS CONDUCTOR

Guided by the inspiring and finest of conductors, Serge Koussevitzky, 110 musicians, comprising the internationally famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, were presented at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The stimulating Russian conductor, commanding every wealth of tone and expression from this truly great organization of artists, excelled past triumphs in the extraordinary rendition of the symphonic extravaganza "Rugby" by the distinguished French modernist, Arthur Honneger.

The piece as described by a reviewer depicts all the phases of a football game, the tackling, the escape of a player with the ball, the pursuit. Struggling, fighting, cheering are vividly sketched in an unusual treatment of syncopated rythms, colored with abrupt stops and polyphonies, defiant of all conservative codes of score, yet completely musical and rhythmic.

Metallic gestures surging into a cascade of eloquence summoned every spirit of expression from the assemblage of players as they blended climaxes, great crashes and unusual tonal effects into a sensation of harmony.

The Beethoven overture to "Leonore," discovered itself most effectively interpreted in the conception of Koussevitzky, while the festive "Gymopedies" of Erik Satie, as orchestrated by Debussy, was exhibited in all the abandonment of youth and merriment of an age-old celebration.

Truly a master of Brahms, Koussevitzky led the Bostonians through the four part "Symphony No. 2 in D Major," with profoundest reverence for the depths of peace and serenity, joy and meditation that are concealed in the difficult score.

The Adagio in B, develops scherzo themes of terpsichorean nature. The Presto in 2-4 ignites into a more brilliant composition of runs and sparkling trills, while the finale in D, 4-4, reverts to a subtle lyric of serenity, ornamented with a delicate fringe of rippling motives and a capricious mood.

The concert revealed all the wonders of a master musician leading a marvelous band of music masters.

MADELINE ENSIGN

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 31 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FINE ORCHESTRA TRIUMPHS AGAIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is always sure of a warm welcome from a capacity house when they come to Washington, and these conditions prevailed yesterday afternoon when they played at Poli's under the efficient and inspiring baton of their leader, Serge Koussevitzky, as one of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's attractions. The program began with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, which has not been heard here lately. It was sympathetically read and beautifully expressed, as one lovely melody followed another.

A new number to Washington was Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, and celebrating the "festival of naked youths" in Sparta. Debussy is not at his best in this orchestration; it is thin, and rather inadequate. The orchestra did their best with it, but the subject was at fault. In contrast was Honegger's "Rugby," also heard here for the first time. It is far more melodic than his "Pacific 231," and because of the human element ("Pacific 231" was mechanism), much more appealing. Honegger is fundamentally melodic but represses it in order to be original. The audience was delighted with "Rugby," and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky several times. It could not have been better played.

The beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D-major, came last, gloriously read. The first allegro, which presents the controlling theme, taking it from one set of instruments to another, and from key to key; the lovely adagio, so expressive and fine; the short allegretto, graceful and alluring, a favorite movement always; and the last stirring allegro, it was all a musical feast and Mr. Koussevitzky had many recalls, which he graciously shared with his men.—Florence Hyde.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 3 1 1929

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The two oldest American orchestras played in Washington Tuesday and yesterday—the New York Philharmonic gave a program in which the moderns predominated Tuesday, and Mr. Koussevitzky led the Bostonians in his usual discriminatingly restrained fashion in a program neatly divided between the classics and the moderns yesterday at Poli's. Washington music lovers showed their decidedly keen interest in orchestral music by practically filling the capacity of the theaters on both occasions.

Mr. Koussevitzky discreetly opened his program with the sweetly beautiful and reassuringly classical "Overture No. 3, to Leonore," by Ludwig van Beethoven. Immediately the subtle legato style of this orchestra's playing was noticeable. The applause which followed showed an unmistakable warmth of appreciation.

With similar canny discretion Mr. Koussevitzky chose to finish his program with a Brahms symphony. He took neither the oft-heard yet lovely "First Symphony" nor the supremely beautiful "Fourth," both of which he has conducted here previously. Instead he presented the "Second," written in the key of D major. To this reviewer the second symphony did not seem as stirring and apt to carry the listener to the heights that the aforementioned first and fourth have achieved. It is beautiful music and was obviously well played yesterday. Certainly Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians rose nobly to the brilliance of the finale. The audience showed marked approval, lingering, with prolonged applause, at its conclusion.

Tucked snugly between the sonorities of the two great "B's" of music were some very "different" modern works. Erik Satie, the whimsical dreamer, was represented by two so-called "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, and Artur Honegger's new work, "Rugby," also was given its Washington premiere. As the Philharmonic featured fowls of the air in more than one work Tuesday, so the Boston featured athletics, both ancient and modern, in these works yesterday. Mr. Satie's "Gymopedies" were astounding in their softly restrained style and minor color. They seemed vague stuff for use in an athletic festival given by stalwart Spartan youths. Although the program notes suggest that "they (the youths) imitated the wild gesturing in the worship of Dionysius; during the festival there was great rejoicing, great merriment," there seemed nothing in either of these movements written "lent et grave" and "lent et douloureaux" to convey any such impression. Rather, they might have been the athletic ideas of a canary bird, which always had had limited exercise in a gilded cage.

The "Rugby" of M. Honegger, who is on a visit to this country at present, was very different. It certainly is virile and filled with action, even though it doesn't attempt a literal tonal description of a foot ball game. As a musical composition, it seems to be constructed with the blithest disregard of conventions, and much of the time the first violins seem to play the part of the grandstand. The auditors may or may not care for "Rugby," but whatever one's personal reaction, none can but be thoroughly aware that M. Honegger breaks or modifies his musical constructions with subtle cleverness, shrewd knowledge and firm intent. It is a work which ought to prove even more interesting after a second or third hearing.

H. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 3 1 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra plays superbly this season, in fact, never have they played so exquisitely, and we doubt if any orchestra can measure up to the Boston Symphony, with Koussevitzky wielding the baton. Such fine shading of the musical phrases, perfect repose in the pianissimo passages, withal a warmth of color from the strings, with that wonderful mellow tone and a breadth of sweeping tone through the crescendos up to the climaxes, and all under such perfect control, obtained through diligent rehearsals, practically every day from 10 to nearly 1 o'clock, except on concert days, by the exacting Mr. Koussevitzky, who senses every fine point of the score, and imparts to the musicians, the composers' ideas of the composition under consideration.

Tickets for the Hartford concert next Sunday may be secured at McCoy's, and mail orders will be filled, addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 69 Asylum street. Concert begins at 3 o'clock sharp, and patrons are especially requested to be seated before the opening number. Good seats available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 3 1 1929

Boston Orchestra Delights In Well-Rounded Program

Beethoven's Leonore Overture Numbers by Erik Satie and Arthur Honegger and Brahm's Symphony Effectively Played, Directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

In a season already renowned [illegible] fine orchestral programs the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon may be counted as one of the real concerts of the year.

From Beethoven's charming [illegible] ture to Leonore to the majestic [illegible] ments of the Brahms' Symphony [illegible] in D Major, the program was of [illegible] usual beauty and musical attra[illegible]

Under M. Koussevitzky the B[illegible] Symphony has gained in coordin[illegible] and power. His dynamic baton [illegible] fails in winning the required [illegible] and the fine restraint, yet virile spirit, he injects into the readi[illegible] the scores have no small part in orchestral balance and performance.

That the Boston Orchestra has large following in Washington [illegible] shown by one of the largest audiences of the concert season to hear it.

The Beethoven Overture was a [illegible]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon conducted the first of the Tuesday afternoon series of symphony concerts in Symphony hall. The program comprised these works: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's symphony, C major ("Jupiter"); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, E-flat major ("Eroica"). There was a very large and delighted audience.

As is probably known, Mr. Koussevitzky's purpose is to acquaint his hearers with the development of orchestra, chiefly symphonic, music from the days of the so-called classics to our own day. A sensitive audience will thus learn more about the successive changes in form, harmonic and orchestral expression than it would by reading treatise, histories of music or by attending lectures. It will not be confused by distinctions between romantic and classic works, and will soon realize, by hearing, that symphonies which they have been led to believe were "classic" are in fact romantic; that Bach in his orchestral, as in his piano suites and pieces in the "Well Tempered Clavichord," was a romanticist. A fine composition does not admit the famous definition of a statesman. It was romantic while the composer lived; it may be a classic while the composer is now on earth.

For the first concert Mr. Koussevitzky chose works that were no doubt familiar to many in the audience; but he has the knack by his skill and taste, his enthusiasm for the beautiful and his ability to find it where others have passed it by or ignored it, of giving to an old work new life and freshness. Because a work is old, he is not therefore tempted to give only an accurate and perfunctory reading of the notes; he wishes others to feel what he feels; to share with him in musical enjoyment.

The question was raised a few days ago in New York whether the finale of the "Eroica" is worthy or unworthy. This question was not raised yesterday in Symphony hall. If it had been, there could have been only one answer after the brilliant, stirring performance: that answer would have been "The end crowns the work." And so the manner in which Bach's suite and the "Jupiter" symphony with its heavenly andante and amazing finale were played by this incomparable orchestra gave immediate pleasure, a relief from the cares and thoughts of this materialistic, mechanical age.

S. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Again the "Classics"

YESTERDAY afternoon, well past mid-year as the calendar at Symphony Hall is reckoned, began the third series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tuesday afternoon series, devoted to the performance of the "classics." As in previous years, the learned have been careful to explain that by the term the "classics" Mr. Koussevitzky means great masterpieces. With such a program Mr. Koussevitzky began yesterday. The "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, the "Heroic" of Beethoven, have both seen performances in the various series of the present season. Usually in the Tuesday series a piece is last heard in the course of the year. For once, however, this concert proved an exception. Bach's fourth Brandenburg concerto is to be played at all the concerts of the present week, including the one in Cambridge; and its first hearing, rather than its last, came to pass yesterday.

Mr. Koussevitzky has already experimented more than many another with groups of different sizes from his orchestra, trying always to get the best possible combination for the particular piece or particular composer in hand. Never before, however, unless memory slips, has the conductor reduced his strings to the size of a small chamber orchestra, as he did for Bach yesterday. To play the fourth concerto of the Brandenburg set, there huddled around the conductor, stand thirteen violins, four violas, six 'cellos, and two basses; while within the crescent formed by this slender band sat the three soloists, Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Bladet. Words can not adequately tell what the music of Bach gained by this latest proportioning of the instruments. It was a sensitive ear—may one perhaps indulge in [illegible] the festive "super-sensitive"?—that planned this combination. It is a music of delicate patterning, of silken traceries, of gossamer threads, or if the pace be slow, of suave melodies, of song gently ornamented. But this music awaited yesterday to glisten in its most irridiscent transparencies, to float thus buoyantly upon the air. Nor does one recall in previous hearings of Bach concertos that the facets of this net-work of jewels have ever caught and reflected so much sunlight and air, luminosity and transparency.

Upon a performance of Bach thus revealing, following one of Mozart which would have been equally revealing had one not heard it before. It is a music of design, as that of Bach. But it is a design more far-flung, a design that compasses wider horizons. And it is a design which may include sturdy rhythms, as those of the opening measure, song[illegible] motives as those that succeed it, dipping delicacies farther on; or in another movement, song the most plastic, melody the most limpid; and dance the most polished and courtly. Finally it comes to a movement which one hesitates to desecrate by recalling that it contains the (to some) damning fugue. For scholarship here is great enough to conceal scholarship. Or better, may one refer to the dictum, never truer than in this finale, that it is the greatest art which most completely conceals art. The hearer who is thinking fugue and sonata-form in these measures is not listening to Mozart. Listening, one marvels only at the freshness which comes from the orchestra. Pondering later, one may marvel the more at the intricate means employed in the marshalling of that seemingly free and boundless spontaneity.

The crescendo swells, the climax reaches the heights, which is to say that one is listening to Beethoven. Though not a trombone was present to perform its legerdemain, nor to pile up its huge sonorities, though there was no "battery" to assist the rhythm, this Beethoven, with no more brass than a few trumpets and horn and no more percussion than a pair of kettledrums, piles up his climax as few wielders of cymbals and blowers of brass succeed in doing. He labeled his music "in memory of a great hero." So doing he characterized it better than a thousand succeeding reviewers and commentators in a thousand "articles." Thus we heard the music yesterday, a music of singularly sustained power, of heroisms that know no bounds. To this one need add nothing more except perhaps the observation that Beethoven and Koussevitzky make a good team.

A. H. M.

"Assez! Brute!"

In Paris "Mary Dugan" [illegible] a Special and Excited Pu[illegible]

SAYS the London Morning Post: "'The Trial of Mary Dugan' has taken the fancy of Paris with a rush. Of the best of plays, say the reviewers, but a first-rate trial. And here is the public keener on spectacular trials than in Paris. The audiences at the répétition générale and the première were what is called 'le public des grands procès,' containing many ladies highly diamonded whose chief zest in life is the thrill to be got from an emotional murder case.

"Cries of 'Assez! Brute!' Opposite Brute! we heard [illegible]le Monsieur Harry Baur, playing the district attorney with realistic tempered by delicacy, pressed his case against Mary Dugan. This is [illegible] more difficult because the woman accused of killing lover or husband is always sure of French sympathy.

"But what most tickles the Parisian audience is the policeman's whistle that brings it back for each act fifty per cent quicker than the customary bell; the 'extras' sold at the theater-door as it departs; the flattering sensation that it is the jury. 'The Trial of Mary Dugan' has the joy of novelty. It will draw all Paris."

Incidents and Prospects

The only concert that Mme. Povla Frijsh, the singer, will undertake in Boston this season is definitely announced for Wednesday evening, March 13, in Jordan Hall. Mail orders for tickets may now be sent to Mr. Aaron Richmond at the Pierce Building. The sale at the box-office does not begin until March 1.

Miss Myra Hess, the pianist, proposes the following program for her final concert in Boston this season in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 2:

Pieces to be Announced ..... Bach
Prelude, Choral and Fugue ..... Franck
Undine ..... Ravel
Evening in Granada—Minstrels ..... Debussy
Prelude in G minor ..... Rachmaninov
Nocturne—Tarantella—Ballad ..... Chopin

The Chamber Orchestra of Boston, assembled a year ago by Mr. Slonimsky, will be heard for the first time this season in a concert at Jordan Hall on Mon[illegible]

M. J.

Concerts Next Week

Orchestral

FRIDAY afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8.15 in Symphony Hall, concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; Nicolai Orlov assisting pianist. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Concerto in A major for Piano with Orchestra ..... Mozart
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" .. Strauss

Tuesday afternoon at 3 in Symphony Hall, first supplementary matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter," Mozart
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven

Thursday evening at 8 in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter," Mozart
"Clouds" and "Fêtes" from The Nocturnes, Debussy
Gymnopédics ..... Satie-Debussy
Choreographic poem, "The Waltz" ..... Ravel

* * * *

This afternoon at the Copley-Plaza ballroom, Rosa Low, soprano, will be heard in three groups of songs and Antonio Sacerdote will give dramatic readings in Italian and in English in one of the series of Amelia Conti Co[illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tuesday afternoon will come the first of the five concerts that form the second "extra series" of Boston Symphony concerts. For it Mr. Koussevitzky has set a programme that begins with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for string orchestra with solos for violin and two flutes, passes to Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and concludes with the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven.

* * * *

At the regular Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this same Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 will begin the programme, to be followed by Mozart's A major piano concerto, with Nicolai Orloff as the soloist. Strauss' tone-poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is the remaining piece and principal item of the pair of concerts.

* * * *

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky's repetitions in New York of Bloch's "America" and Honegger's "Rugby"—both heard there within six weeks from other conductors—were variously viewed in the newspapers. The Sun curtly preferred "to hear the splendid Boston organization playing other creations." The Times lost itself in a welter of wonder and wordiness. The Evening Post found "the quality of the playing transcending the quality of the music played in every instance save that of Debussy's two Nocturnes." With its customary intelligence the Tribune Herald said:

> Of course the audiences which hear Mr. Koussevitzky's New York performances of Bloch's and Honegger's works are, at least to some extent, different from each other and from the Philharmonic audiences that heard "America" under Damrosch in December and "Rugby" under its composer in January, and, as both are among the most interesting of the new works offered us so far this season, the Bostonians' triple performance is readily justifiable. . . . The strong points of "America" were set forth in a superb performance, memorable for its color and potency, which proved Mr. Koussevitzky's devotion to the work well worth while.

Mr. Ernest Schelling, as composer and pianist, will soon be guest at the Symphony Concerts in his tone-poem, "Morocco," produced last season by the Philharmonic Society in New York. Unless recollection slips, he has not played in Symphony Hall since Dr. Muck's time.

SYMPHONY'S FIRST EXTRA

Ultra Classical List for Tuesday Concert

Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the season's first concert of the Tuesday afternoon "extra series" which is now an established factor in Boston's musical activities. As was to be expected the audience, which all but filled the hall, greeted conductor, orchestra and performances with the same enthusiasm which is elicited from the audiences of the longer established series.

To be expected, too, were the names significant in the history of music which appeared on the programme of yesterday's concert. For this Tuesday series is avowedly devoted to the masterpieces, and Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's C major Symphony ordinarily termed the "Jupiter," and the Third, or "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, were the masterpieces on this occasion.

To various ones of the six Brandenburg Concertos, Mr. Koussevitzky has manifested considerable devotion and their performances have been among the more rewarding of those of 18th century music. Yesterday this in G major was no exception to that rule, and Mr. Burgin's contribution as solo violinist was appropriately recognized. At this week's regular concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this same concerto will begin the programme.

At the last pair of concerts in Boston before the recent trip southward the "Jupiter" Symphony was given a hearing. Yesterday's performance, like its predecessors, was wholly in the vein even though the Andante was a shade

STEAL TRUCK NEAR POLICE STATION

Thieves yesterday defied the police of the East Dedham street station, when they stole a truck loaded with $1600 worth of cigars and cigarettes, less than 50 yards from the station

GLOBE
Music News and Comment

Nicolai Orloff, who will play a Mozart concerto with the Boston Symphony at this week's concerts, is a young Russian pianist who made his Boston debut at Jordan Hall Dec 7, 1926. He was announced to be soloist at one of the Harvard Glee Club concerts the following season, but was prevented by illness from keeping this engagement. Mr Koussevitzky has again omitted to put a symphony on the program, but Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" is in length and complexity an equivalent for even the most austere of symphonies.

The first of the Tuesday series of Boston Symphony concerts, the only one for which season tickets have been easily obtainable this season will have a strictly classical program, from Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Mr Koussevitzky has always planned this series so that it includes no music not of established excellence. The Tuesday programs are always the most enjoyable of the orchestral year.

86

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 31 1929

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The two oldest American orchestras played in Washington Tuesday and yesterday—the New York Philharmonic gave a program in which the moderns predominated Tuesday, and Mr. Koussevitzky led the Bostonians in his usual discriminatingly restrained fashion in a program neatly divided between the classics and the moderns yesterday at Poli's. Washington music lovers showed their decidedly keen interest in orchestral music by practically filling the capacity of the theaters on both occasions.

Mr. Koussevitzky discreetly opened his program with the sweetly beautiful and reassuringly classical "Overture No. 3, to Ieonore," by Ludwig van Beethoven. Immediately the subtle legato style of this orchestra's playing was noticeable. The applause which followed showed an unmistakable warmth of appreciation.

With similar canny discretion Mr. Koussevitzky chose to finish his program with a Brahms symphony. He took neither the oft-heard yet lovely "First Symphony" nor the supremely beautiful "Fourth," both of which he has conducted here previously. Instead he presented the "Second," written in the key of D major. To this reviewer the second symphony did not seem as stirring and apt to carry the listener to the heights that the aforementioned first and fourth have achieved. It is beautiful music and was obviously well played yesterday. Certainly Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians rose nobly to the brilliance of the finale. The audience showed marked approval, lingering, with prolonged applause, at its conclusion.

Tucked snugly between the sonorities of the two great "B's" of music were some very "different" modern works. Erik Satie, the whimsical dreamer, was represented by two so-called "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, and Artur Honegger's new work, "Rugby," also was given its Washington premiere. As the Philharmonic featured fowls of the air in more than one work Tuesday, so the Boston featured athletics, both ancient and modern, in these works yesterday. Mr. Satie's "Gymopedies" were astounding in their softly restrained style and minor color. They seemed vague stuff for use in an athletic festival given by stalwart Spartan youths. Although the program notes suggest that "they (the youths) imitated the wild gesturing in the worship of Dionysius; during the festival there was great rejoicing, great merriment," there seemed nothing in either of these movements written "lent et grave" and "lent et douloureaux" to convey any such impression. Rather, they might have been the athletic ideas of a canary bird, which always had had limited exercise in a gilded cage.

The "Rugby" of M. Honegger, who is on a visit to this country at present, was very different. It certainly is virile and filled with action, even though it doesn't attempt a literal tonal description of a foot ball game. As a musical composition, it seems to be constructed with the blithest disregard of conventions, and much of the time the first violins seem to play the part of the grandstand. The auditors may or may not care for "Rugby," but whatever one's personal reaction, none can but be thoroughly aware that M. Honegger breaks or modifies his musical constructions with subtle cleverness, shrewd knowledge and firm intent. It is a work which ought to prove even more interesting after a second or third hearing.

H. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 31 1929

Boston Orchestra Delights In Well-Rounded Program

Beethoven's Leonore Overture Numbers by Erik Satie and Arthur Honegger and Brahm's Symphony Effectively Played, Directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

In a season already renowned fine orchestral programs the ap ance of the Boston Symphony Or tra, Serge Koussevitzky, conducto Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, be counted as one of the red-l concerts of the year.

From Beethoven's charming C ture to Leonore to the majestic m ments of the Brahms' Symphony in D Major, the program was of usual beauty and musical attrac

Under M. Koussevitzky the Bo Symphony has gained in coordina and power. His dynamic baton n falls in winning the required ef and the fine restraint, yet vigo spirit, he injects into the reading the scores have no small part in orchestral balance and performance

That the Boston Orchestra ha large following in Washington shown by one of the largest audie of the concert season to hear it.

The Beethoven Overture was a

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday after conducted the first of the Tue afternoon series of symphony con in Symphony hall. The program prised these works: Bach's Brander Concerto No. 4, G major, for two flutes and string orchestra; M symphony, C major ("Jupiter"); thoven, Symphony No. 3, E-flat ("Eroica"). There was a very and delighted audience.

As is probably known, Mr. Ko vitzky's purpose is to acquaint his ers with the development of orche chiefly symphonic, music from the of the so-called classics to our day. A sensitive audience will learn more about the successive cha in form, harmonic and orchestral pression than it would by rea treatise, histories of music or by tending lectures. It will not be fused by distinctions between romantic and classic works, and will soon realize, by hearing, that symphonies which they have been led to believe were "classic" are in fact romantic; that Bach in his orchestral, as in his piano suites and pieces in the "Well Tempered Clavichord," was a romanticist. A fine composition does not admit the famous definition of a statesman. It was romantic while the composer lived; it may be a classic while the composer is now on earth.

For the first concert Mr. Koussevitzky chose works that were no doubt familiar to many in the audience; but he has the knack by his skill and taste, his enthusiasm for the beautiful and his ability to find it where others have passed it by or ignored it, of giving to an old work new life and freshness. Because a work is old, he is not therefore tempted to give only an accurate and perfunctory reading of the notes; he wishes others to feel what he feels; to share with him in musical enjoyment.

The question was raised a few days ago in New York whether the finale of the "Eroica" is worthy or unworthy. This question was not raised yesterday in Symphony hall. If it had been, there could have been only one answer after the brilliant, stirring performance: that answer would have been "The end crowns the work." And so the manner in which Bach's suite and the "Jupiter" symphony with its heavenly andante and amazing finale were played by this incomparable orchestra gave immediate pleasure, a relief from the cares and thoughts of this materialistic, mechanical age.

S. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Again the "Classics"

YESTERDAY afternoon, well past mid-year as the calendar at Symphony Hall is reckoned, began the third series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tuesday afternoon series, devoted to the performance of the "classics." As in previous years, the learned have been careful to explain that by the term the "classics" Mr. Koussevitzky means great masterpieces. With such a program Mr. Koussevitzky began yesterday. The "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, the "Heroic" of Beethoven, have both seen performances in the various series of the present season. Usually in the Tuesday series a piece is last heard in the course of the year. For once, however, this concert proved an exception. Bach's fourth Brandenburg concerto is to be played at all the concerts of the present week, including the one in Cambridge; and its first hearing, rather than its last, came to pass yesterday.

Mr. Koussevitzky has already experimented more than many another with groups of different sizes from his orchestra, trying always to get the best possible combination for the particular piece or particular composer in hand. Never before, however, unless memory slips, has the conductor reduced his strings to the size of a small chamber orchestra, as he did for Bach yesterday. To play the fourth concerto of the Brandenburg set, there huddled around the conductor, stand thirteen violins, four violas, six 'cellos, and two basses; while within the crescent formed by this slender band sat the three soloists, Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Bladet. Words can not adequately tell what the music of Bach gained by this latest proportioning of the instruments. It was a sensitive ear—may one perhaps indulge in the suggestive "super-sensitive"?—that planned this combination. It is a music of delicate patterning, of silken traceries, of gossamer threads, or if the pace be slow, of suave melodies, of song gently ornamented. But this music awaited yesterday to glisten in its most irridiscent transparencies, to float thus buoyantly upon the air. Nor does one recall in previous hearings of Bach concertos that the facets of this net-work of jewels have ever caught and reflected so much sunlight and air, luminosity and transparency.

Upon a performance of Bach thus revealing, following one of Mozart which would have been equally revealing had one not heard it before. It is a music of design, as that of Bach. But it is a design more far-flung, a design that compasses wider horizons. And it is a design which may include sturdy rhythms, as those of the opening measure, songful motives as those that succeed it, dipping delicacies farther on; or in another movement, song the most plastic, melody the most limpid; and dance the most polished and courtly. Finally it comes to a movement which one hesitates to desecrate by recalling that it contains the (to some) damning fugue. For scholarship here is great enough to conceal scholarship. Or better, may one refer to the dictum, never truer than in this finale, that it is the greatest art which most completely conceals art. The hearer who is thinking fugue and sonata-form in these measures is not listening to Mozart. Listening, one marvels only at the freshness which comes from the orchestra. Pondering later, one may marvel the more at the intricate means employed in the marshalling of that seemingly free and boundless spontaneity.

The crescendo swells, the climax reaches the heights, which is to say that one is listening to Beethoven. Though not a trombone was present to perform its legerdemain, nor to pile up its huge sonorities, though there was no "battery" to assist the rhythm, this Beethoven, with no more brass than a few trumpets and horn and no more percussion than a pair of kettledrums, piles up his climax as few wielders of cymbals and blowers of brass succeed in doing. He labeled his music "in memory of a great hero." So doing he characterized it better than a thousand succeeding reviewers and commentators in a thousand "articles." Thus we heard the music yesterday, a music of singularly sustained power, of heroisms that know no bounds. To this one need add nothing more except perhaps the observation that Beethoven and Koussevitzky make a good team.

A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

The only concert that Mme. Povla Frijsh, the singer, will undertake in Boston this season is definitely announced for Wednesday evening, March 13, in Jordan Hall. Mail orders for tickets may now be sent to Mr. Aaron Richmond at the Pierce Building. The sale at the box-office does not begin until March 1.

Miss Myra Hess, the pianist, proposes the following program for her final concert in Boston this season in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 2:

Pieces to be Announced	Bach
Prelude, Choral and Fugue	Franck
Undine	Ravel
Evening in Granada—Minstrels	Debussy
Prelude in G minor	Rachmaninov
Nocturne—Tarantella—Ballad	Chopin

The Chamber Orchestra of Boston, assembled a year ago by Mr. Slonimsky, will be heard for the first time this season in a concert at Jordan Hall on Mon

"Assez! Brute!"

In Paris "Mary Dugan" Has a Special and Excited Public

SAYS the London Morning Post: "The Trial of Mary Dugan' has taken the fancy of Paris with a rush. Not the best of plays, say the reviewers, but a first-rate trial. And here is the public keener on spectacular trials than in Paris. The audiences at the répétition générale and the première were what is called 'le public des grands procès,' containing many ladies highly diamonded whose chief zest in life is the thrill to be got from an emotional murder case.

"Cries of 'Assez!' 'Opposition Brute!' were heard while Monsieur Harry Baur, playing the district attorney with realistic tempered by delicacy, pressed his case against Mary Dugan. This is shown more difficult because the woman accused of killing lover or husband is always sure of French sympathy.

"But what most tickles the Parisian audience is the policeman's whistle that brings it back for each act fifty per cent quicker than the customary bell; the 'extras' sold at the theater-door as it departs; the flattering sensation that it is the jury. 'The Trial of Mary Dugan' has the joy of novelty. It will draw all Paris."

Concerts Next Week

FEB 2 1929

Orchestral

FRIDAY afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8.15 in Symphony Hall, concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; Nicolai Orlov assisting pianist. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Concerto in A major for Piano with Orchestra ..... Mozart
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" .. Strauss

Tuesday afternoon at 3 in Symphony Hall, first supplementary matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter," Mozart
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven

Thursday evening at 8 in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter," Mozart
"Clouds" and "Fêtes" from The Nocturnes, Debussy
Gymnopédics ..... Satie-Debussy
Choreographic poem, "The Waltz" ..... Ravel

* * * *

This afternoon at the Copley-Plaza ballroom, Rosa Low, soprano, will be heard in three groups of songs and Antonio Salvi will give dramatic readings in Italian and in English in one of the series of Amelia Conti Concerts.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tuesday afternoon will come the first of the five concerts that form the second "extra series" of Boston Symphony concerts. For it Mr. Koussevitzky has set a programme that begins with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for string orchestra with solos for violin and two flutes, passes to Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and concludes with the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven.

* * * *

At the regular Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this same Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 will begin the programme, to be followed by Mozart's A major piano concerto, with Nicolai Orloff as the soloist. Strauss' tone-poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is the remaining piece and principal item of the pair of concerts.

* * * *

STEAL TRUCK NEAR POLICE STATION

Thieves yesterday defied the police of the East Dedham street station, when they stole a truck loaded with $1600 worth of cigars and cigarettes, less than 50 yards from the station

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 31 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra plays superbly this season, in fact, never have they played so exquisitely, and we doubt if any orchestra can measure up to the Boston Symphony, with Koussevitzky wielding the baton. Such fine shading of the musical phrases, perfect repose in the pianissimo passages, withal a warmth of color from the strings, with that wonderful mellow tone and a breadth of sweeping tone through the crescendos up to the climaxes, and all under such perfect control, obtained through diligent rehearsals, practically every day from 10 to nearly 1 o'clock, except on concert days, by the exacting Mr. Koussevitzky, who senses every fine point of the score, and imparts to the musicians, the composers' ideas of the composition under consideration.

Tickets for the Hartford concert next Sunday may be secured at McCoy's, and mail orders will be filled, addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 80 Asylum street. Concert begins at 3 o'clock sharp, and patrons are especially requested to be seated before the opening number. Good seats available.

Globe Feb 6

SYMPHONY'S FIRST EXTRA

Ultra Classical List for Tuesday Concert

POST FEB 6.

Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the season's first concert of the Tuesday afternoon "extra series" which is now an established factor in Boston's musical activities. As was to be expected the audience, which all but filled the hall, greeted conductor, orchestra and performances with the same enthusiasm which is elicited from the audiences of the longer established series.

To be expected, too, were the names significant in the history of music which appeared on the programme of yesterday's concert. For this Tuesday series is avowedly devoted to the masterpieces, and Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's C major Symphony ordinarily termed the "Jupiter," and the Third, or "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, were the masterpieces on this occasion.

To various ones of the six Brandenburg Concertos, Mr. Koussevitzky has manifested considerable devotion and their performances have been among the more rewarding of those of 18th century music. Yesterday this in G major was no exception to that rule, and Mr. Burgin's contribution as solo violinist was appropriately recognized. At this week's regular concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this same concerto will begin the programme.

At the last pair of concerts in Boston before the recent trip southward the "Jupiter" Symphony was given a hearing. Yesterday's performance, like its predecessors, was wholly in the vein even though the Andante was a shade

Incidents and Prospects

TRANS. FEB 4

Mr. Koussevitzky's repetitions in New York of Bloch's "America" and Honegger's "Rugby"—both heard there within six weeks from other conductors—were variously viewed in the newspapers. The Sun curtly preferred "to hear the splendid Boston organization playing other creations." The Times lost itself in a welter of wonder and wordiness. The Evening Post found "the quality of the playing transcending the quality of the music played in every instance save that of Debussy's two Nocturnes." With its customary intelligence the Tribune Herald said:

> Of course the audiences which hear Mr. Koussevitzky's New York performances of Bloch's and Honegger's works are, at least to some extent, different from each other and from the Philharmonic audiences that heard "America" under Damrosch in December and "Rugby" under the composer in January, and, as both are among the most interesting of the new works offered us so far this season, the Bostonians' triple performance is readily justifiable.
>
> The strong points of "America" were set forth in a superb performance, memorable for its color and potency, which proved Mr. Koussevitzky's devotion to the work well worth while.

Mr. Ernest Schelling, as composer and pianist, will soon be guest at the Symphony Concerts in his tone-poem, "Morocco," produced last season by the Philharmonic Society in New York. [illegible] recollection slips, he has not played in Symphony Hall since Dr. Muck's time.

GLOBE FEB 3.

Music and Comment

Nicolai Orloff, who will play a Mozart concerto with the Boston Symphony at this week's concerts, is a young Russian pianist who made his Boston debut at Jordan Hall Dec 7, 1926. He was announced to be soloist at one of the Harvard Glee Club concerts the following season, but was prevented by illness from keeping the engagement. Mr Koussevitzky has again omitted to put a symphony on the program, but Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" is in length and complexity an equivalent for even the most austere of symphonies.

The first of the Tuesday series of Boston Symphony concerts, the only one for which season tickets have been easily obtainable this season will have a strictly classical program, from Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Mr Koussevitzky has always planned this series so that it includes no music not of established excellence. The Tuesday programs are always the most enjoyable of the orchestral year.

86

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 3 1 1929

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The two oldest American orchestras played in Washington Tuesday and yesterday—the New York Philharmonic gave a program in which the moderns predominated Tuesday, and Mr. Koussevitzky led the Bostonians in his usual discriminatingly restrained fashion in a program neatly divided between the classics and the moderns yesterday at Poli's. Washington music lovers showed their decidedly keen interest in orchestral music by practically filling the capacity of the theaters on both occasions.

Mr. Koussevitzky discreetly opened his program with the sweetly beautiful and reassuringly classical "Overture No. 3, to Ieonore," by Ludwig van Beethoven. Immediately the subtle legato style of this orchestra's playing was noticeable. The applause which followed showed an unmistakable warmth of appreciation.

With similar canny discretion Mr. Koussevitzky chose to finish his program with a Brahms symphony. He took neither the oft-heard yet lovely "First Symphony" nor the supremely beautiful "Fourth," both of which he has conducted here previously. Instead he presented the "Second," written in the key of D major. To this reviewer the second symphony did not seem as stirring and apt to carry the listener to the heights that the aforementioned first and fourth have achieved. It is beautiful music and was obviously well played yesterday. Certainly Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians rose nobly to the brilliance of the finale. The audience showed marked approval, lingering, with prolonged applause, at its conclusion.

Tucked snugly between the sonorities of the two great "B's" of music were some very "different" modern works. Erik Satie, the whimsical dreamer, was represented by two so-called "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, and Artur Honegger's new work, "Rugby," also was given its Washington premiere. As the Philharmonic featured fowls of the air in more than one work Tuesday, so the Boston featured athletics, both ancient and modern, in these works yesterday. Mr. Satie's "Gymopedies" were astounding in their softly restrained style and minor color. They seemed vague stuff for use in an athletic festival given by stalwart Spartan youths. Although the program notes suggest that "they (the youths) imitated the wild gesturing in the worship of Dionysius; during the festival there was great rejoicing, great merriment," there seemed nothing in either of these movements written "lent et grave" and "lent et douloureaux" to convey any such impression. Rather, they might have been the athletic ideas of a canary bird, which always had had limited exercise in a gilded cage.

The "Rugby" of M. Honegger, who is on a visit to this country at present, was very different. It certainly is virile and filled with action, even though it doesn't attempt a literal tonal description of a foot ball game. As a musical composition, it seems to be constructed with the blithest disregard of conventions, and much of the time the first violins seem to play the part of the grandstand. The auditors may or may not care for "Rugby," but whatever one's personal reaction, none can but be thoroughly aware that M. Honegger breaks or modifies his musical constructions with subtle cleverness, shrewd knowledge and firm intent. It is a work which ought to prove even more interesting after a second or third hearing.

H. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 3 1 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra plays superbly this season, in fact, never have they played so exquisitely, and we doubt if any orchestra can measure up to the Boston Symphony, with Koussevitzky wielding the baton. Such fine shading of the musical phrases, perfect repose in the pianissimo passages, withal a warmth of color from the strings, with that wonderful mellow tone and a breadth of sweeping tone through the crescendos up to the climaxes, and all under such perfect control, obtained through diligent rehearsals, practically every day from 10 to nearly 1 o'clock, except on concert days, by the exacting Mr. Koussevitzky, who senses every fine point of the score, and imparts to the musicians, the composers' ideas of the composition under consideration.

Tickets for the Hartford concert next Sunday may be secured at McCoy's, and mail orders will be filled, addressed to Frank A. Sedgwick, No. 80 Asylum street. Concert begins at 3 o'clock sharp, and patrons are especially requested to be seated before the opening number. Good seats available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 3 1 '29

Boston Orchestra Delights In Well-Rounded Program

Beethoven's Leonore Overture Numbers by Erik Satie and Arthur Honegger and Brahm's Symphony Effectively Played, Directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

In a season already renowned for fine orchestral programs the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon, will be counted as one of the red-letter concerts of the year.

From Beethoven's charming Overture to Leonore to the majestic movements of the Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D Major, the program was of unusual beauty and musical attraction.

Under M. Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony has gained in coordination and power. His dynamic baton never fails in winning the required effect, and the fine restraint, yet vigorous spirit, he injects into the reading of the scores have no small part in the orchestral balance and performance.

That the Boston Orchestra has a large following in Washington was shown by one of the largest audiences of the concert season to hear it.

The Beethoven Overture was a novelty to many, who enjoyed its striking tone contrasts and typical Beethoven treatment.

After the overture followed "Gymnopedies Nos. 1 and 3" by Erik Satie, orchestrated by De Bussy with its insistent note of youth and quaint melodies. Another modern composition "Rugby Mouvement Symphonique," by Arthur Honegger, known as the composer of "Pacific 231," satisfied the lovers of modern musical art and intrigued with its broken, syncopated rhythms and its realistic picturing of men struggling in a football game. "Rugby," as some one has said, marked the entrance of sport into the realm of musical interpretation and it was interesting, to say the least.

Last, but not least, came the Brahms symphony, as always nobel in conception, great in delineation of moods and emotions and beautifully played. Into it the leader put his whole soul and the four movements each had a definite charm.

E. E. P.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon conducted the first of the Tuesday afternoon series of symphony concerts in Symphony hall. The program comprised these works: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart, symphony, C major ("Jupiter"); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, E-flat major ("Eroica"). There was a very large and delighted audience.

As is probably known, Mr. Koussevitzky's purpose is to acquaint his hearers with the development of orchestral, chiefly symphonic, music from the time of the so-called classics to our own day. A sensitive audience will thus learn more about the successive changes in form, harmonic and orchestral expression than it would by reading treatise, histories of music or by attending lectures. It will not be confused by distinctions between romantic and classic works, and will soon realize, by hearing, that symphonies which they have been led to believe were "classic" are in fact romantic; that Bach in his orchestral, as in his piano suites and pieces in the "Well Tempered Clavichord," was a romanticist. A fine composition does not admit the famous definition of a statesman. It was romantic while the composer lived; it may be a classic while the composer is now on earth.

For the first concert Mr. Koussevitzky chose works that were no doubt familiar to many in the audience; but he has the knack by his skill and taste, his enthusiasm for the beautiful and his ability to find it where others have passed it by or ignored it, of giving to an old work new life and freshness. Because a work is old, he is not therefore tempted to give only an accurate and perfunctory reading of the notes; he wishes others to feel what he feels; to share with him in musical enjoyment.

The question was raised a few days ago in New York whether the finale of the "Eroica" is worthy or unworthy. This question was not raised yesterday in Symphony hall. If it had been, there could have been only one answer after the brilliant, stirring performance: that answer would have been "The end crowns the work." And so the manner in which Bach's suite and the "Jupiter" symphony with its heavenly andante and amazing finale were played by this incomparable orchestra gave immediate pleasure, a relief from the cares and thoughts of this materialistic, mechanical age.

S. M.

CLASSICS HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Yesterday afternoon, the Boston of this season's afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducted. As usual there was a crowded house to prove that this series fills a long-felt need. The program for these concerts have usually been planned to meet the popular demand including such classics as should form the background of every serious music student or music lover, and which give to the neophyte a solid foundation from which to build. Yesterday's program consisted of the Bach Brandenburg Concerto N. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes, and string orchestra; Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 41 ("Jupiter") and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major "Eroica."

The Brandenburg Concerto was done happily, cheerily, with a time from the flutes that was lovely, round and smooth, and with fleetness from the violin. Under Mr Koussevitzky's martial beat, the "Jupiter" Symphony started out bombastically, but in the Andante Cantabile, it came perilously near becoming sentimental, and effected. There is such simplicity in things which Mozart wrote; they need little in the way of embellishment or reenforcements. One felt, however, a satisfying progression from the first movement through the others to the solid climax of the last.

In the Beethoven "Eroica" the conductor was in his element. How he loves to play upon the emotions of his audience! Moments of emotional intensity, of dramatic pauses, of long lines leading up to a finale of great import. What an appeal they have for him! And how his public adores him for it! Coaxing this section into line, cajoling that section, dramatically lashing his men to do his bidding, how indelibly he puts his own impress upon the orchestra. In the Scherzo one felt still the shadow of the funeral march which precedes it, and was reminded again of the Berlioz theory that this movement should not be in direct contrast to the symphony in its entirety, but in keeping with it; the mournful play of some hero of the Illiad by the tomb of some great warrior.

The orchestra played with its usual loveliness of tone, and careful attention to contrast, smoothness and length of line. Mr Koussevitsky was recalled several times, graciously sharing the applause with his soloists after the Biendenburg Concerto.

The second concert of this series will occur Tuesday afternoon, Feb 26.

Globe Feb 6

SYMPHONY'S FIRST EXTRA

Ultra Classical List for Tuesday Concert

POST—FEB 6.

Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the season's first concert of the Tuesday afternoon "extra series" which is now an established factor in Boston's mucial activities. As was to be expected the audience, which all but filled the hall, greeted conductor, orchestra and performances with the same enthusiasm which is elicited from the audiences of the longer established series.

To be expected, too, were the names significant in the history of music which appeared on the programme of yesterday's concert. For this Tuesday series is avowedly devoted to the masterpieces, and Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's C major Symphony ordinarily termed the "Jupiter," and the Third, or "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, were the masterpieces on this occasion.

To various ones of the six Brandenburg Concertos, Mr. Koussevitzky has manifested considerable devotion and their performances have been among the more rewarding of those of 18th century music. Yesterday this in G major was no exception to that rule, and Mr. Burgin's contribution as solo violinist was appropriately recognized. At this week's regular concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this same concerto will begin the programme.

At the last pair of concerts in Boston before the recent trip southward the "Jupiter" Symphony was given a hearing. Yesterday's performance, like its predecessors, was wholly in the vein even though the Andante was a shade slower and the Finale a trifle swifter in pace than Mozart himself may have intended. Yet the beauty of the former amply justifies Mr. Koussevitzky's lingerings over it, and with a virtuoso orchestra such as the Boston Symphony the Finale may appropriately go at a speed beyond the 18th century imagings.

Like Mozart's Symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica" had been played this year at the regular subscription concerts, and incidentally several times in previous seasons under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. Comment on his masterly version of this score, then, would be at the present superfluous. Suffice it to say that yesterday's audience responded heartily to the combined eloquence of music and performance.

STEAL TRUCK NEAR POLICE STATION

Thieves yesterday defied the police of the East Dedham street station, when they stole a truck loaded with $1600 worth of cigars and cigarettes, less than 50 yards from the station the ...estive "super-sensitive"?—that ...ed this combination. It is a music delicate patterning, of silken traceries, of gossamer threads, or if the pace be slow, of suave melodies, of song gently ornamented. But this music awaited yesterday to glisten in its most irridiscent transparencies, to float thus buoyantly upon the air. Nor does one recall in previous hearings of Bach concertos that the facets of this net-work of jewels have ever caught and reflected so much sunlight and air, luminosity and transparency.

Upon a performance of Bach thus revealing, following one of Mozart which would have been equally revealing had one not heard it before. It is a music of design, as that of Bach. But it is ...

motives as those that succeed it, skipping delicacies farther on; or in another movement, song the most plastic, melody the most limpid; and dance the most polished and courtly. Finally it comes to a movement which one hesitates to desecrate by recalling that it contains the (to some) damning fugue. For scholarship here is great enough to conceal scholarship. Or better, may one refer to the dictum, never truer than in this finale, that it is the greatest art which most completely conceals art. The hearer who is thinking fugue and sonata-form in these measures is not listening to Mozart. Listening, one marvels only at the freshness which comes from the orchestra. Pondering later, one may marvel the more at the intricate means employed in the marshalling of that seemingly free and boundless spontaneity.

The crescendo swells, the climax reaches the heights, which is to say that one is listening to Beethoven. Though not a trombone was present to perform its legerdemain, nor to pile up its huge sonorities, though there was no "battery" to assist the rhythm, this Beethoven, with no more brass than a few trumpets and horn and no more percussion than a pair of kettledrums, piles up his climax as few wielders of cymbals and blowers of brass succeed in doing. He labeled his music "in memory of a great hero." So doing he characterized it better than a thousand succeeding reviewers and commentators in a thousand "articles." Thus we heard the music yesterday, a music of singularly sustained power, of heroisms that know no bounds. To this one need add nothing more except perhaps the observation that Beethoven and Koussevitzky make a good team.

A. H. M.

...his is to be regarded as a cord ...organized Pierce-Arrow he... ...opportunity.

Sales Comp...
...nue, Boston

...Y ENGLAND DEAL...

...W. NIXON, Inc., 58 Lewis Street, Lyn...
CLIFFORD SHERMAN, New Bedford.
...M. TERRY & SON, Nantucket.
...TATE MOTORS COMPANY, Inc., 154 Hancock Street, Quincy.
...VINTER HILL MOTOR COMPANY, Somerville.

MAINE

...HENNINGS MOTOR COMPANY, Portland

Incidents and Prospects

The only concert that Mme. Povla ...rijsh, the singer, will undertake in ...oston this season is definitely announced for Wednesday evening, March ... in Jordan Hall. Mail orders for ...ets may now be sent to Mr. Aaron ...hmond at the Pierce Building. The ... at the box-office does not begin until ...rch 1.

...iss Myra Hess, the pianist, proposes ... following program for her final con... in Boston this season in Jordan Hall ...Saturday afternoon, March 2:

...es to be Announced.....Bach
...ude, Choral and Fugue.....Franck
...ine.....Ravel
...ing in Granada—Minstrels.....Debussy
...ude in G minor.....Rachmaninov
...urne—Tarantella—Ballad.....Chopin

...e Chamber Orchestra of Boston, ...sbled a year ago by Mr. Slonimsky, ...be heard for the first time this sea... ...in a concert at Jordan Hall on Mon...

Concerts Next Week

Orchestral FEB 2 1929

FRIDAY afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8.15 in Symphony Hall, concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; Nicolai Orlov assisting pianist. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra.....Bach
Concerto in A major for Piano with Orchestra.....Mozart
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"..Strauss

Tuesday afternoon at 3 in Symphony Hall, first supplementary matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra.....Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter."

...MEATROPOLITAN THEATRE
...The Red Dance," Raoul Walsh's ... production for Fox Films, is now showing at the Metropolitan Theatre, is from the novel by H. L. Gates and ... The principal role of ... News comes from Ziegfeld that he has ...tened a theatre in London for the next ... seven years. It is now being erected ... on Shaftsbury avenue, will cost him ... approximately $193,000 a year and seat ... 1598. The first London production will ... Fleming.

* * * *

...tion, "Lady Fingers," which opened on ... Broadway during the week. Eddie Buzzell and Louise Brown are featured and the cast, in addition to Miss Muir, includes the McCarthy sisters, also well known here, Al Sexton, Gertrude McDonald, Herbert Waterous, Marjorie White, Edwin Walter and Robert

Incidents and Prospects TRANS. FEB 4

Mr. Koussevitzky's repet...es in New York of Bloch's "America" ... Honegger's "Rugby"—both heard there within six weeks from other conductors—were variously viewed in the newspapers. The Sun curtly preferred "to hear the splendid Boston organization playing other creations." The Times lost itself in a welter of wonder and wordiness. The Evening Post found "the quality of the playing transcending the quality of the music played in every instance save that of Debussy's two Nocturnes." With its customary intelligence the Tribune Herald said:

> Of course the audiences which hear Mr. Koussevitzky's New York performances of Bloch's and Honegger's works are, at least to some extent, different from each other and from the Philharmonic audiences that heard "America" under Damrosch in December and "Rugby" under its composer in January, and, as both are among the most interesting of the new works offered us so far this season, the Bostonians' triple performance is readily justifiable.
>
> The strong points of "America" were set forth in a superb performance, memorable for its color and potency, which proved Mr. Koussevitzky's devotion to the work well worth while.

Mr. Ernest Schelling, as composer and pianist, will soon be guest at the Symphony Concerts in his tone-poem, "Morocco," produced last season by the Philharmonic Society in New York. Unless recollection slips, he has not played in Symphony Hall since Dr. Muck's time.

GLOBE
Music FEB 3, and Comment

Nicolai Orloff, who will play a Mozart concerto with the Boston Symphony at this week's concerts, is a young Russian pianist who made his Boston debut at Jordan Hall Dec 7, 1926. He was announced to be soloist at one of the Harvard Glee Club concerts the following season, but was prevented by illness from keeping the engagement. Mr Koussevitzky has again omitted to put a symphony on the program, but Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" is in length and complexity an equivalent for even the most austere of symphonies.

The first of the Tuesday series of Boston Symphony concerts, the only one for which season tickets have been easily obtainable this season will have a strictly classical program, from Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Mr Koussevitzky has always planned this series so that it includes no music not of established excellence. The Tuesday programs are always the most enjoyable of the orchestral year.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

TRANS FEB. 7 29

Concert-Chronicle

Strauss and Nietzsche

THUS spake Zarathustra." These words are found at the end of most of the eighty chapters of Nietzsche's book of the same name. But the Musical Courier probably did well when it entitled an appreciative article on Richard Strauss's tone-poem, also of the same name, "Thus spake Richard Strauss." For seldom has a musical work been saddled with a more unfortunate title. Much of the adverse criticism which it received when it was new (1896) centered about the contention that music should not be required to express a philosophical system, that such was not and could not be the province of music. And the title formed one of the major premises in this argument. As a matter of fact, the program of this tone-poem, which will be played by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday and Saturday, is not a whit more philosophical than the program of many another tone-poem of Strauss or Liszt, or than the scheme of many a program symphony of the Romantic composers. The idea of man trying to solve the riddle of existence, of experiencing life's joys and life's sorrows, of finally conquering—in a glorious "apotheosis"—has been at the root of many such a symphony. It is the fundamental scheme of Strauss's work; but Strauss in "Thus spake Zarathustra" as in some of his other works, ends with the peace of contentment rather than with the glory of conquest. Nietzsche serves chiefly in three ways: to give the piece a title and to give it its introduction in the printed score; to furnish titles (cheaper headings, in Nietzsche's book) to the different sections of the tone-poem; to suggest the solution which Strauss gives to the problem. Of the abstruse philosophizing of the author there is nothing in the work of the composer.

Consider then this scheme as subject for a romantic tone-poem: Man is confronted with the riddle of the universe, or the problem of existence, the question of the reason for life, of achieving happiness in it. He turns to religion and finds no answer to satisfy him. An adolescent, he plunges into the joys and passion of life. Again all turns to dust and ashes in his very mouth. Achieving maturity, he would find his answer in science. Failing once more in finding a lasting solution, he comes to an abrupt halt. He reviews the course of his past life. He is disgusted with much of it. He turns at last to "the dance" as the best possible solution, recognizing, however, that it is still an imperfect solution, that indeed it is not given to man to solve the riddle of the universe. "The dance" is of course taken to typify an attitude of mind which accepts with light heart and cheerful spirit the joys and pleasures of life as well as its problems and sorrows; which does not weight and burden itself with things too deep for it; does not accept heaviness and gloom as a solution; but which on the contrary soars above all such brooding as being too petty for the mind of man. Romantic stuff, all of it. Indeed, in its main outlines similar to the course of Beethoven's ninth symphony, which also begins in chaos and ends with joy. But Beethoven accepts joy as a final solution; Strauss accepts it as the best solution, even while recognizing that an ultimate solution is impossible.

There are four main motifs, three of which run like guiding thoughts through the whole work, the fourth entering near the end of the first half—(1) the nature-motif, or motif of the eternal riddle; (2) the motif of longing or seeking, typifying man's search for his ideal; (3) the motif of disgust and of loathing; (4) the dance motif. A somber introduction serves chiefly to introduce the first motif, heard at once, rising starkly in three notes above the initial note of the basses. Then comes the first section, "Of the Backworldsmen," devoted to religion. After some shadowy anticipations of the theme which suggests religion, basses and 'cellos pizzicato play the second motif, that of "seeking." Then horns at once intone "Credo in unum deum" and the "religion" theme follows. The next section "Of the Great Longing" develops more fully both the first and second motifs, harks back to the religious section including an organ quotation of "Magnificat," and anticipates the following "Of Joys and Passions." There is a separate theme for joys and another, more ardent, for passions. The latter is rudely interrupted by the trombones with the sinister "Disgust." "The Grave Song" for the formalist begins a section which corresponds to the working-out of the sonata; for the programmist our hero gretfully examines all the works of the past and finds them wanting; longing and striving supplant all else. Religion and passion having failed to satisfy, our hero turns to "Science." A fugue pictures its abstractions—and its futilities for the hero's purposes. "Disgust" and "Longing" conquer, but the latter becomes less hopeless, more human, leads indeed, vision-like, to the first entry of the "dance motif." But the fugal "Science" is still in the mind of the hero, as by the ministrations of the more hopeful "Longing" and of "The Dance," he becomes "The Convalescent." But "Disgust" brings him to a sharp and definite halt; he has been prepared for such solution as is possible.

"Longing" and "Disgust" now dominate, and a rhythmically amorphous section leads from the heavy four-four meter to the dance-like three-four. The "Dance-motif" now dominates. Convalescence becomes complete, we turn to the section entitled "The Dance-Song," the theme of which is really an extension of the "nature" or "riddle" motif. (For the formalist we have now arrived at the recapitulation.) The religious theme is relieved of heaviness by being transfigured through a waltz rhythm; the themes of joy and passion lose their earthiness. "The Night-wanderer-song" brings greater luminosity, greater peace, as the hero comes to the realization (not without its own serenity) that all that is human must perish (transformation of "Disgust" motif), that unformed "Longing" may become a glorified "Ideal," but that the unsolvable riddle must remain. With the peace of such an attained goal "Thus Spake Zarathustra" comes to conclusion—significantly in a choral of two tonalities.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Koussevitzky will continue his annual custom of a program assembled from music for chorus and orchestra. This year he has chosen Franck's setting of the One Hundredth and Fiftieth Psalm; Roussel's "Evocations"; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." For orchestra alone, Mr. Schelling's "Morocco," will round out the concerts, with the composer conducting. Roussel's "Evocations" are symphonic sketches suggested by visits to Farther India and Cochin-China. The first and the third ask an orchestra only. The second adds a chorus. As a triptych they have not hitherto been heard in Boston. The Cecilia will provide the chorus. Mr. Malcolm Lang trained it.

For the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening, the program traverses Bach's Concerto in G major for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra; Liszt's Concerto in A major for Piano and Orchestra with Mme. Mérö as pianist; Straus's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Mr. Spalding, the violinist, [illegible] one of his [illegible] proposes [illegible] Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 24:

Sonata in A major.....Corelli
Prelude and Gavotte.....Bach
Chorale from the "Christmas Cantata"
Bach-Spalding
Sonata in A major, "The Kreutzer"..Beethoven
Tzigane.....Ravel
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 7 and 21
Brahms-Joachim
Romanza Andaluza—Jota Navarra.....Sarasate

From Bach to Satie With Koussevitzky

TRANS. —— FEB. 8 ——

THE fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Cambridge series last evening cast an exploring and eclectic eye over the field of orchestral literature. It encompassed music from John Sebastian Bach to Erik Satie and exemplified a great variety of styles in composition and orchestration. Seldom is the listener availed of so diversified a feast at one sitting. The reaction of the audience to each of the various compositions of Mr. Koussevitzky's choice was interesting to observe. In Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G Major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra, the gathering at Sanders Theater was plainly delighted; orchestra, soloists and conductor bowed to acknowledge the applause, and Mr. Koussevitzky made his way to the edge of the platform only to be enthusiastically recalled. Mozart's Symphony in C Major, "Jupiter," likewise gave much pleasure. For Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fetes," the audience listened absorbedly, yet was less generous in applause. For Satie's "Gymnopédies," Nos. 1 and 3, orchestrated by Debussy, it was more sparing still. There was here but a ripple of clapping; seemingly Satie's distant and dreamy music, whispering through Debussy's orchestration, had lulled his listeners to a receptive rather than a giving mood. For concluding piece Mr. Koussevitzky had planned Ravel's familiar choreographic poem, "The Waltz"; at the last minute, however, he substituted the prelude from Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg." Enthusiasm again ran high. Would Satie have fared similarly had he likewise dealt in sonorities, with equal skill, but in a modern idiom?

The concert was Mr. Koussevitzky's composition. It began intimately with Bach's concerto, expanded with Mozart's symphony, explored the colorful world of Debussy, subsided at the musings of Satie, strode to its conclusion with Wagner's prelude. As in the previous concert in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky surrounded himself with but a handful of musicians for the concerto of Bach. Heard through the edgeless performance of these few players, the delicate patterns of the music—the intricate traceries of smaller threads, the bright weavings of larger strands, the happy imitative figures, the combining and encircling designs were seen in all their exquisite correspondence. Mr. Burgin drew out and sustained a velvety tone; against this Mr. Laurent an Mr. Bladet tossed up their bright flute notes. The musicians engaged in debonair or waggish imitation. Closing measures retarded as in the curtsy of leave-taking. This is happy, neat music such as would have charmed the court of Frederick the Great; it now delights us commoners at Symphony Hall or Sanders Theater.

After the small orchestra for Bach came the full orchestra for Mozart. The contrast was striking. Mozart seemed a Beethoven beside the Bach of chamber music. Mr. Koussevitzky took full advantage of this interesting phenomenon. The first movement excelled in bright precision, in good-humored gaiety that seemed almost expansive. From the Andante the strings drew warm, throbbing melody—even Schubertian in its romantic lilt and subtle harmonic change. Busy vigor characterized the Fugue Finale. Mr. Koussevitzky turned briskly first to one side and then to the other to invoke the echoing voices of his several choirs.

Hearing Debussy's Nocturnes the listener enters another world. It is a world of mixed figures. It is a world of sight, of images dimly seen, of mystical visions appearing and disolving, of wispy vapors that catch and refract an eerie light. It is a world of feeling, of satiny textures, of caresses, of rounded surfaces, of tintinnabulating stimulations. It is a world of sound, of distant cymbals, of plashy liquids, of ecstatic sighs—of all the instrumental overtones in the modern symphony orchestra. Even more remotely sound the "Gymnopédies" of Satie. These two miniatures offer the most delicate contrasts of instrumental voices. As in leading us through the rooms of an art exhibition, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra discerningly show us the softer and subtler blendings of these impressions.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers" yesterday served as a triumphant climax rather than as jovial merry-making. It marched along in broad, sweeping curves: it was majestic and unctuously inflected. It had little humor save in the nimble piping of the wind winds. N. M. J.

TRANS FEB 9-192

Concerts Next Week

Orchestral

FRIDAY afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8.15 in Symphony Hall, concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; assisting chorus, The Cecilia: guest composer-conductor Ernest Schelling. The program asembles Franck's setting of Psalm CL; Roussel's "Evocations," one with incidental chorus; the Tartar dances, with choruses interspersed from Borodin's opera "Prince Igor"; Schelling's tone-picture, "Morocco."

Monday evening at 8.15, in Symphony Hall, supplementary concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Lolande Mérö, assisting pianist. The program:

Concerto, No. 4, in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra.....Bach
Concerto, No. 2, in A major for Piano and Orchestra.....Liszt
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra".Strauss

Thus Spake Zarathustra And Strauss

TRANS. FEB 9

With Koussevitzky to Interpret, and Bach and Mozart to Lead the Way

BACH, Mozart, Strauss, two concertos and a tone poem. Such was the course of the program which Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra—assisted by Mr. Orlov—in Mozart's concerto—played yesterday afternoon. The Bach concerto was the fourth of the Brandenburg set (for two flutes, violin and strings); from Mozart, the concerto in A major for piano and orchestra (the industrious Kochel numbered it 488); from Strauss, the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." By a coincidence the movements of the two concertos are named in exactly the same way: Allegro, Andante, Presto—Allegro, Andante, Presto. Also, both come out of the eighteenth century, Bach's near the end of its first quarter, Mozart's not far beyond the beginning of the last quarter. Yet in Mozart the form of the modern concerto has been established, the orchestra is the nucleus of that of a later day; in Bach these processes of "standardization"—as the learned sometimes say—had scarcely begun. In mood there are still resemblances. The brightness, the sunshine, the gayety of an Allegro or a Presto are not so different, whether the composer be the Bach of this Brandenburg concerto or the Mozart of the concerto for pianoforte, whether they are gained by the imitations of counterpoint or by the themes and passage-work of a later day.

As he had already done on Tuesday and again in Cambridge, Mr. Koussevitzky grouped about him for Bach's concerto a little band of no more than twenty-eight players, Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Bladet in the inner circle. Twice these columns have carried comment on the transparency which this slender orchestration gives to the music. To repeat were folly. Suffice it to say that Bach, the intimate Bach of whom one reads but whom in these modern days one does not often hear, sounds in new voice from this chamber orchestra. Intuitively one accepts it as the true voice for this music. And one may add to previous comment that a second hearing called attention to the pathos of the slow movement. Occasionally Bach—spinner of contrapuntal webs—in his sustained melodies touches the heart in manner which his later romantic brethren, sometimes with tears streaming down their musical cheeks, do not accomplish. And the quality of pathos in the music of Bach's day was not often met. Of the artistry of Messrs. Burgin and Laurent and Bladet one can only say that it was superb, in the intricate traceries as in the expressive melodies of this concerto.

As Mozart succeeds Bach, the orchestra upon the stage grows. It is not yet a full orchestra. Probably about half the strings are playing, together with the complement of winds which Mozart called for. Again the proportioning of instruments is one which especially suits the music. The orchestra plays its tutti, an ingratiating music. Mr. Orlov, clad quite simply in a business suit, answers in kind. Through the measures and the periods this music, music of charm, runs its course. As with Bach, an Andante follows. The flow of melody here is one of suavity where with Bach it was pathos and a degree of poignancy. A final Presto follows with its good spirits, its arresting rhythms, its wholesome exuberance. Mr. Orlov was ideal pianist for this music. His melodies were bright-toned, singing, not too seriously conceived. Mozart, man of the world, was mirrored in them. His passage-work, his rhythms, came lightly, crisply, in brisk motion. All the grace, the simplicity, the charm which one associates with Mozart one found abundantly in this performance of Mr. Orlov, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" was almost novelty at this concert. Mr. Koussevitzky has not previously attempted it. Mr. Monteux played it at a single pair of concerts in 1922. For frequent performance one must go back to the days of Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Gericke. Its general progress is from darkness to light, from heaviness to buoyancy, from obscurity to clarity. Such matters anyone can understand, what is more, can feel, without the assistance of an elaborate program. More specifically, it pictures the struggles of the soul in trying to know the world into which it has been placed. This groping soul turns to the usual sources for help—religion, love, knowledge. But for it, each of the three brings not an answer to its questionings; rather does it bring only one more form of bondage, and each time hopes are dashed to the ground each time disgust conquers. But "the dance," as Strauss, following Nietzsche insufficiently calls it, meaning the natural exuberance of the soul, its joy in life, its ability to project itself above gloomy questionings, above troubles and anxieties, its power to make for itself an ideal which shall be in itself a sufficient human answer to all its difficulties, all these form the radiant answer to the broodings of the beginning. The soul finds itself able to throw off vain questionings. The riddle of the universe, the problem of life is not solved, it is conquered. Not for humanity is it to solve questions of the infinite; the part of humanity is to be itself, to develop itself, to bring to flower its own finite possibilities, regardless of the puzzles which the race of the gods may strew into its path. Thus comes peace into the soul.

Strauss has not, as has sometimes been said, written or attempted to write "philosophical" music. One wonders indeed what "philosophical" music might be. He does not state the problem of life. He pictures at the beginning a troubled mind. He does declaim a creed,—though an ecclesiastical organ may for a moment intone a "Credo." He writes a music which the merest tyro will recognize as having religious associations. He unfolds the frenzies of passion exactly as composers throughout the best part of a century have unfolded them. He cannot feel an emotional counterpart for "Science," so he suggests it by the abstruseness of a fugue. All are cut shotr before they can flower into completeness. They do not satisfy. Strauss brings his hero to a long, definite, for the time being, conclusive pause. There are unformed passages when the music again begins. Its seriousness turns to gaiety, its sombreness to radiance. Analysits may discover that a new set of themes have been born out of the old. It does not matter. The hearer perceives his brighter music as a relief from the weightier music that has gone before. He cannot miss the transfiguration of the last moments. And to a modern hearer this conclusion of two tonalities offers no terrors. To a modern Strauss seems very discreet in the way in which he opposes them. The final C, though it be death itself after the quiet radiance of a sufficient ideal, is goal as well as beginning.

And as to performance? One cannot imagine the many themes more perfectly, more illusively charactered. One cannot imagine them more skillfully combined. One cannot imagine them growing out of each other, into each other, with more natural and persuasive continuity. One looks back in retrospect at the whole, finds it with its baffling multiplicity of detail, in this performance a single, perfectly articulated unit. Wonders perhaps will not cease. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" from Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon was one of them. A. H. M.

Globe

RDAY, FEBRUARY 9

"ZARATHUSTRA" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brilliant Performance of Strauss' Tone Poem

Nikolai Orloff Soloist in Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in A Major

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," was the chief item on yesterday's Symphony program. Mr Koussevitzky gave a brilliant interpretation of this long and relatively unfamiliar work. Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, for violin, two flutes and strings, and Mozart's A major pianoforte concerto, with Nikolai Orloff, young Russian pianist, as soloist, were the other numbers.

Strauss' published score contains a prefatory excerpt from Nietzsche's book, and a number of phrases from it are printed as captions heading different sections of the music. But the composer has said: "I did not intend to write philsosphical music or to portray in music Nietzsche's great work." What he did intend, he says, aside from homage to the great philosopher, was "to convey by means of music an idea of the development of the human race from its origin . . . up to Nietzsche's idea of the Superman."

Listening yesterday with all this in mind, one failed to find in the tone poem a musical outline of history. Heard by a musician able to read only music, and ignorant of Strauss' ideas and of philosophy, "Also Sprach Zarathustra" would probably seem effective and interesting music. Can any amount of annotation and explanation make it more than that?

Beethoven, too, read and pondered upon literary masterpieces. Sometimes he surprised his friends by telling them that this or that sonata or quartet was suggested to him by something he and they had read. But he never tried to link his orchestral music with his philosophy in the literal and pedantic fashion followed by commentators on Strauss, and never wholeheartedly repudiated by that composer.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra," judged as music, suffers from excessive complexity of texture, and from its episodic rather than climatic structure. It is particular passages, not a general impression, that one recalls. Mr Koussevitzky's interpretation had the usual [illegible] rhythm more intensity and variety than Mr Orloff brought to them. For his music, which demands the utmost possible technical skill, Mr Orloff's abilities were barely adequate.

Mr Koussevitzky, like every previous conductor of the Boston Symphony, has one composer to whom he is never able to do anything like full justice. And that composer is in his case Mozart. Dr Muck and Mr Monteux failed with Tchaikovsky, where he excels. Muck's Mozart was, of course, marvelous. The orchestral accompaniment for yesterday's concerto was unintelligent and inadequate. The music made so little sense to the conductor that he was unable to phrase properly one of its chief themes. He shifted the tempo in the first movement with a curious hesitancy, made little or nothing of a slow movement that should have been remarkably beautiful, showed his, expected ability to make music of all types interesting only in the lively finale. This performance was one of the very few hopelessly uninteresting ones Koussevitzky has conducted here. One sighed for some of the ill-applied energy that furbished up the Jupiter symphony the other day, a curious Mus[illegible] Towners" pro[illegible]ings [illegible] Battle of the Sexes.

TRAV. FEB 9 '29

Orloff Soloist at Symphony

Mr. Koussevitsky opened his program at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon with Bach's Bradenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major. It was written for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, and yesterday the solo parts were brilliantly handled by Richard Burgin, first violin, and G. Blaudet and G. Laurent, flutists. Nikolai Orloff was soloist in Mozart's A major concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. He is a pianist of distinct merit. The large audience displayed great interest in him and his splendid performance, and recalled him repeatedly to the platform. This concerto was beautifully interpreted.

Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," opend with majestic volume and beauty. It is based on Nietzsche's great work and is freely translated. According to the composer's own explanation, in this tone poem he meant to convey by means of music an idea of the development of the human race from its origin, through the various phases of its development, religious and scientific, up to Neitzsche's idea of the Superman. It was intended as his homage to Nietzsche. Mr. Koussevitsky's reading was magnificent.

The concert will be repeated this evening.

MON. FEB 9 '29

Nikolai Orloff Soloist With Boston Symphony

A soloist—rare intrusion nowadays—was invited to assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fifteenth pair of concerts, Feb. 8 and 9. This was Nikolai Orloff, who had elected to play Mozart's Concerto in A major (K. 488). Here was a somewhat forbidding situation—a Russian pianist, accompanied by an orchestra led by a Russian conductor, in a composition of Mozart's. But this alarm proved to have been needless. No one concerned betrayed any desire to turn Mozart into Scriabin. In fact, Mr. Orloff displayed a beautiful tone, sparkling rhythm and exquisite phrasing. As Mr. Koussevitzky with a reduced orchestra supported him in similar vein, we had here an exceptionally suitable team for the setting forth of this delicate art. The performance was charming, and deserved the plaudits it won.

The concert opened with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major violin, two flutes and string orchestra. If this is not the greatest of the Brandenburg concertos, it serves at least as a good vehicle for the virtuosity of Mr. Burgin, the concert master, Messrs. Laurent and Bladet, flautists, and the men of the first few chairs of the several string sections.

For climax, Mr. Koussevitzky offered Richard Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which he interpreted on this occasion for the first time in his Boston pashawlic. The art of Strauss as revealed in his tone-poems is singularly congenial to this conductor, providing dramatic moments in profusion.

There has been a vast amount of disputation over the "meaning" of this and the other tone-poems of Strauss, which has served little purpose save that of publicity. Strauss, Stravinsky and other composers have a coy habit of allowing a "program" of a piece to be made public, and then asserting that the composition is to be regarded as pure music. The thing to do is to take them at their word, and ignore the "programs." With some of these composers, this course is disastrous; their scores, listened to as music, hardly hold our attention.

With Strauss, at least with the Strauss of these early tone-poems, it is different. He really has no need of these methods. If there is to be a din over him, his music is quite capable of providing it. We can afford to disregard the elaborate literary accompaniment to a score of this sort, especially when we realize that even if music can be relied on to epresent the upsetting of applecarts, he bleating of sheep and the crying of babies, it can hardly be expected o interpret abstract thought. This core has its bombilations and its ry spots; but it has also an astonshing wealth of invention and a azzling instrumental luminosity. So t us forget Nietzsche and his Superan, and be content with the Superan of Orchestration.

But let us at the same time reember that these scores do not me to life unaided. Only a conctor of genius, with an unbevably flexible orchestra at his mmand, could produce such a gurant performance as that of sterday.

L. A. S.

POST FEB 9 '29

OUR ORCHESTRA'S NEEDS

When we say "our orchestra," it is taken for granted that we mean the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is incomparable, the acknowledged finest in the world. And we are proud of it. But it has its difficulties, nevertheless; financial ones.

The statement of the trustees for 1928 shows a deficit of $87,068; subscriptions to help cover this were received to the amount of $73,179. This year the deficit will be much larger. Orchestra salaries will be increased by nearly $15,000. Income will be less by $32,000, because nobody has come forward to take the place of the late W. S. Quimby, through whose generosity the broadcasting privilege was paid for. Add last year's actual deficit of $14,000 and this year's deficit is estimated at $134,000.

The concerts can only be carried on by the generosity of the public. Though the prices for tickets are moderate, the management does not feel like raising them at the present time. Why, then, may not some man of means arrange for the very educational work of broadcasting the concerts? The season is only a little more than half over. We know that very many people were delighted by them.

But, apart from that, our matchless orchestra, with its great conductor, must not suffer through the lack of funds. Subscriptions are requested. Surely there are enough citizens of Boston, taking pride in one of its great institutions, to pay the deficit 10 times over.

TRANS FEB 7 29

Concert-Chronicle

Strauss and Nietzsche

THUS spake Zarathustra." These words are found at the end of most of the eighty chapters of Nietzsche's book of the same name. But the Musical Courier probably did well when it entitled an appreciative article on Richard Strauss's tone-poem, also of the same name, "Thus spake Richard Strauss." For seldom has a musical work been saddled with a more unfortunate title. Much of the adverse criticism which it received when it was new (1896) centered about the contention that music should not be required to express a philosophical system, that such was not and could not be the province of music. And the title formed one of the major premises in this argument. As a matter of fact, the program of this tone-poem, which will be played by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday and Saturday, is not a whit more philosophical than the program of many another tone-poem of Strauss or Liszt, or than the scheme of many a program symphony of the Romantic composers. The idea of man trying to solve the riddle of existence, of experiencing life's joys and life's sorrows, of finally conquering—in a glorious "apotheosis"—has been at the root of many such a symphony. It is the fundamental scheme of Strauss's work; but Strauss in "Thus spake Zarathustra" as in some of his other works, ends with the peace of contentment rather than with the glory of conquest. Nietzsche serves chiefly in three ways: to give the piece a title and to give it its introduction in the printed score; to furnish titles (cheaper headings, in Nietzsche's book) to the different sections of the tone-poem; to suggest the solution which Strauss gives to the problem. Of the abstruse philosophizing of the author there is nothing in the work of the composer.

Consider then this scheme as subject for a romantic tone-poem: Man is confronted with the riddle of the universe, or the problem of existence, the question of the reason for life, of achieving happiness in it. He turns to religion and finds no answer to satisfy him. An adolescent, he plunges into the joys and passion of life. Again all turns to dust and ashes in his very mouth. Achieving maturity, he would find his answer in science. Failing once more in finding a lasting solution, he comes to an abrupt halt. He reviews the course of his past life. He is disgusted with much of it. He turns at last to "the dance" as the best possible solution, recognizing, however, that it is still an imperfect solution, that indeed it is not given to man to solve the riddle of the universe. "The dance" is of course taken to typify an attitude of mind which accepts with light heart and cheerful spirit the joys and pleasures of life as well as its problems and sorrows; which does not weight and burden itself with things too deep for it; does not accept heaviness and gloom as a solution; but which on the contrary soars above all such brooding as being too petty for the mind of man. Romantic stuff, all of it. Indeed, in its main outlines similar to the course of Beethoven's ninth symphony, which also begins in chaos and ends with joy. But Beethoven accepts joy as a final solution; Strauss accepts it as the best solution, even while recognizing that an ultimate solution is impossible.

There are four main motifs, three of which run like guiding thoughts through the whole work, the fourth entering near the end of the first half—(1) the nature-motif, or motif of the eternal riddle; (2) the motif of longing or seeking, typifying man's search for his ideal; (3) the motif of disgust and of loathing; (4) the dance motif. A somber introduction serves chiefly to introduce the first motif, heard at once, rising starkly in three notes above the initial note of the basses. Then comes the first section, "Of the Backworldsmen," devoted to religion. After some shadowy anticipations of the theme which suggests religion, basses and 'cellos pizzicato play the second motif, that of "seeking." Then horns at once intone "Credo in unum deum" and the "religion" theme follows. The next section "Of the Great Longing" develops more fully both the first and second motifs, harks back to the religious section including an organ quotation of "Magnificat," and anticipates the following "Of Joys and Passions." There is a separate theme for joys and another, more ardent, for passions. The latter is ruddily interrupted by the trombones with the sinister "Disgust." "The Grave Song" for the formalist begins a section which corresponds to the working-out of a sonata; for the programmist our hero regretfully examines all the works of the past and finds them wanting; longing and striving supplant all else. Religion and passion having failed to satisfy, our hero turns to "Science." A fugue pictures its abstractions—and its futilities for the hero's purposes. "Disgust" and "Longing" conquer, but the latter becomes less hopeless, more human, leads indeed, vision-like, to the first entry of the "dance motif." But the fugal "Science" is still in the mind of the hero, as by the ministrations of the more hopeful "Longing" and of "The Dance," he becomes "The Convalescent." But "Disgust" brings him to a snarp and definite halt; he has been prepared for such solution as is possible.

"Longing" and "Disgust" now dominate, and a rhythmically amorphous section leads from the heavy four-four meter to the dance-like three-four. The "Dance-motif" now dominates. Convalescence becomes complete, we turn to the section entitled "The Dance-Song," the theme of which is really an extension of the "nature" or "riddle" motif. (For the formalist we have now arrived at the recapitulation.) The religious theme is relieved of heaviness by being transfigured through a waltz rhythm; the themes of joy and passion lose their earthiness. "The Night-wanderer-song" brings greater luminosity, greater peace, as the hero comes to the realization (not without its own serenity) that all that is human must perish (transformation of "Disgust" motif), that unformed "Longing" may become a glorified "Ideal," but that the unsolvable riddle must remain. With the peace of such an attained goal "Thus Spake Zarathustra" comes to conclusion—significantly in a choral of two tonalities.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Koussevitzky will continue his annual custom of a program assembled from music for chorus and orchestra. This year he has chosen Franck's setting of the One Hundredth and Fiftieth Psalm; Roussel's "Evocations"; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." For orchestra alone, Mr. Schelling's "Morocco," will round out the concerts, with the composer conducting. Roussel's "Evocations" are symphonic sketches suggested by visits to Farther India and Cochin-China. The first and the third ask an orchestra only. The second adds a chorus. As a triptych they have not hitherto been heard in Boston. The Cecilia will provide the chorus. Mr. Malcolm Lang trained it.

For the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening, the program traverses Bach's Concerto in G major for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra; Liszt's Concerto in A major for Piano and Orchestra with Mme. Mérö as pianist; Straus's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Mr. Spalding, the violinist, proposes one of [illegible] Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 24:

Sonata in A major.....Corelli
Prelude and Gavotte.....Bach
Chorale from the "Christmas Cantata"
Bach-Spalding
Sonata in A major, "The Kreutzer".Beethoven
Tzigane.....Ravel
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 7 and 21
Brahms-Joachim
Romanza Andaluse—Jota Navarra.....Sarasate

From Bach to Satie With Koussevitzky

TRANS. — FEB. 8 —

THE fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Cambridge series last evening cast an exploring and eclectic eye over the field of orchestral literature. It encompassed music from John Sebastian Bach to Erik Satie and exemplified a great variety of styles in composition and orchestration. Seldom is the listener availed of so diversified a feast at one sitting. The reaction of the audience to each of the various compositions of Mr. Koussevitzky's choice was interesting to observe. In Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G Major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra, the gathering at Sanders Theater was plainly delighted; orchestra, soloists and conductor bowed to acknowledge the applause, and Mr. Koussevitzky made his way to the edge of the platform only to be enthusiastically recalled. Mozart's Symphony in C Major, "Jupiter," likewise gave much pleasure. For Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fetes," the audience listened absorbedly, yet was less generous in applause. For Satie's "Gymnopédies," Nos. 1 and 3, orchestrated by Debussy, it was more sparing still. There was here but a ripple of clapping; seemingly Satie's distant and dreamy music, whispering through Debussy's orchestration, had lulled his listeners to a receptive rather than a giving mood. For concluding piece Mr. Koussevitzky had planned Ravel's familiar choreographic poem, "The Waltz"; at the last minute, however, he substituted the prelude from Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg." Enthusiasm again ran high. Would Satie have fared similarly had he likewise dealt in sonorities, with equal skill, but in a modern idiom?

The concert was Mr. Koussevitzky's composition. It began intimately with Bach's concerto, expanded with Mozart's symphony, explored the colorful world of Debussy, subsided at the musings of Satie, strode to its conclusion with Wagner's prelude. As in the previous concert in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky surrounded himself with but a handful of musicians for the concerto of Bach. Heard through the edgeless performance of these few players, the delicate patterns of the music—the intricate traceries of smaller threads, the bright weavings of larger strands, the happy imitative figures, the combining and encircling designs were seen in all their exquisite correspondence. Mr. Burgin drew out and sustained a velvety tone; against this Mr. Laurent an Mr. Bladet tossed up their bright flute notes. The musicians engaged in debonair or waggish imitation. Closing measures retarded as in the curtsy of leave-taking. This is happy, neat music such as would have charmed the court of Frederick the Great; it now delights us commoners at Symphony Hall or Sanders Theater.

After the small orchestra for Bach came the full orchestra for Mozart. The contrast was striking. Mozart seemed a Beethoven beside the Bach of chamber music. Mr. Koussevitzky took full advantage of this interesting phenomenon. The first movement excelled in bright precision, in good-humored gaiety that seemed almost expansive. From the Andante the strings drew warm, throbbing melody—even Schubertian in its romantic lilt and subtle harmonic change. Busy vigor characterized the Fugue Finale. Mr. Koussevitzky turned briskly first to one side and then to the other to invoke the echoing voices of his several choirs.

Hearing Debussy's Nocturnes the listener enters another world. It is a world of mixed figures. It is a world of sight, of images dimly seen, of mystical visions appearing and disolving, of wispy vapors that catch and refract an eerie light. It is a world of feeling, of satiny textures, of caresses, of rounded surfaces, of tintinnabulating stimulations. It is a world of sound, of distant cymbals, of plashy liquids, of ecstatic sighs—of all the instrumental overtones in the modern symphony orchestra. Even more remotely sound the "Gymnopédies" of Satie. These two miniatures offer the most delicate contrasts of instrumental voices. As in leading us through the rooms of an art exhibition, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra discerningly show us the softer and subtler blendings of these impressions.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers" yesterday served as a triumphant climax rather than as jovial merry-making. It marched along in broad, sweeping curves: it was majestic and unctuously inflected. It had little humor save in the nimble piping of the wood winds. N. M. J.

TRANS FEB 9-192

Page Twelve

Concerts Next Week

Orchestral

FRIDAY afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8.15 in Symphony Hall, concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; assisting chorus, The Cecilia; guest composer-conductor Ernest Schelling. The program asembles Franck's setting of Psalm CL; Roussel's "Evocations," one with incidental chorus; the Tartar dances, with choruses interspersed from Borodin's opera "Prince Igor"; Schelling's tone-picture, "Morocco."

Monday evening at 8.15, in Symphony Hall, supplementary concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Lolande Mérö, assisting pianist. The program:

Concerto, No. 4, in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra.....Bach
Concerto, No. 2, in A major for Piano and Orchestra .....Liszt
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra".Strauss

Thus Spake Zarathustra And Strauss

TRANS. FEB 9

With Koussevitzky to Interpret, and Bach and Mozart to Lead the Way

BACH, Mozart, Strauss; two concertos and a tone poem. Such was the course of the program which Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra—assisted by Mr. Orlov—in Mozart's concerto—played yesterday afternoon. The Bach concerto was the fourth of the Brandenburg set (for two flutes, violin and strings); from Mozart, the concerto in A major for piano and orchestra (the industrious Kochel numbered it 488); from Strauss, the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." By a coincidence the movements of the two concertos are named in exactly the same way: Allegro, Andante, Presto—Allegro, Andante, Presto. Also, both come out of the eighteenth century, Bach's near the end of its first quarter, Mozart's not far beyond the beginning of the last quarter. Yet in Mozart the form of the modern concerto has been established, the orchestra is the nucleus of that of a later day; in Bach these processes of "standardization"—as the learned sometimes say—had scarcely begun. In mood there are still resemblances. The brightness, the sunshine, the gayety of an Allegro or a Presto are not so different, whether the composer be the Bach of this Brandenburg concerto or the Mozart of the concerto for pianoforte, whether they are gained by the imitations of counterpoint or by the themes and passage-work of a later day.

As he had already done on Tuesday and again in Cambridge, Mr. Koussevitzky grouped about him for Bach's concerto a little band of no more than twenty-eight players, Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Bladet in the inner circle. Twice these columns have carried comment on the transparency which this slender orchestration gives to the music. To repeat were folly. Suffice it to say that Bach, the intimate Bach of whom one reads but whom in these modern days one does not often hear, sounds in new voice from this chamber orchestra. Intuitively one accepts it as the true voice for this music. And one may add to previous comment that a second hearing called attention to the pathos of the slow movement. Occasionally Bach—spinner of contrapuntal webs—in his sustained melodies touches the heart in manner which his later romantic brethren, sometimes with tears streaming down their musical cheeks, do not accomplish. And the quality of pathos in the music of Bach's day was not often met. Of the artistry of Messrs. Burgin and Laurent and brisk motion. All the grace, the simplicity, the charm which one associates with Mozart one found abundantly in this performance of Mr. Orlov, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" was almost novelty at this concert. Mr. Koussevitzky has not previously attempted it. Mr. Monteux played it at a single pair of concerts in 1922. For frequent performance one must go back to the days of Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Gericke. Its general progress is from darkness to light, from heaviness to buoyancy, from obscurity to clarity. Such matters anyone can understand, what is more, can feel, without the assistance of an elaborate program. More specifically, it pictures the struggles of the soul in trying to know the world into which it has been placed. This groping soul turns to the usual sources for help—religion, love, knowledge. But for it, each of the three brings not an answer to its questionings; rather does it bring only one more form of bondage, and each time hopes are dashed to the ground, each time disgust conquers. But "the dance," as Strauss, following Nietzsche insufficiently calls it, meaning the natural exuberance of the soul, its joy in life, its ability to project itself above gloomy questionings, above troubles and anxieties, its power to make for itself an ideal which shall be in itself a sufficient human answer to all its difficulties, all these form the radiant answer to the broodings of the beginning. The soul finds itself able to throw off vain questionings. The riddle of the universe, the problem of life is not solved, it is conquered. Not for humanity is it to solve questions of the infinite; the part of humanity is to be itself, to develop itself, to bring to flower its own finite possibilities, regardless of the puzzles which the race of the gods may strew into its path. Thus comes peace into the soul.

Strauss has not, as has sometimes been said, written or attempted to write "philosophical" music. One wonders indeed what "philosophical" music might be. He does not state the problem of life. He pictures at the beginning a troubled mind. He does declaim a creed,—though an ecclesiastical organ may for a moment intone a "Credo." He writes a music which the merest tyro will recognize as having religious associations. He unfolds the frenzies of passion exactly as composers throughout the best part of a century have unfolded them. He cannot feel an emotional counterpart for "Science," so he suggests it by the abstruseness of a fugue. All are cut shotr before they can flower into completeness. They do not satisfy. Strauss brings his hero to a long, definite, for the time being, conclusive pause. There are unformed passages when the music again begins. Its seriousness turns to gaiety, its sombreness to radiance. Analysits may discover that a new set of

Globe

RDAY, FEBRUARY 9

"ZARATHUSTRA" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brilliant Performance of Strauss' Tone Poem

Nikolai Orloff Soloist in Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in A Major

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," was the chief item on yesterday's Symphony program. Mr Koussevitzky gave a brilliant interpretation of this long and relatively unfamiliar work. Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, for violin, two flutes and strings, and Mozart's A major pianoforte concerto, with Nikolai Orloff, young Russian pianist, as soloist, were the other numbers.

Strauss' published score contains a prefatory excerpt from Nietzsche's book, and a number of phrases from it are printed as captions heading different sections of the music. But the composer has said: "I did not intend to write philsosphical music or to portray in music Nietzsche's great work." What he did intend, he says, aside from homage to the great philosopher, was "to convey by means of music an idea of the development of the human race from its origin . . . up to Nietzsche's idea of the Superman."

Listening yesterday with all this in mind, one failed to find in the tone poem a musical outline of history. Heard by a musician able to read only music, and ignorant of Strauss' ideas and of philosophy, "Also Sprach Zarathustra" would probably seem effective and interesting music. Can any amount of annotation and explanation make it more than that?

Beethoven, too, read and pondered upon literary masterpieces. Sometimes he surprised his friends by telling them that this or that sonata or quartet was suggested to him by something he and they had read. But he never tried to link his orchestral music with his philosophy in the literal and pedantic fashion followed by commentators on Strauss, and never wholeheartedly repudiated by that composer.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra," judged as music, suffers from excessive complexity of texture, and from its episodic rather than climatic structure. It is particular passages, not a general impression, that one recalls. Mr Koussevitzky's interpretation had the usual sonority and strenuousness. It was brilliant, but it lacked clarity and order.

For the Bach concerto, Mr Koussevitzky used a small group of strings. He omitted the harpsichord on which Bach intended a musician to play chords from a figured bass in order to provide a smooth tonal background for the flowing web of sound from his few instruments. He added two double basses, not in the original score. If these played the notes of the figured bass continuo, as they may have done, they made, of course, no attempt to build cords on them. The thinness of orchestral texture which troubled at least one listener was due not so much to the small number of strings as to the absence of the harpsichord. The three soloists performed very difficult parts with notable skill. Mr Koussevitzky did not show much insight into Bach's melody and rhythm.

In the Mozart concerto, number 488 in Koechel's thematic catalog, Mr Orloff played with unassuming competence and correctness. It is, however, desirable to give to Mozart's melody more flexibility, and to his rhythm more intensity and variety than Mr Orloff brought to them. For his music, which demands the utmost possible technical skill, Mr Orloff's abilities were barely adequate.

Mr Koussevitzky, like every previous conductor of the Boston Symphony, has one composer to whom he is never able to do anything like full justice. And that composer is in his case Mozart. Dr Muck and Mr Monteux failed with Tchaikovsky, where he excels. Muck's Mozart was, of course, marvelous. The orchestral accompaniment for yesterday's concerto was unintelligent and inadequate. The music made so little sense to the conductor that he was unable to phrase properly one of its chief themes. He shifted the tempo in the first movement with a curious hesitancy, made little or nothing of a slow movement that should have been remarkably beautiful, showed his, expected ability to make music of all types interesting only in the lively finale. This performance was one of the very few hopelessly uninteresting ones Koussevitzky has conducted here. One sighed for some of the ill-applied energy that furbished up the Jupiter symphony the other day in a curious Muscovite manner.

Next week the Cecilia Society will assist in several choral pieces, and Ernest Schelling will conduct his own tone poem, "Morocco." P. R.

MON FEB 9 29

Nikolai Orloff Soloist With Boston Symphony

A soloist—rare intrusion nowadays—was invited to assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fifteenth pair of concerts, Feb. 8 and 9. This was Nikolai Orloff, who had elected to play Mozart's Concerto in A major (K. 488). Here was a somewhat forbidding situation—a Russian pianist, accompanied by an orchestra led by a Russian conductor, in a composition of Mozart's. But this alarm proved to have been needless. No one concerned betrayed any desire to turn Mozart into Scriabin. In fact, Mr. Orloff displayed a beautiful tone, sparkling rhythm and exquisite phrasing. As Mr. Koussevitzky with a reduced orchestra supported him in similar vein, we had here an exceptionally suitable team for the setting forth of this delicate art. The performance was charming, and deserved the plaudits it won.

The concert opened with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major violin, two flutes and string orchestra. If this is not the greatest of the Brandenburg concertos, it serves at least as a good vehicle for the virtuosity of Mr. Burgin, the concert master, Messrs. Laurent and Bladet, flautists, and the men of the first few chairs of the several string sections.

For climax, Mr. Koussevitzky offered Richard Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which he interpreted on this occasion for the first time in his Boston pashawlic. The art of Strauss as revealed in his tone-poems is singularly congenial to this conductor, providing dramatic moments in profusion.

There has been a vast amount of disputation over the "meaning" of this and the other tone-poems of Strauss, which has served little purpose save that of publicity. Strauss, Stravinsky and other composers have a coy habit of allowing a "program" of a piece to be made public, and then asserting that the composition is to be regarded as pure music. The thing to do is to take them at their word, and ignore the "programs." With some of these composers, this course is disastrous; their scores, listened to as music, hardly hold our attention.

With Strauss, at least with the Strauss of these early tone-poems, it is different. He really has no need of these methods. If there is to be a din over him, his music is quite capable of providing it. We can afford to disregard the elaborate literary accompaniment to a score of this sort, especially when we realize that even if music can be relied on to represent the upsetting of applecarts, the bleating of sheep and the crying of babies, it can hardly be expected to interpret abstract thought. This score has its bombilations and its dry spots; but it has also an astonishing wealth of invention and a dazzling instrumental luminosity. So let us forget Nietzsche and his Superman, and be content with the Superman of Orchestration.

But let us at the same time remember that these scores do not come to life unaided. Only a conductor of genius, with an unbelievably flexible orchestra at his command, could produce such a fulgurant performance as that of yesterday. L. A. S.

Bos. POST FEB 9 '29

OUR ORCHESTRA'S NEEDS

When we say "our orchestra," it is taken for granted that we mean the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is incomparable, the acknowledged finest in the world. And we are proud of it. But it has its difficulties, nevertheless; financial ones.

The statement of the trustees for 1928 shows a deficit of $87,068; subscriptions to help cover this were received to the amount of $73,179. This year the deficit will be much larger. Orchestra salaries will be increased by nearly $15,000. Income will be less by $32,000, because nobody has come forward to take the place of the late W. S. Quimby, through whose generosity the broadcasting privilege was paid for. Add last year's actual deficit of $14,000 and this year's deficit is estimated at $134,000.

The concerts can only be carried on by the generosity of the public. Though the prices for tickets are moderate, the management does not feel like raising them at the present time. Why, then, may not some man of means arrange for the very educational work of broadcasting the concerts? The season is only a little more than half over. We know that very many people were delighted by them.

But, apart from that, our matchless orchestra, with its great conductor, must not suffer through the lack of funds. Subscriptions are requested. Surely there are enough citizens of Boston, taking pride in one of its great institutions, to pay the deficit 10 times over.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

88

Herald

29

FEB 9 - MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon comprised Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's Piano Concerto, A major (K. 488), and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

For the Brandenburg Concerto, Mr. [illegible] lessened the number of strings, nor was the full body of strings employed in Mozart's Concerto. Not that orchestras were necessarily small in Vienna when Mozart was living. At a concert where he played a concerto the orchestra numbered 180, but it is not probable that all the members of the society took part. Concerts, however, were given at Vienna in the latter part of the 18th century by orchestras ranging from 200 to 400 in number.

When pianists today go to Mozart for a concerto they usually choose the one in D minor. The one in A major chosen by Mr. Orloff—there is an earlier one in the same key—is so beautiful, in its lively movements as in the pathetic Andante conspicuous for tenderness and pleasing melancholy, it is surprising that it has been ignored; but Mozart's music is not for every pianist however famous he may be. It is more difficult by its apparent simplicity than many concertos of the thunder-and-guns-and-all-that character. One may be brilliant with Liszt and Tchaikovsky, solemnly "intellectual" with Brahms, or play Beethoven in what is described as "the true Beethovian spirit," whatever that may mean, yet come to grief when Mozart is in question.

Fortunately for the audience yesterday there was Mr. Koussevitsky, an ideal interpreter of Mozart; an orchestra that Mozart would have applauded; a pianist who would have met Mozarts demand that his music should "sound; should flow like oil in certain passages. Mr. Orloff played most musically, not merely with the pedantic, cool intelligence that often passes for a musical interpretation. Expression of intense emotion, passion was not considered artistic in the Vienna of Mozart's time, nor was it in the music. Grace, tenderness, a melancholy subdued as in a reverie, serenity even in melancholy—these were expected in an andante. And so Mr. Orloff, who had shown in his recital two season ago that he could dazzle by his brilliance and sound the note of deep emotion, played this concerto as one believes Mozart would have liked it.

Mr. Koussevitzy is as artistic in his treatment of Bach as in his reading of Mozart. The concerto, it is needless to say when there is mention of Mr. Burgin, the violinist, Messrs. Laurent and Bladet, the flutists, and the admirable members of the string section, was delightfully performed. It is to be wished that Bach had cut the opening allegro shorter; the good man's musical talk in this movement is chatter before he is through with what he has to say. As the movement is signed with the name of Bach, those who almost swoon with admiration whenever his name is mentioned—there is much "bunk" in circles of music "appreciators"—accept him in bulk, and would say, "Oh that it would never end!" and would sigh soulfully in their rapt enjoyment.

Whatever one may think of Strauss's "Zarathustra," whether it is to be classed among his greatest works; whether it contains much that is sonorous but is really labored and unimpressive; whether the attempt to translate passages of Nietzsche concerning individualism and the deification of life into tones was imprudent, if not foolish, one must admit that there are great moments in this tone-poem. "Stupendous" is not too big a word for the introduction; there is beauty in the "Grave Song," Homeric gaiety in the "Tanzlied"; mystery in the ending, nor to appreciate this ending is it necessary to think of the "Ideal" swaying aloft or the "World Riddle" growling below. One does well to hear this tone-poem without thought of Nietzsche.

Nor is "marvellous" too big a word for Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation; nor for the orchestral performance. No greater performance by an orchestra has been heard in Symphony hall since it was dedicated; it would be hard to name one that was so great.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra at the concerts next week will be assisted by the Cecilia Society trained by Malcolm Lang, its conductor. Franck, Psalm 150 for chorus, orchestra and organ. Roussel, "Evocations," the third one with chorus. Schelling, "Morocco," (conducted by the composer). Borodin, Polovtsian dances with chorus, from "Prince Igor."

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky, whose interest in choral music has often been manifested, has secured the aid of the Cecilia Society for this week's Symphony concerts in the regular series. The chorus will be heard in Franck's 150th Psalm, the familiar dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," and one of a set of three "Evocations," an early work of the Parisian composer, Roussel, one of the elder generation of living French musicians. "La Ville Rose," from this set of pieces, was played here under Mr Monteux. The other numbers are new to Boston. Mr Schelling, one of the most eminent of American composers, will conduct his new tone-poem, "Morocco."

There is to be a soloist at the fourth Monday Symphony concert tomorrow, Yolanda Mero, the Hungarian pianist, remembered from several previous appearances in Boston as a notable technician gifted with a temperament.

Boston

AY, FEBRUARY 9, 1

SYMPHONY IN STRAUSS' TONE-POEM

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Played Again

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The first performance here under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction of Strauss' Nietzschean tone-poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra," was the outstanding feature of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Before this heaven-storming music came two pieces of slenderer sonorities; the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; and an A major Piano Concerto of Mozart, with Nicolai Orloff as the soloist.

AFTER LAPSE OF YEARS

Once upon a time "Zarathustra" was common experience at the Symphony concerts. In the programme book yesterday was a record of performances in 1909, 1910, 1911, 1915 and 1916. Then came the suppression of all things German, not until 1922 was "Zarathustra" again heard in Symphony Hall, to be neglected thereafter until the concert of yesterday. Now and again this absence of an accustomed music makes it more than ever welcome on its return. But sometimes such rehearing after a lapse of years brings both a clarification and a disillusionment.

Yesterday, for case in point, "Zarathustra" seemed to be not of the greater Strauss, even granting that no other composer, living or dead, could have made it as it is. From the very nature of the impossible task which Strauss sought to accomplish, the translation into music of separated passages from Nietzsche's philosophical work, Strauss could not gain in this tone-poem the organic unity that is displayed in its fellows.

Not His Greatest Invention

And save for the stark C-G-C of the Zarathustra motif, the themes are not among Strauss' most salient and characteristic inventions. The Hinterweltern melody, perhaps appropriately enough, is but a glorified hymn-tune; the fugue subject is mere contrivance; the dance theme, a Viennese waltz, and the melody in thirds which recurs at the end, mere Teutonic sentimentality, while only the theme of the section "Of Joys and Passions" has the truly Straussian sweep and fervor.

But, to give the composer his due, yesterday's performance, although in many respects a brilliant one, did not at every turn do fullest justice to the music. The climax in the opening portrayal of the sunrise came a measure or two too soon, and one of the most impressive effects in all symphonic music missed fire. There is more in the music "Of Joys and Passions" than was disclosed yesterday, and even in its apotheosis, which should be the waltzing of the stars in their courses, the dance kept always one foot on terra firma.

Certain to Improve

Ir precedent is any criterion, however, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have together become more practiced in it, they will do better by "Zarathustra."

For the 18th century pieces Mr. Koussevitzky wisely used yesterday a much reduced string band. The performance of Bach's Concerto, not the most interesting of the six, was warmly received, and the soloists, Mr. Burgin, Mr. Laurent and Mr. Bladet, were called upon to bow. The Concerto of Mozart, notable chiefly for its poetic Andante, was played by Mr. Orloff with exceeding neatness and taste. He, too, was applauded and heartily, according to his just deserts.

CONCERTS IN FEB 9 SYMPHONY CONCERTS

By MOSES SMITH

There is a possibility of too much of a good thing, as Aristotle, a talented Greek philosopher, remarked more than twenty centuries ago. The immediate reference is to the current pair of Boston Symphony concerts, the first of which the writer attended yesterday.

After almost a fortnight of constant attendance at the Opera House the most ardent music-lover has become temporarily sated with a musical diet. Musical indigestion begins to set in. Melodies of Verdi mingle confusedly with Wagnerian motives, and one finds it difficult to distinguish between the Debuss of "Pelleas" and the "Carmen" of Bizet.

We offer this apology in lieu of writing an adequate review of the Symphony concert. So far as our insensitive ears could determine, the performance was of a more or less routine character, despite the presence of a soloist. The opening piece was Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto—not one of the master's greatest works. Richard Burgin, solo violinist, and two solo-flutes, played by Messrs. Laurent and Bladet, combined with Mr. Koussevitzky and the reduced string orchestra in a competent performance.

Nikolai Orloff, Russian pianist, was the soloist in Mozart's A major piano concerto. The pianist had moments of charm as well as brilliance in his playing. At all times he kept the solo part subservient to the ensemble. One bad passage in the third movement marred an otherwise clean and musical rendition. The orchestral support under Mr. Koussevitzky was highly sympathetic. Mr. Orloff was recalled several times by the applause of the audience.

The last number was in the nature of a "revival" — Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra." For the first time in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky conducted this musical elaboration on a philosophic poem. The piece was brilliantly played, in our opinion, with poetic insight keenly evidenced in many pages. But the whole was episodic rather than unified—a patchwork of beautiful pieces, not a single great pattern.

An Orchestra in Need

The Symphony Concerts Face a Largely Increased Deficit Only Partially Guaranteed

TRANS — FEB 11

THE Symphony Orchestra is in need of money—of money to meet operating expenses. In a quiet fashion, more impressive than the usual shriek and jabber of "publicity," the Trustees make known as much in the program-book for the concerts of last week. The deficit for the musical year, 1927-28, ending last July, was $87,000. The deficit for the present musical year, 1928-29, will exceed it by more than fifty per cent—say $47,000. It was necessary to raise salaries by $15,000. Otherwise there has been no material increase in outlay. The treasury, however, is the poorer by $32,000—the fee paid for the broadcasting, now discontinued, of the Symphony Concerts and of occasional Pop Concerts. Consequently, instead of the comfortable and familiar deficit of $87,000, a new and uncomfortable net loss of $134,000 faces the Trustees; while as yet the subscriptions to the annual Guarantee Fund are less than $75,000. With reason they continue:

> The Trustees are aware that this is a large sum to seek from the public. It is nevertheless the fact that in other cities the annual deficits of the orchestras are considerably larger than in Boston. It is also a fact that our orchestra now occupies a foremost place among the artistic and broadly educational organizations of its kind. As an institution it touches both the pride and the keen personal interest of a large element in the community The Trustees are therefore confident that its support will be continued, even at the increased cost which the changing times have demanded.
>
> In the first year after the passing of the support of the orchestra by a single generous citizen to its maintenance by the public, the subscribers to the deficit numbered but 127. In ten years this number has risen to 397. The Trustees believe that it is still capable of large extension. They would greatly appreciate a continuance of the help they have received, with such increase in the scale of it as individual impulse may prompt. They would welcome most of all an appreciable increase in the number of individual subscribers, of whom they believe that many share their faith in the orchestra and their desire to hold it in its present place in the artistic life of America.

The Audience, The Conductor, And a Concert

TRANS — FEB 12

Signs of the Times No Less Than a Program from Bach to Strauss

For the rare visitor to the supplementary concerts of the Symphony Orchestra it was pleasure to hear the applause that on Monday evening welcomed Mr. Koussevitzky to his place. It was long, honest, hearty. It came from an audience representative of the intelligent, substantial middle class in the musically inclined community. On Saturday evenings, a sophisticated company lends the conductor ear. On Tuesday afternoons a youthful public from schools and colleges, a suburban public from the remoter environs, sits before him. On Friday afternoons mixed motives assemble a mixed audience. On these Monday evenings, above any other occasion, he comes in contact with average listeners. (The adjective is written with no disparagement.) Not only did they salute him warmly. At every possible opportunity they renewed their plaudits. At the end of Bach's Concerto it must have the little orchestra standing with the conductor in the center of the crescent. At the end of "Zarathustra," it lingered to do as much for Mr. Koussevitzky and his full forces. When Mme Mérö had played through Liszt's Concerto, it must have back the conductor as well as the pianist. Beyond peradventure these Monday audiences hold Mr. Koussevitzky in warm regard and with him the orchestra he has re-created in his own image. At the back of their heads at least is the notion that he has restored it to high place in the American and the European world.

At the moment it is worth while to dwell upon these casual, familiar circumstances. The Trustees of the orchestra, as two pages in the program-book indicated, face a larger deficit in operating expenses than they have encountered in recent years. It arises from conditions largely beyond their control—the cessation of broadcasting and the consequent fees; the standard of salaries established in symphony concerts in America. There has been no decline in the usual subscriptions to the Guarantee Fund. As in recent years, conductor and orchestra give the largest possible number of concerts at the highest prices within reason to audiences that fill every seat. Consequently the new charges constrain the Trustees to ask additional and more widely distributed pledges. Once the situation is understood, there is no reason to doubt that they will be forthcoming.

None the less those who dislike Mr. Koussevitzky and his methods, the new standards of programs and performance that he has enjoined upon the concerts, bestir themselves to discourage subscriptions. They have reached that pitch of impotence and unreason that they would put financial compulsion upon the Trustees to bend them to their will. They actually believe that by such methods an elderly minority can reduce the present Boston Symphony Orchestra to the impersonal mediocrity, say, of Mr. Rabaud's year; that it can set back program-making to what it was before Dr. Muck's coming twenty-odd seasons past; that behind the ring fence of its predilections it can isolate the Symphony Concerts from the musical life of the present day. However scrupleless the means, it is hard to conceive a more futile adventure.

For the first time since 1917, the Boston Orchestra stands revitalized and restored —in its old place, under every test, among the orchestras of America and Europe; by much testimony falls nothing short in the range and the balance of its programs; has rewon publics that were forsaking it; above all has drawn the younger generation (upon whom its future depends) not only into Symphony Hall but to alert interest and support. The one and only author of these good deeds—the orchestra assisting, the Trustees supporting—is Serge Koussevitzky. As conductors go in these sparse-furnished days, in him are the present and the future of the orchestra inextricably bound up. The applause of Monday and Saturday evenings, of Tuesday and Friday afternoons is witness to this present and pledge for this future. Even the oldest cannot fetch back, by fair means or worse, a vanished symphonic day.

Mr. Koussevitzky does well when for the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, in repetition last evening, he reduces the orchestra to chamber dimensions. The piece was written as salon-music for a princely house in the eighteenth century. Shift it to public performance in the twentieth, and the smallest orchestra that will carry it to every corner of the hall, may suffice. Ears less tolerant of formal and repeated patterns are now listening to Bach's Allegros. They must move brightly, quickly, sinuously; every measure of the feathering, echoing flutes run clear; every melodious phrase of the solo-violin go full-rounded. Too many instruments clog the pattern-spinning, blur the transparent texture.

Stiffen, thicken these Allegros and they soon weary the modern listener. Make them swift, supple and limpid as Mr. Koussevitzky and his little orchestra did, and the play of figure and arabesque, the bite of accents, the interweavings, the contrasts, the sudden evenings of the voices will hold fast the listener. Far behind him the conductor put the mechanized, pedantic Bach. He was equally mindful of the slow movement between. Here went no Bach of exaltation or any sort of inspiration; instead a courtly composer minded to charm Monseigneur and the company by his graces. The violin sings; the flutes answer it; the other strings set in a resilient underbody. Or the little orchestra takes up the course, the flutes a-top and feathering. In those days there was also an elegant Bach; here he is writing—fortunate two hundred years after in Mr. Burgin and Mr. Laurent to play him.

Liszt's Concerto in A major sounded like a resurrection, but by no means from the dead. Nowadays the pianists hark back to the flowing ancients like Mozart or Bach; are symphonic with Beethoven (of "The Emperor") with Brahms, with Rakhmaninov; or else displayful with Chaikovsky or even Saint-Saëns. They forget these two romantic rhapsodies of Liszt or mistakenly believe them numb with the changing years. Far from it. Liszt rhapsodizes over his musical material. Ever and anon, the wailing chromatic motiv of the beginning returns to haunt all else. It lays hold upon Liszt's imagination, and soon enough upon his audience. Transform it as he may we cannot choose but hear. Another motiv and he is building up a climax pridefully. A third and his hand lightens. It is as though one impulse came treading on another's heel.

Likewise with the piano. Through two-thirds of the Concerto Liszt keeps it in place—means to the desired ends. Then it also masters him. Through all the finale he treats it like a firework or rather a reservoir of fireworks. The notes fall in showers or in sheets. They run along the surface; they leap into the air. They spin about; they cascade; they coalesce at last into a fiery pool of climax. Rhapsody with motivs, rhapsody with the instrument; out of both, and the pianist, a whole Concerto. Mme. Mérö, undiminished in either technique or temperament, Hungarian kindling Hungarian with a mutual flame, took Liszt at his word, played him with an unflagging bravura; flung out whole sections as so much improvisation, florid or tense; swept through the finale dazzling but not hardening. Mr. Koussevitzky set the orchestra no less in the vein. Join the three together and Liszt's "old" Concerto misses nothing of romantic rhapsody or pianistic rhetoric. Who cared whether there was anything inside? The surface was quite enough.

Even with the subtractions of time—and "Zarathustra" is in its thirty-third year—there are glories enough abiding in Strauss's tone-poem. Range up and down the composers of his day, and ours, and who but him could stretch and fill so vast a canvas? Or who set to the task with such ardor; hold himself at such ecstasy; lapsing only rarely, thinning only a little, pressing onward to the end? There is the title, the parenthesis—"Freely after Nietzsche"; the sub-titles in the score; the glosses of the learned "programists," conning the Nietzschian page. Yet who in these days thinks often of Zarathustra and his creator? Rather, Strauss pervades the scene, unrolling in tones his panorama of the life, the aspirations, the fate of man.

The beginning is nothing less than an act of titanic creation — the darksome reverberating pedal-point, the awakening drum-roll, the out-thrusting trumpets, the thunderous climax. The world stirs to life; into it descends man seeking his destiny. There follow the chorale of the shadowed believers. Strauss relaxing less the ardor than the invention: "Of The Great Longing" and "Of Joys and Passions"—Strauss in full tide of songful ecstasy; the "Grave Song" turning these yearnings into pity, not mockery — Strauss rising and holding to a piercing beauty; the derisive fugue "Of Science"—again Strauss tumultuous and magnificent; the upleaping of "The Convalescent"—in measures mounting from suspense to suspense; the pulsant generation of "The Dance Song"—Strauss superbly elate; the decline, blot of blots upon the whole, into the waltz-haunted measures; again the upward flood toward the climax of the ideal, bursting and breaking upon the strokes of the midnight-bell; the descent into the questioning, the doubting, the fading of the end.

To recite the course of "Zarathustra" in such pale summary is to be left breathless with the sensation of far-sweeping ecstasy halting for breath, forthwith upspringing into power. Agree to the obvious failures like the transition from the sublime introduction into the body of the tone-poem, or the second half of "The Dance Song." Note every incidental shortcoming or mischoice along the way. They are not few after thirty years. Yet in all the music of our time is there aught comparable in sustained heights, plumbed depths, in exaltation and in splendor?

From the outset Mr. Koussevitzky found the only voice in which "Zarathustra" can be truly proclaimed—the voice that begins in ardor and ascends ecstasy. Before him sat an orchestra that could conquer every exaction of the notes, then stand ready for every eloquence. The conductor rolled back the night, commanded the sun; did what he might to hide the bare transition into the world. "The Great Longing," "The Joys and Passions" flamed with intrepid intensity. Into sound Mr. Koussevitzky veritably translated Strauss's creative fires. Against them he laid the cool beauty of "The Grave Song," which is memory. The Fugue thrust and leered. The advance to the Dance Song thrilled with suspense the Song itself, so long as Strauss would let it, beat high with elation. The climax of the ideal was a frenetic flood of sound; but too lightly the midnight bell clove through it. The end pierced with the pathos of the insoluble riddle, which is destiny. Into the air the music vanished rather than thinned. It has been easy to say that "Don Quixote" was the Straussian tone-poem in which Mr. Koussevitzky would most excel. And [illegible] for the present it is "Zarathustra."

H. T. P.

88

Herald Boston

29

FEB 9 MU

AY, FEBRUARY 9, 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon comprised Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart's Piano Concerto, A major (K. 488), and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

For the Brandenburg Concerto, Mr. [illegible] lessened the number of strings, nor was the full body of strings employed in Mozart's Concerto. Not that orchestras were necessarily small in Vienna when Mozart was living. At a concert where he played a concerto the orchestra numbered 180, but it is not probable that all the members of the society took part. Concerts, however, were given at Vienna in the latter part of the 18th century by orchestras ranging from 200 to 400 in number.

When pianists today go to Mozart for a concerto they usually choose the one in D minor. The one in A major chosen by Mr. Orloff—there is an earlier one in the same key—is so beautiful, in its lively movements as in the pathetic Andante conspicuous for tenderness and pleasing melancholy, it is surprising that it has been ignored; but Mozart's music is not for every pianist however famous he may be. It is more difficult by its apparent simplicity than many concertos of the thunder-and-guns-and-all-that character. One may be brilliant with Liszt and Tchaikovsky, solemnly "intellectual" with Brahms, or play Beethoven in what is described as "the true Beethovian spirit," whatever that may mean, yet come to grief when Mozart is in question.

Fortunately for the audience yesterday there was Mr. Koussevitsky, an ideal interpreter of Mozart; an orchestra that Mozart would have applauded; a pianist who would have met Mozarts demand that his music should "sound; should flow like oil in certain passages. Mr. Orloff played most musically, not merely with the pedantic, cool intelligence that often passes for a musical interpretation. Expression of intense emotion, passion was not considered artistic in the Vienna of Mozart's time, nor was it in the music. Grace, tenderness, a melancholy subdued as in a reverie, serenity even in melancholy—these were expected in an andante. And so Mr. Orloff, who had shown in his recital two season ago that he could dazzle by his brilliance and sound the note of deep emotion, played this concerto as one believes Mozart would have liked it.

Mr. Koussevitzy is as artistic in his treatment of Bach as in his reading of Mozart. The concerto, it is needless to say when there is mention of Mr. Burgin, the violinist, Messrs. Laurent and Bladet, the flutists, and the admirable members of the string section, was delightfully performed. It is to be wished that Bach had cut the opening allegro shorter; the good man's musical talk in this movement is chatter before he is through with what he has to say. As the movement is signed with the name of Bach, those who almost swoon with admiration whenever his name is mentioned—there is much "bunk" in circles of music "appreciators"—accept him in bulk, and would say, "Oh that it would never end!" and would sigh soulfully in their rapt enjoyment.

Whatever one may think of Strauss's "Zarathustra," whether it is to be classed among his greatest works; whether it contains much that is sonorous but is really labored and unimpressive; whether the attempt to translate passages of Nietzsche concerning individualism and the deification of life into tones was imprudent, if not foolish, one must admit that there are great moments in this tone-poem. "Stupendous" is not too big a word for the introduction; there is beauty in the "Grave Song," Homeric gaiety in the "Tanzlied"; mystery in the ending, nor to appreciate this ending is it necessary to think of the "Ideal" swaying aloft or the "World Riddle" growling below. One does well to hear this tone-poem without thought of Nietzsche.

Nor is "marvellous" too big a word for Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation;

SYMPHONY IN STRAUSS' TONE-POEM

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Played Again

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The first performance here under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction of Strauss' Nietzschean tone-poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra," was the outstanding feature of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Before this heaven-storming music came two pieces of slenderer sonorities; the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; and an A major Piano Concerto of Mozart, with Nicolai Orloff as the soloist.

AFTER LAPSE OF YEARS

Once upon a time "Zarathustra" was common experience at the Symphony concerts. In the programme book yesterday was a record of performances in 1909, 1910, 1911, 1915 and 1916. Then came the suppression of all things German, not until 1922 was "Zarathustra" again heard in Symphony Hall, to be neglected thereafter until the concert of yesterday. Now and again this absence of an accustomed music makes it more than ever welcome on its return. But sometimes such rehearing after a lapse of years brings both a clarification and a disillusionment.

Yesterday, for case in point, "Zarathustra" seemed to be not of the greater Strauss, even granting that no other composer, living or dead, could have made it as it is. From the very nature of the impossible task which Strauss sought to accomplish, the translation into music of separated passages from Nietzsche's philosophical work, Strauss could not gain in this tone-poem the organic unity that is displayed in its fellows.

Not His Greatest Invention

And save for the stark C-G-C of the Zarathustra motif, the themes are not among Strauss' most salient and characteristic inventions. The Hinterwelten melody, perhaps appropriately enough, is but a glorified hymn-tune; the fugue subject is mere contrivance; the dance theme, a Viennese waltz, and the melody in thirds which recurs at the end, mere Teutonic sentimentality, while only the theme of the section "Of Joys and Passions" has the truly Straussian sweep and fervor.

But, to give the composer his due, yesterday's performance, although in many respects a brilliant one, did not at every turn do fullest justice to the music. The climax in the opening portrayal of the sunrise came a measure or two too soon, and one of the most impressive effects in all symphonic music missed fire. There is more in the music "Of Joys and Passions" than was disclosed yesterday, and even in its apotheosis, which should be the waltzing of the stars in their courses, the dance kept always one foot on terra firma.

Certain to Improve

If precedent is any criterion, however, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have together become more practiced in it, they will do better by "Zarathustra."

For the 18th century pieces Mr. Koussevitzky wisely used yesterday a much reduced string band. The performance of Bach's Concerto, not the most interesting of the six, was warmly received, and the soloists, Mr. Burgin, Mr. Laurent and Mr. Bladet, were called upon to bow. The Concerto of Mozart, notable chiefly for its poetic Andante, was played by Mr. Orloff with exceeding neatness and taste. He, too, was applauded and heartily, according to his just deserts.

nor for the orchestral performance. No greater performance by an orchestra has been heard in Symphony hall since it was dedicated; it would be hard to name one that was so great.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra at the concerts next week will be assisted by the Cecilia Society trained by Malcolm Lang, its conductor. Franck, Psalm 150 for chorus, orchestra and organ. Roussel, "Evocations," the third one with chorus. Schelling, "Morocco," (conducted by the composer). Borodin, Polovtsian dances with chorus, from "Prince Igor."

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky, whose interest in choral music has often been manifested, has secured the aid of the Cecilia Society for this week's Symphony concerts in the regular series. The chorus will be heard in Franck's 150th Psalm, the familiar dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," and one of a set of three "Evocations," an early work of the Parisian composer, Roussel, one of the elder generation of living French musicians. "La Ville Rose," from this set of pieces, was played here under Mr Monteux. The other numbers are new to Boston. Mr Schelling, one of the most eminent of American composers, will conduct his new tone-poem, "Morocco."

There is to be a soloist at the fourth Monday Symphony concert tomorrow, Yolanda Mero, the Hungarian pianist, remembered from several previous appearances in Boston as a notable technician gifted with a temperament.

CONCERTS IN FEB 9 SYMPHONY CONCERTS

By MOSES SMITH

There is a possibility of too much of a good thing, as Aristotle, a talented Greek philosopher, remarked more than twenty centuries ago. The immediate reference is to the current pair of Boston Symphony concerts, the first of which the writer attended yesterday.

After almost a fortnight of constant attendance at the Opera House the most ardent music-lover has become temporarily sated with a musical diet. Musical indigestion begins to set in. Melodies of Verdi mingle confusedly with Wagnerian motives, and one finds it difficult to distinguish between the Debussy of "Pelleas" and the "Carmen" of Bizet.

We offer this apology in lieu of writing an adequate review of the Symphony concert. So far as our insensitive ears could determine, the performance was of a more or less routine character, despite the presence of a solo [illegible] ng piece was Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto—not one of the master's greatest works. Richard Burgin, solo violinist, and two solo-flutes, played by Messrs. Laurent and Bladet, combined with Mr. Koussevitzky and the reduced string orchestra in a competent performance.

Nikolai Orloff, Russian pianist, was the soloist in Mozart's A major piano concerto. The pianist had moments of charm as well as brilliance in his playing. At all times he kept the solo part subservient to the ensemble. One bad passage in the third movement marred an otherwise clean and musical rendition. The orchestral support under Mr. Koussevitzky was highly sympathetic. Mr. Orloff was recalled several times by the applause of the audience.

The last number was in the nature of a "revival" — Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra." For the first time in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky conducted this musical elaboration on a philosophic poem. The piece was brilliantly played, in our opinion, with poetic insight keenly evidenced in many pages. But the whole was episodic rather than unified—a patchwork of beautiful pieces, not a single great pattern.

An Orchestra in Need

The Symphony Concerts Face a Largely Increased Deficit Only Partially Guaranteed

THE Symphony Orchestra is in need of money—of money to meet operating expenses. In a quiet fashion, more impressive than the usual shriek and jabber of "publicity," the Trustees make known as much in the program-book for the concerts of last week. The deficit for the musical year, 1927-28, ending last July, was $87,000. The deficit for the present musical year, 1928-29, will exceed it by more than fifty per cent—say $47,000. It was necessary to raise salaries by $15,000. Otherwise there has been no material increase in outlay. The treasury, however, is the poorer by $32,000—the fee paid for the broadcasting, now discontinued, of the Symphony Concerts and of occasional Pop Concerts. Consequently, instead of the comfortable and familiar deficit of $87,000, a new and uncomfortable net loss of $134,000 faces the Trustees; while as yet the subscriptions to the annual Guarantee Fund are less than $75,000. With reason they continue:

> The Trustees are aware that this is a large sum to seek from the public. It is nevertheless the fact that in other cities the annual deficits of the orchestras are considerably larger than in Boston. It is also a fact that our orchestra now occupies a foremost place among the artistic and broadly educational organizations of its kind. As an institution it touches both the pride and the keen personal interest of a large element in the community. The Trustees are therefore confident that its support will be continued, even at the increased cost which the changing times have demanded.
>
> In the first year after the passing of the support of the orchestra by a single generous citizen to its maintenance by the public, the subscribers to the deficit numbered but 127. In ten years this number has risen to 397. The Trustees believe that it is still capable of large extension. They would greatly appreciate a continuance of the help they have received, with such increase in the scale of it as individual impulse may prompt. They would welcome most of all an appreciable increase in the number of individual subscribers, of whom they believe that many share their faith in the orchestra and their desire to hold it in its present place in the artistic life of America.

The Audience, The Conductor, And a Concert

TRANS — FEB 12

Signs of the Times No Less Than a Program from Bach to Strauss

FOR the rare visitor to the supplementary concerts of the Symphony Orchestra it was pleasure to hear the applause that on Monday evening welcomed Mr. Koussevitzky to his place. It was long, honest, hearty. It came from an audience representative of the intelligent, substantial middle class in the musically inclined community. On Saturday evenings, a sophisticated company lends the conductor ear. On Tuesday afternoons a youthful public from schools and colleges, a suburban public from the remoter environs, sits before him. On Friday afternoons mixed motives assemble a mixed audience. On these Monday evenings, above any other occasion, he comes in contact with average listeners. (The adjective is written with no disparagement.) Not only did they salute him warmly. At every possible opportunity they renewed their plaudits. At the end of Bach's Concerto it must have the little orchestra standing with the conductor in the center of the crescent. At the end of "Zarathustra," it lingered to do as much for Mr. Koussevitzky and his full forces. When Mme Mérö had played through Liszt's Concerto, it must have back the conductor as well as the pianist. Beyond peradventure these Monday audiences hold Mr. Koussevitzky in warm regard and with him the orchestra he has re-created in his own image. At the back of their heads at least is the notion that he has restored it to high place in the American and the European world.

At the moment it is worth while to dwell upon these casual, familiar circumstances. The Trustees of the orchestra, as two pages in the program-book indicated, face a larger deficit in operating expenses than they have encountered in recent years. It arises from conditions largely beyond their control—the cessation of broadcasting and the consequent fees; the standard of salaries established in Symphony concerts in America. There has been no decline in the usual subscriptions to the Guarantee Fund. As in recent years, conductor and orchestra give the largest possible number of concerts at the highest prices within reason to audiences that fill every seat. Consequently the new charges constrain the Trustees to ask additional and more widely distributed pledges. Once the situation is understood, there is no reason to doubt that they will be forthcoming.

None the less those who dislike Mr. Koussevitzky and his methods, the new standards of programs and performance that he has enjoined upon the concerts, bestir themselves to discourage subscriptions. They have reached that pitch of impotence and unreason that they would put financial compulsion upon the Trustees to bend them to their will. They actually believe that by such methods an elderly minority can reduce the present Boston Symphony Orchestra to the impersonal mediocrity, say, of Mr. Rabaud's year; that it can set back program-making to what it was before Dr. Muck's coming twenty-odd seasons past; that behind the ring fence of its predilections it can isolate the Symphony Concerts from the musical life of the present day. However scrupleless the means, it is hard to conceive a more futile adventure.

For the first time since 1917, the Boston Orchestra stands revitalized and restored—in its old place, under every test, among the orchestras of America and Europe; by much testimony falls nothing short in the range and the balance of its programs; has rewon publics that were forsaking it; above all has drawn the younger generation (upon whom its future depends) not only into Symphony Hall but to alert interest and support. The one and only author of these good deeds—the orchestra assisting, the Trustees supporting—is Serge Koussevitzky. As conductors go in these sparse-furnished days, in him are the present and the future of the orchestra inextricably bound up. The applause of Monday and Saturday evenings, of Tuesday and Friday afternoons is witness to this present and pledge for this future. Even the oldest cannot fetch back, by fair means or worse, a vanished symphonic day.

Mr. Koussevitzky does well when for the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, in repetition last evening, he reduces the orchestra to chamber dimensions. The piece was written as salon-music for a princely house in the eighteenth century. Shift it to public performance in the twentieth, and the smallest orchestra that will carry it to every corner of the hall, may suffice. Ears less tolerant of formal and repeated patterns are now listening to Bach's Allegros. They must move brightly, quickly, sinuously; every measure of the feathering, echoing flutes run clear; every melodious phrase of the solo-violin go full-rounded. Too many instruments clog the pattern-spinning, blur the transparent texture.

Stiffen, thicken these Allegros and they soon weary the modern listener. Make them swift, supple and limpid as Mr. Koussevitzky and his little orchestra did, and the play of figure and arabesque, the bite of accents, the interweavings, the contrasts, the sudden evenings of the voices will hold fast the listener. Far behind him the conductor put the mechanized, pedantic Bach. He was equally mindful of the slow movement between. Here went no Bach of exaltation or any sort of inspiration; instead a courtly composer minded to charm Monseigneur and the company by his graces. The violin sings; the flutes answer it; the other strings set in a resilient underbody. Or the little orchestra takes up the course, the flutes a-top and feathering. In those days there was also an elegant Bach; here he is writing—fortunate two hundred years after in Mr. Burgin and Mr. Laurent to play him.

Liszt's Concerto in A major sounded like a resurrection, but by no means from the dead. Nowadays the pianists hark back to the flowing ancients like Mozart or Bach; are symphonic with Beethoven (of "The Emperor") with Brahms, with Rakhmaninov; or else displayful with Chaikovsky or even Saint-Saëns. They forget these two romantic rhapsodies of Liszt or mistakenly believe them numb with the changing years. Far from it. Liszt rhapsodizes over his musical material. Ever and anon, the wailing chromatic motiv of the beginning returns to haunt all else. It lays hold upon Liszt's imagination, and soon enough upon his audience. Transform it as he may we cannot choose but hear. Another motiv and he is building up a climax pridefully. A third and his hand lightens. It is as though one impulse came treading on another's heel.

Likewise with the piano. Through two-thirds of the Concerto Liszt keeps it in place—means to the desired ends. Then it also masters him. Through all the finale he treats it like a firework or rather a reservoir of fireworks. The notes fall in showers or in sheets. They run along the surface; they leap into the air. They spin about; they cascade; they coalesce at last into a fiery pool of climax. Rhapsody with motivs, rhapsody with the instrument; out of both, and the pianist, a whole Concerto. Mme. Mérö, undiminished in either technique or temperament, Hungarian kindling Hungarian with a mutual flame, took Liszt at his word, played him with an unflagging bravura; flung out whole sections as so much improvisation, florid or tense; swept through the finale dazzling but not hardening. Mr. Koussevitzky set the orchestra no less in the vein. Join the three together and Liszt's "old" Concerto misses nothing of romantic rhapsody or pianistic rhetoric. Who cared whether there was anything inside? The surface was quite enough.

Even with the subtractions of time and "Zarathustra" is in its thirty-third year—there are glories enough abiding Strauss's tone-poem. Range up and down the composers of his day, and one and who but him could stretch and fill vast a canvas? Or who set to the task with such ardor; hold himself at such ecstasy; lapsing only rarely, thinning only a little, pressing onward to the end. There is the title, the parenthesis "Freely after Nietzsche"; the subtitles in the score; the glosses of the [illegible] "programists," conning the Nietzsche page. Yet who in these days thinks of Zarathustra and his creator? Richard Strauss pervades the scene, unrolling in tones his panorama of the life, the aspirations, the fate of man.

The beginning is nothing less than an act of titanic creation — the darkness reverberating pedal-point, the awesome drum-roll, the out-thrusting trumpets, the thunderous climax. The world stirs to life; into it descends man seeking his destiny. There follow the [illegible] ale of the shadowed believers. Never relaxing less the ardor than the invention: "Of The Great Longing" and "Of Joys and Passions"—Strauss in full tide of songful ecstasy; the "Grave Song" turning these yearnings into piety, not mockery — Strauss rising and [illegible] to a piercing beauty; the derisive "Of Science"—again Strauss the [illegible] ous and magnificent: the upleading "The Convalescent"—in measures [illegible] ing from suspense to suspense; the sant generation of "The Dance Song." Strauss superbly elate; the descent of blots upon the whole, into the [illegible] haunted measures; again the [illegible] flood toward the climax of [illegible] bursting and breaking upon the [illegible] of the midnight-bell; the [illegible] he questioning, the doubting, the [illegible] of the end.

To recite the course of "Zarathustra" in such pale summary is to [illegible] breathless with the sensation of [illegible] sweeping ecstasy halting [illegible] forthwith upspringing into power; to the obvious failures like the [illegible] from the sublime introduction [illegible] body of the tone-poem, or the [illegible] of "The Dance Song." Note every [illegible] dental shortcoming or mischoice [illegible] the way. They are not few after [illegible] years. Yet in all the music of [illegible] is there aught comparable in [illegible] heights, plumbed depths, in [illegible] and in splendor?

From the outset Mr. Koussevitzky found the only voice in which "Zarathustra" can be truly proclaimed—the voice that begins in ardor and ascends to ecstasy. Before him sat [illegible] chestra that could conquer every [illegible] tion of the notes, then stand ready for every eloquence. The [illegible] rolled back the night, commanded the sun; did what he might to hide [illegible] transition into the world. "The Great Longing," "The Joys and Passions" flamed with intrepid intensity. Into sound Mr. Koussevitzky veritably translated Strauss's creative fires. Against them he laid the cool beauty of "The Grave Song," which is memory. The Fugue thrust and leered. The advance to the Dance Song thrilled with suspense; the Song itself, so long as Strauss would let it, beat high with elation. The climax of the ideal was a frenetic flood of sound; but too lightly the midnight bell clove through it. The end pierced with the pathos of the insoluble riddle, which is destiny. Into the air the music vanished rather than thinned. It has been easy to say that "Don Quixote" was the Straussian tone-poem in which Mr. Koussevitzky would most excel. And [illegible] for the present it is "Zarathustra."

H. T. P.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Bos. Amer.
FEBRUARY 12, 1929

NOTED PIANIST APPEARS WITH SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

At the fourth Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Yolanda Mero, pianist, was the soloist, a genius that is rapidly disappearing from the regular subscription series, and which appears less often on these supplementary programs.

Mme. Mero chose for her "vehicle" Liszt's A major concerto. The vigor and sonority of the music were not above the ample powers of the pianist. She could lay on her fortissimi as the most virile of male pianists. And the songful sections were produced with proper tonal contrast. The performance, with excellent and spirited accompaniment offered by the orchestra under Koussevitzky, was heartily applauded. Not until soloist and conductor had several times shaken hands in mutual congratulation and the men had stood up to receive tribute did the applause die down.

A nicely balanced rendition of the Bach fourth Brandenburg concerto opened the concert. Since this piece was played on last week's regula programs it requires no comment here. The same thing might be said of the last number, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," in which the mighty Strauss makes music out of Nietzsche. But the revival of this significant tone-poem is of sufficient importance to call for another word.

The orchestral performance was even more remarkable than that of last Friday. This music is extraordinarily difficult to play, but the Boston Symphony handled it with the utmost precision, with such sensitiveness as we had not suspected even this body was capable of. The almost legendary glories of Dr Muck's day needs no longer be recalled; we have them here and now.

As to Koussevitzky's interpretation, I could not see that it left anything to be desired.

TWO CONCERTOS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Feb 12

Yolanda Mero as Soloist

Wins Hearty Applause

Concertos by Bach and Liszt and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" filled the program of the fourth Monday Symphony concert last night. Yolanda Mero, the distinguished Hungarian pianist, richly deserved the hearty applause that followed her playing of Liszt's A major concerto. Richard Burgin, Georges Laurent and G. Bladet of the orchestra were the soloists in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. They, too, won cordial applause.

Mme Mero has the technique for Liszt's showy and brilliant concerto. What is far more important, she understands and believes in the music. Even listeners prone to scoff at Liszt as bombastic and theatrical could not but be impressed with the dramatic effectiveness of this concerto last night. Mme Mero made the rhythms fiery and the melodies tender and brilliant by turns. One particularly admired the way in which she saved the chief theme from banality by shaping its phrases gracefully.

The other numbers were played last week in the regular series, so that extended comment is not now needed. The Strauss tone poem was better played than last Friday, though there were still some rough and jumbled spots. The Monday audience has the advantage of the regular subscribers in hearing pieces that the orchestra has whipped into shape in numerous performances. The Bach last night was played for the 50th time this season at least. It went fluently, too fluently, without sufficient shaping of melody nuances of rhythm.

The next concert in this series will be given March 18. P. R.

FEB 12 1929

[illegible] gladly. His concert is announced for Saturday afternoon, March 9, in Jordan Hall. By no means [illegible] generation [illegible] him.

By agreeing report from New York Koussevitzky, conducting in Honegger's "Rugby," makes it a more graphic and stirring music than did the composer at his recent concerts in Boston. It is also one of the new and interesting pieces of the year from an eminent hand. There seems no good reason why, after a courteous interval, it should not be played [illegible] at Symphony Hall.

FOURTH MONDAY CONCERT

Post

Strauss' "Zarathustra" Outstanding Piece on List

FEB 12

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of last evening, the fourth of the current Monday series, had much in common with the regular subscription concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Both programmes began with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto and ended with Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and in both a Piano Concerto in A major separated Bach and Strauss. On Friday and Saturday the composer was Mozart; the pianist, Mr. Orloff. Last evening the music was Liszt's, its performer Yolanda Mero.

STRAUSS' TONE POEM

Not so well as its companion piece in E flat has Liszt's second concerto for the pianoforte withstood the ravages of time, and Mme. Mero's performance of last evening was not one to make this composition sound better than it is. A certain propulsive energy appropriate in this or the other passage was its distinguishing feature. There was little subtlety, not too much poetry in her playing, and her tone lacked roundness and richness. The audience, however, received Mme. Mero with unwonted enthusiasm, and after she had been recalled many times Mr. Koussevitzky finally returned with her and summoned the orchestra to its feet.

Better than at last Friday afternoon's concert went Strauss' tone-poem of Nietzschean philosophy. The performance was more firmly knit, had greater clarity, came closer in many places to the music's peculiar and characteristic voice, though it is still possible to feel that the essential spirit of the piece as yet measurably escapes Mr. Koussevitzky's and the orchestra's performance. For the quality that, in the absence of a more fitting word, may be called intellectual or philosophical, is substituted a conventional sensuousness in this place, in that an equally conventional theatricality.

Last evening's audience received the tone-poem with the utmost cordiality and, as at the conclusion of the Concerto, Mr. Koussevitzky must needs bid his men rise and share in the applause.

HERALD FEB 12

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Bach—the Brandenburg concerto No. 4, in G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. Liszt—piano concerto in A major. Strauss—"Also Sprach Zarathustra." Could Henschel himself or Arthur Mickisch have devised a program better calculated to please?

There was Bach, no less, to lead, and to lend the dash of classicism almost needful. Also Bach, oddly enough, is just at present the composer above all others to add the note of fashion desirable in any program; he has had long to wait, but at last his day has come. Once the symmetrical measure of his Brandenburg concerto had been duly admired and perhaps forgotten. Liszt with his concerto of a quite different type found no difficulty whatever in rousing folk to enthusiasm with his forthright rhythms, sentimentalities and swelling ardors. The romantic, overbounding Strauss, at the tip of his popular vogue today, encountered less difficulty still in crowning all. This was an evening destined to delight.

If Mr. Koussevitzky showed rare acumen in piecing his program together, real genius he demonstrated throughout its performance. The Bach concerto he guided with a dainty touch that brought the succor of prettiness to musical lengths otherwise plain monotonous.

By laying on and sparing not, either its sonorities or its sentimentalisms, Mr. Koussevitzky set the Liszt concerto to raging and rushing like the Connecticut river at spring flood. In Mme. Yolanda Mero he found a fitting pianist to play "opposite" him and with him. Let him storm as he would with his orchestra, with her piano she held her own. Admittedly indeed Mme. Mero played, with tone ponderous or light as called for, silvery or highly colored, always beautiful, so rhythmically and musically that what she played seemed for the moment well worth playing. Pianist and leader, and orchestra too, were roundly applauded.

His highest feat Mr. Koussevitzky achieved with the Strauss poem. A "poem" they call it, so let us not question the worth of its poetical quality. Its rhetoric, at all events, its masterly management of color and mass and of accent, nobody can deny. Making the most, and something more, of every master-stroke, of every detail that makes for effect, Mr. Koussevitzky made an effect indeed. He did more: He made that music sound as though he believed in the worth of every note of it. More no man alive can accomplish, not Richard Strauss himself. R. R. G.

Symphony Concerts With Added Chorus

Roussel in The Far East, Schelling in Morocco, Also As Guest

TRANS FEB 14 29

TIME was when a single novelty in two or three concerts of the Symphony Orchestra was matter for comment in Boston. Now it is a poor week that does not bring more than one new piece. For the current concerts Mr. Koussevitzky offers two such, Mr. Ernest Schelling's symphonic poem, "Morocco," and M. Albert Roussel's triptych, "Evocations." One musingly wonders whether this is part of a new kind of "unified" program. For both pieces owe their origin to travel, both are on subjects which would lead one to expect a rather exotic music. In 1926 Mr. Schelling travelled through Morocco and parts of the great African deserts and came back with materials and ideas for a new work; in the winter of 1909-10 M. Roussel, on voyage as a French naval officer of the Styx, cruised to India and Cochin China, came back with the score of "Evocations," of which the trip had been the inspiration. The young naval officer's work was published in 1911, was given a first performance by the Societe Nationale de Musique on May 18, 1912, under Rhene-Baton. Mr. Schelling's latest score first came to performance under his own baton in New York with the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society on Dec. 12, 1927. He will also conduct it on Friday and Saturday in Boston.

The composer calls "Morocco" a symphonic poem in four connected movements. From native tunes of the Berbers (the oldest of the various races inhabiting Morocco), from Chleuh music of the great Atlas range which stretches from the Mediterranean to the Pacific, and even more from impressions gained from this Moroccan music, Mr. Schelling weaves his tone poem, while sights and incidents of the trip gave him his poetic or pictorial background. Wayward women have attracted—more properly one should say inspired—more than one composer. The Ouled Naïls of Taza (already painted in the tone language as the result of a similar trip by Gustav Holst) give Mr. Schelling subject matter for his first impression. For Mr. Gilman, editor of the program books of the Philharmonic in New York, Mr. Schelling wrote:

> At night, after a "fantasia" in the afternoon, everybody repairs to the Ouled-Naïls quarter, where these women dance. We saw them dance in what looked like the dried bed of a river, or "arroya," surrounded with high walls and lighted at each end by brush fires, from which the flames shot high into the air when replenished. The Ouled Naïls dance in the middle of this square, surrounded by hundreds of shrouded, turbaned figures, and with others looking down upon them from the high walls, their fierce faces intent and always unsmiling.
>
> Whenever the flames shot very high into the air, or a hero of the afternoon appeared in his regimentals, or the dancing reached a point of perfection, the women would give their strange, unforgettable yew-yew-yew cry, which sweeps down the assembly like a mist of sound. It is evidently their idea of applause, or an expression of true emotion.

Summoning a new mood for a second impression, Mr. Schelling turns to the music of their main instrument, the Raita, a sort of oboe, but > more like a primitive musette of uncertain pitch. With this they play a sort of endless solo, at times very beautiful and pathetic, and again at times strangely naif to our ears. Then there was the Chleuh lullaby with quite European harmonies.

Having completed his opening movement and his slow movement, Mr. Schelling turns to still another sort of impression.

> The Berber bard of story-teller, outside the walls of Fez [the capital of Morocco] at sunset, where the Berbers gather to listen to stories of the past grandeur of the Sultans of Morocco. He chants his story impressively on one tone, punctuated by a ritornello of percussion and wood-winds. Then there was the picturesque fire-eater—a Berber religious fanatic—who took up the story-teller's incantation and worked himself up into a frenzy of exaltation which enabled him to put a lighted torch into his mouth and to achieve other of the amazing feats that his kind perform.

Presumably this third movement been the "scherzo." In any case, story of the Berbers telling their tory must produce a thrill, for it these Berbers who thrice defeated power of mighty Spain. For a fo impression, a finale, let us say, Mr. Schelling turns to the glories of war:

> Lastly, the Baroud at Telo Kasbah, the mountain stronghold El Hadji Tschami El Glaoui, t great feudal lord of the Atlas. Baroud is a preparation for w The working up of the war spi among the tribes by insistent, i placable rhythm.

Mr. Schelling uses the large orche of the present day, augmented some

Continued on Following Page

Symphony Concerts With Added Chorus

TRANS FEB 14 '29

Continued from Preceding Page

in the percussion section, which includes a bendir or small Moroccan metal tambourine.

Roussel in India

For a description of Roussel's "Evocations" we turn to a most excellent review by his brother composer, Florent Schmitt, on the occasion of a performance under Chevillard. The following is based on a translation in The Musical Standard.

> The "Evocations" of M. Albert Roussel were composed after his return from a journey in India. The three sections the composer tells us, do not aim at an exact description of definite places nor does the music seek the aid of any exotic scales. They are extremely free, the composer having only attempted to translate into music the feelings or impressions which he experienced, and the form, so far at least as the first and last sections are concerned is only determined by their actual significance—in spite of more or less relationship to formal symphonic outline. No link connects the three movements other than the memory—real or imaginary—of this journey in the East.
>
> In this great triptych the interest continually increases throughout each section, The first, "The Gods in the Depths of the Caves," opens mysteriously, the complicated interweavings of the first and second violins divided in four parts is weirdly awesome—we seem to be feeling our way through the subterranean sanctuaries. Soon a melody, at first indefinite, gradually takes shape, and the eye, accustomed to the darkness, at last perceives in a thousand different forms the terrifying images of the gods carved out of the rock. I have no intention of describing the work—but my most vivid recollection of this movement is that of the moving strains of the muted first violins and violas, indefinably anguished and halting, while the low flute sings a phrase of exquisite melancholy where it seems to me the composer has sought to express the tenderness of love.

Piecing out, one may add that after the section described by M. Schmitt there follows one with sustained brass harmonies above double-basses reiterating an awkward figure of which another writer has said that "the heavy and tortuous grunting of the contrabasses seemed as if some Fafner was on the rampage. . . . The musical accent is imperious, almost tragic." Above these same double-basses more instruments are gradually added—flutes and piccolos with flashing streaks of color, violins with tremolos and rapidly repeated figures. A climax follows to be succeeded by a highly animated music in which all instruments and all choirs take part. This grows to a tremendous climax, relaxes to an orchestration of not much more than chamber proportions, comes to another swift climax, again relaxes and ends quietly. For the second and third Evocations we turn again to M. Schmitt:

> "The Rosy City" is a sort of scherzo . . . of which the slow section in the middle is . . . the trio. The light and sprightly sounds of the woodwinds, the harps in harmonics, sprinkled with the aerial tones of the violins announce a distant procession which gradually draws near. The force of the evocation here is astounding. Transported far beyond Europe we actually seem to see the defile of the horsemen and elephants. The rajah appears, saluted by the horns, trumpets and trombones in a superb hymn. A calm episode of exquisite tenderness follows, where the flute and cor anglais sing in unison over the swaying rhythm of the violins in the upper register. Soon the music gradually quickens and we hear again most of the preceding themes wonderfully interwoven. The sounds of the city "en fête" grow more distant and die away in the night, and this second section ends as do the first and the third—on a sustained pianissimo.
>
> In the third section, "On the Banks of the Sacred River," the most important of the work, the chorus is used. [The Cecilia Society at these concerts.] It is often treated instrumentally without words as a fresh timbre of the orchestra—richer and more flexible than any other, and it is thus I think that it is used most happily. At other times it sings to the words of M. Calvocoressi—a rhythmic prose of a beautiful lyricism, celebrating "the night whose perfumes invite to love." A baritone exalts the virtues of the Ganges, "sacred river wherein is reflected the luminous sky."

The moods of this movement follow closely M. Calvocoressi's text. The opening measures prepare for the opening chorus:

The sun has gone down into the sea
And the cool trees call the birds to their nests.
The sun has gone down into the sea
The fields of lotus close their flowery eyes
And darkness covers the earth
Like a black herd of elephants.

There is an interlude in which a graceful flute solo introduces a theme which is much heard throughout the work. As violins take it up the chorus continues:

But already the perfumes of the night awaken hearts to love;
By the light of the clear moon one sees couples, arms and bodies entwined happily strolling under the trembling leaves.

As the orchestra grows more quiet, more "impressionistic," the same theme continues and the first of these last two lines are repeated as a tenor solo. There is a [illegible] interlude that grows to heated passions [illegible] the other line. Then a contralto solo continues:

Sweeter than the perfumes of the night
And more ardent, is my love.

O sombre veils of heaven, why do you rise so soon to the dawn?

These words bring the first portion of this last evocation to an end. A baritone solo follows. It proceeds in recitatif-like manner, with only slight orchestral accompaniment. Occasionally when the emotional content runs high, the orchestra rises with it.

Under skies black, skies rent by blinding lightnings,
Higher than the eye can pierce or the bird fly.
Mounting in majesty even to the palace of the immortals,
Rises the sovereign mountain.
Its vast shadows terrify the hearts of timid humans;
No foot has ever trod the snows of these haughty summits.
None but eagles have heard the winds moaning in its caverns.
It is a God, whose voice comes down to us.
From its flanks spring streams which bring to the plains and to the valleys the water which cleanses from sin, the water which makes fertile and brings nourishment;
And the laughing torrent rushes on toward sun-lit fields
Where rise flourishing cities.
In the thick shadow of forests rise rumors, cries of anguish and of desire, voices of hate and of love.
But under peaceful trees you follow your course, O river in which is reflected the luminous sky.
Happy is he whose eyes break on this river beloved of the gods:
Its waters will carry his ashes to the vast sea.
As the melting snow frees water purified
So the declining body will at last release the soul
To mount to the numberless stars.
The sacred river which has bathed the temples of the holy city,
In the silence of the night passing terraces yet obscure,
Set off with banks of flowers, murmuring words divine,
Descends to you, people immense, suppliant,
People longing soon to see
Reborn the sun of a new day.

Here an active, brilliant music leads to the following enthusiastic chorus:

O sun, eye of the day, with warm light
Thy ruddy glow already bursts forth among the branches of the great wood.
You bring to blossom the flowers whose fragrant pollens the wind carries far and wide.
The harvest of lotus flowers bows before thee, drinking in thy caresses,
Hails thee, who creates the days,
Thee, who each morning spreads over the mountain-tops the sheaf of thy new rays.
Thou scatterest before thee the immense army of the stars
And thy passionate beaty reigns alone on the ocean set aflame from the skies.

After this the orchestra subsides to the final pianissimo.

Monsieur Schmitt, in the review quoted, was not content with the praise which he bestowed in passing. He was enthused. He wished to express his enthusiasm. With fiery pen he did so in two flaming paragraphs. One need not agree with his negative remarks and comparisons. But the positive side of his remarks is good medicine—perhaps especially for a certain brand of Bostonian Philistines:

> For my own part, at the risk of being burned alive in the Place Saint Jacques, I boldly declare before all the gods that I would willingly sacrifice for it—meaning "Evocations"—the Mass in D and the "Beatitudes." For these "Evocations" cause me an emotion truly intense and complete. To the depth of the inspiration, to the magnificence of the ideas, to the intensity of the inner life which pulsates through it, is added a workmanship of an irresistible seduction. The rhythms are original and of infinite variety, the harmony revolutionary yet justified, the orchestration daring, iridescent, warm-colored, sensuous to the point of sadism and of a new and always mobile sonority. The enthusiastic applause with which the work and its interpreters were received deceived us for a moment into thinking that it would be repeated next Sunday. Alas, nothing of the kind—I cannot understand this mania for the past which is going to give us in its stead the frigid "Requiem" of Mozart—and a repetition once more of the Ninth Symphony—without the very praiseworthy alterations of Mahler. Oh! that Ninth Symphony!—In spite even of the vivid interpretation of M. Chevillard, it seemed to me insufferably tedious after the "Evocations"—as tiresome as a Lenten sermon or the [illegible] same. TRANS

[illegible] sent, after [illegible] played

FEB 14 29

Re-enter Bruckner

Having begun with Mahler and "The Song of The Earth," Mr. Koussevitzky goes on, at the Symphony Concerts of next week, to Bruckner and his Eighth Symphony. Since Dr. Muck's day not one of Bruckner's symphonies has been played in Boston; while the only performances hereabouts of The Eighth hark back to the distant time of Mr Fiedler. (Then, by the way, it was repeated "by general request.") It contains Bruckner's most rapt Adagio—and his symphonies live by the slow movements; a vigorous Scherzo—and there are some who set Bruckner's Scherzi next to Beethoven's: a first division freer than usual from structural weaknesses and unfulfilled progress. The presumption that American audiences hear with indifference both Mahler and Bruckner is a shibboleth of reviewing rather than an experienced fact. Here in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony was applauded and re-demanded more than once; the recent performances of "The Song of The Earth" went by no means unrewarded; while over nearly twenty years the memory of the Adagio in Bruckner's Eighth has survived. Like or dislike them, Mahler and Bruckner are still imposing figures in the music of our time. Mr. Koussevitzky does well to restore them to the Symphony Concerts. It is a part of his policy to keep the repertory catholic, plastic and unroutined. Since Bruckner's Symphony fills an hour and more, only Mr. Foote's Suite for String Orchestra will accompany it.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Bos. AMER.
FEBRUARY 12, 1929

NOTED PIANIST APPEARS WITH SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

At the fourth Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Yolanda Mero, pianist, was the soloist, a genius that is rapidly disappearing from the regular subscription series, and which appears less often on these supplementary programs.

Mme. Mero chose for her "vehicle" Liszt's A major concerto. The vigor and sonority of the music were not above the ample powers of the pianist. She could lay on her fortissimi as the most virile of male pianists. And the songful sections were produced with proper tonal contrast. The performance, with excellent and spirited accompaniment offered by the orchestra under Koussevitzky, was heartily applauded. Not until soloist and conductor had several times shaken hands in mutual congratulation and the men had stood up to receive tribute did the applause die down.

A nicely balanced rendition of the Bach fourth Brandenburg concerto opened the concert. Since this piece was played on last week's regula programs it requires no comment here. The same thing might be said of the last number, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," in which the mighty Strauss makes music out of Nietzsche. But the revival of this significant tone-poem is of sufficient importance to call for another word.

The orchestral performance was even more remarkable than that of last Friday. This music is extraordinarily difficult to play, but the Boston Symphony handled it with the utmost precision, with such sensitiveness as we had not suspected even this body was capable of. The almost legendary glories of Dr Muck's day needs no longer be recalled; we have them here and now.

As to Koussevitzky's interpretation, I could not see that it left anything to be desired.

TWO CONCERTOS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Feb 12

Yolanda Mero as Soloist

Wins Hearty Applause

Concertos by Bach and Liszt and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" filled the program of the fourth Monday Symphony concert last night. Yolanda Mero, the distinguished Hungarian pianist, richly deserved the hearty applause that followed her playing of Liszt's A major concerto. Richard Burgin, Georges Laurent and G. Bladet of the orchestra were the soloists in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. They, too, won cordial applause.

Mme Mero has the technique for Liszt's showy and brilliant concerto. What is far more important, she understands and believes in the music. Even listeners prone to scoff at Liszt as bombastic and theatrical could not but be impressed with the dramatic effectiveness of this concerto last night. Mme Mero made the rhythms fiery and the melodies tender and brilliant by turns. One particularly admired the way in which she saved the chief theme from banality by shaping its phrases gracefully.

The other numbers were played last week in the regular series, so that extended comment is not now needed. The Strauss tone poem was better played than last Friday, though there were still some rough and jumbled spots. The Monday audience has the advantage of the regular subscribers in hearing pieces that the orchestra has whipped into shape in numerous performances. The Bach last night was played for the 50th time this season at least. It went fluently, too fluently, without sufficient shaping of melody nuances of rhythm.

The next concert in this series will be given March 18. P. R.

[illegible] them gladly. His concert is announced for Saturday afternoon, March 9, in Jordan Hall. By all means hear the new generation offered him.

FEB 12 1929

By agreeing report from New York Koussevitzky, conducting in Honegger's "Rugby," makes it a more graphic and stirring music than did the composer at his recent concerts in Boston. It is also one of the new and interesting pieces of the year from an eminent hand. There seems no good reason why, after a courteous interval, it should not be played [illegible] at Symphony Hall.

FOURTH MONDAY CONCERT

Post

Strauss' "Zarathustra" Outstanding Piece on List

FEB 13 29

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of last evening, the fourth of the current Monday series, had much in common with the regular subscription concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Both programmes began with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto and ended with Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and in both a Piano Concerto in A major separated Bach and Strauss. On Friday and Saturday the composer was Mozart: the pianist, Mr. Orloff. Last evening the music was Liszt's, its performer Yolanda Mero.

STRAUSS' TONE POEM

Not so well as its companion piece in E flat has Liszt's second concerto for the pianoforte withstood the ravages of time, and Mme. Mero's performance of last evening was not one to make this composition sound better than it is. A certain propulsive energy appropriate in this or the other passage was its distinguishing feature. There was little subtlety, not too much poetry in her playing, and her tone lacked roundness and richness. The audience, however, received Mme. Mero with unwonted enthusiasm, and after she had been recalled many times Mr. Koussevitzky finally returned with her and summoned the orchestra to its feet.

Better than at last Friday afternoon's concert went Strauss' tone-poem of Nietzschean philosophy. The performance was more firmly knit, had greater clarity, came closer in many places to the music's peculiar and characteristic voice, though it is still possible to feel that the essential spirit of the piece as yet measurably escapes Mr. Koussevitzky's and the orchestra's performance. For the quality that, in the absence of a more fitting word, may be called intellectual or philosophical, is substituted a conventional sensuousness in this place, in that an equally conventional theatricality.

Last evening's audience received the tone-poem with the utmost cordiality and, as at the conclusion of the Concerto, Mr. Koussevitzky must needs bid his men rise and share in the applause.

HERALD FEB 12

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Bach—the Brandenburg concerto No. 4, in G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. Liszt—piano concerto in A major. Strauss—"Also Sprach Zarathustra." Could Henschel himself or Arthur Mickisch have devised a program better calculated to please?

There was Bach, no less, to lead, and to lend the dash of classicism almost needful. Also Bach, oddly enough, is just at present the composer above all others to add the note of fashion desirable in any program; he has had long to wait, but at last his day has come. Once the symmetrical measure of his Brandenburg concerto had been duly admired and perhaps forgotten. Liszt with his concerto of a quite different type found no difficulty whatever in rousing folk to enthusiasm with his forthright rhythms, sentimentalities and swelling ardors. The romantic, overbounding Strauss, at the tip of his popular vogue today, encountered less difficulty still in crowning all. This was an evening destined to delight.

If Mr. Koussevitzky showed rare acumen in piecing his program together, real genius he demonstrated throughout its performance. The Bach concerto he guided with a dainty touch that brought the succor of prettiness to musical lengths otherwise plain monotonous.

By laying on and sparing not, either its sonorities or its sentimentalisms, Mr. Koussevitzky set the Liszt concerto to raging and rushing like the Connecticut river at spring flood. In Mme. Yolanda Mero he found a fitting pianist to play "opposite" him and with him. Let him storm as he would with his orchestra, with her piano she held her own. Admittedly indeed Mme. Mero played, with tone ponderous or light as called for, silvery or highly colored, always beautiful, so rhythmically and musically that what she played seemed for the moment well worth playing. Pianist and leader, and orchestra too, were roundly applauded.

His highest feat Mr. Koussevitzky achieved with the Strauss poem. A "poem" they call it, so let us not question the worth of its poetical quality. Its rhetoric, at all events, its masterly management of color and mass and of accent, nobody can deny. Making the most, and something more, of every master-stroke, of every detail that makes for effect, Mr. Koussevitzky made an effect indeed. He did more: He made that music sound as though he believed in the worth of every note of it. More no man alive can accomplish, not Richard Strauss himself. R. R. G.

Symphony Concerts With Added Chorus

Roussel in The Far East, Schelling in Morocco, Also As Guest

TRANS FEB 14 29

TIME was when a single novelty in two or three concerts of the Symphony Orchestra was matter for comment in Boston. Now it is a poor week that does not bring more than one new piece. For the current concerts Mr. Koussevitzky offers two such, Mr. Ernest Schelling's symphonic poem, "Morocco," and M. Albert Roussel's triptych, "Evocations." One musingly wonders whether this is part of a new kind of "unified" program. For both pieces owe their origin to travel, both are on subjects which would lead one to expect a rather exotic music. In 1926 Mr. Schelling travelled through Morocco and parts of the great African deserts and came back with materials and ideas for a new work; in the winter of 1909-10 M. Roussel, on voyage as a French naval officer of the Styx, cruised to India and Cochin China, came back with the score of "Evocations," of which the trip had been the inspiration. The young naval officer's work was published in 1911, was given a first performance by the Societe Nationale de Musique on May 18, 1912, under Rhene-Baton. Mr. Schelling's latest score first came to performance under his own baton in New York with the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society on Dec. 12, 1927. He will also conduct it on Friday and Saturday in Boston.

The composer calls "Morocco" a symphonic poem in four connected movements. From native tunes of the Berbers (the oldest of the various races inhabiting Morocco), from Chleuh music of the great Atlas range which stretches from the Mediterranean to the Pacific, and even more from impressions gained from this Moroccan music, Mr. Schelling weaves his tone poem, while sights and incidents of the trip gave him his poetic or pictorial background. Wayward women have attracted—more properly one should say inspired—more than one composer. The Ouled Naïls of Taza (already painted in the tone language as the result of a similar trip by Gustav Holst) give Mr. Schelling subject matter for his first impression. For Mr. Gilman, editor of the program books of the Philharmonic in New York, Mr. Schelling wrote:

> At night, after a "fantasia" in the afternoon, everybody repairs to the Ouled-Naïls quarter, where these women dance. We saw them dance in what looked like the dried bed of a river, or "arroya," surrounded with high walls and lighted at each end by brush fires, from which the flames shot high into the air when replenished. The Ouled Naïls dance in the middle of this square, surrounded by hundreds of shrouded, turbaned figures, and with others looking down upon them from the high walls, their fierce faces intent and always unsmiling.
>
> Whenever the flames shot very high into the air, or a hero of the afternoon appeared in his regimentals, or the dancing reached a point of perfection, the women would give their strange, unforgettable yew-yew-yew cry, which sweeps down the assembly like a mist of sound. It is evidently their idea of applause, or an expression of true emotion.

Summoning a new mood for a second impression, Mr. Schelling turns to th music of their main instrument, th Raita, a sort of oboe, but > more like a primitive musette of uncertain pitch. With this they play a sort of endless solo, at times very beautiful and pathetic, and again at times strangely naif to our ears. Then there was the Chleuh lullaby with quite European harmonies.

Having completed his opening mov ment and his slow movement, Mr. Sch ling turns to still another sort of impre sion.

> The Berber bard of story-teller, outside the walls of Fez [the capital of Morocco] at sunset, where the Berbers gather to listen to stories of the past grandeur of the Sultans of Morocco. He chants his story impressively on one tone, punctuated by a ritornello of percussion and wood-winds. Then there was the picturesque fire-eater—a Berber religious fanatic—who took up the story-teller's incantation and worked himself up into a frenzy of exaltation which enabled him to put a lighted torch into his mouth and achieve other of the amazing feat that his kind perform.

Presumably this third movement been the "scherzo." In any case, story of the Berbers telling their tory must produce a thrill, for it these Berbers who thrice defeated power of mighty Spain. For a fou impression, a finale, let us say, Mr. Sc ling turns to the glories of war:

> Lastly, the Baroud at Telo Kasbah, the mountain stronghold El Hadji Tschami El Glaoui, t great feudal lord of the Atlas. Baroud is a preparation for w The working up of the war spi among the tribes by insistent, i placable rhythm.

Mr. Schelling uses the large orche of the present day, augmented some

Continued on Following Page

Symphony Concerts With Added Chorus

TRANS FEB 14 '29

Continued from Preceding Page

in the percussion section, which includes a bendir or small Moroccan metal tambourine.

Roussel in India

For a description of Roussel's "Evocations" we turn to a most excellent review by his brother composer, Florent Schmitt, on the occasion of a performance under Chevillard. The following is based on a translation in The Musical Standard.

The "Evocations" of M. Albert Roussel were composed after his return from a journey in India. The three sections the composer tells us, do not aim at an exact description of definite places nor does the music seek the aid of any exotic scales. They are extremely free, the composer having only attempted to translate into music the feelings or impressions which he experienced, and the form, so far at least as the first and last sections are concerned is only determined by their actual significance—in spite of more or less relationship to formal symphonic outline. No link connects the three movements other than the memory—real or imaginary—of this journey in the East.

In this great triptych the interest continually increases throughout each section, The first, "The Gods in the Depths of the Caves," opens mysteriously, the complicated interweavings of the first and second violins divided in four parts is weirdly awesome—we seem to be feeling our way through the subterranean sanctuaries. Soon a melody, at first indefinite, gradually takes shape, and the eye, accustomed to the darkness, at last perceives in a thousand different forms the terrifying images of the gods carved out of the rock. I have no intention of describing the work—but my most vivid recollection of this movement is that of the moving strains of the muted first violins and violas indefinably anguished and halting, while the low flute sings a phrase of exquisite melancholy where it seems to me the composer has sought to express the tenderness of love.

Piecing out, one may add that after the section described by M. Schmitt there follows one with sustained brass harmonies above double-basses reiterating an awkward figure of which another writer has said that "the heavy and tortuous grunting of the contrabasses seemed as if some Fafner was on the rampage. . . . The musical accent is imperious, almost tragic." Above these same double-basses more instruments are gradually added—flutes and piccolos with flashing streaks of color, violins with tremolos and rapidly repeated figures. A climax follows to be succeeded by a highly animated music in which all instruments and all choirs take part. This grows to a tremendous climax, relaxes to an orchestration of not much more than chamber proportions, comes to another swift climax, again relaxes and ends quietly. For the second and third Evocations we turn again to M. Schmitt:

> "The Rosy City" is a sort of scherzo . . . of which the slow section in the middle is . . . the trio. The light and sprightly sounds of the woodwinds, the harps in harmonics, sprinkled with the aerial tones of the violins announce a distant procession which gradually draws near. The force of the evocation here is astounding. Transported far beyond Europe we actually seem to see the defile of the horsemen and elephants. The rajah appears, saluted by the horns, trumpets and trombones in a superb hymn. A calm episode of exquisite tenderness follows, where the flute and cor anglais sing in unison over the swaying rhythm of the violins in the upper register. Soon the music gradually quickens and we hear again most of the preceding themes wonderfully interwoven. The sounds of the city "en fête" grow more distant and die away in the night, and this second section ends as do the first and the third—on a sustained pianissimo.
>
> In the third section, "On the Banks of the Sacred River," the most important of the work, the chorus is used. [The Cecilia Society at these concerts.] It is often treated instrumentally without words as a fresh timbre of the orchestra—richer and more flexible than any other, and it is thus I think that it is used most happily. At other times it sings to the words of M. Calvocoressi—a rhythmic prose of a beautiful lyricism, celebrating "the night whose perfumes invite to love." A baritone exalts the virtues of the Ganges, "sacred river wherein is reflected the luminous sky."

The moods of this movement follow closely M. Calvocoressi's text. The opening measures prepare for the opening chorus:

> The sun has gone down into the sea
> And the cool trees call the birds to their nests.
> The sun has gone down into the sea
> The fields of lotus close their flowery eyes
> And darkness covers the earth
> Like a black herd of elephants.

There is an interlude in which a graceful flute solo introduces a theme which is much heard throughout the work. As violins take it up the chorus continues:

> But already the perfumes of the night awaken hearts to love;
> By the light of the clear moon one sees couples, arms and bodies entwined happily strolling under the trembling leaves.

As the orchestra grows more quiet, more "impressionistic," the same theme continues and the first of these last two lines are repeated as a tenor solo. There is a [illegible] interlude that grows to heated passions [illegible] the other line. Then a contralto solo continues:

> Sweeter than the perfumes of the night
> And more ardent, is my love.

> O sombre veils of heaven, why do you yield so soon to the dawn?

These words bring the first portion of this last evocation to an end. A baritone solo follows. It proceeds in recitatif-like manner, with only slight orchestral accompaniment. Occasionally when the emotional content runs high, the orchestra rises with it.

> Under skies black, skies rent by blinding lightnings,
> Higher than the eye can pierce or the bird fly,
> Mounting in majesty even to the palace of the immortals,
> Rises the sovereign mountain.
> Its vast shadows terrify the hearts of timid humans;
> No foot has ever trod the snows of these haughty summits.
> None but eagles have heard the winds moaning in its caverns.
> It is a God, whose voice comes down to us.
> From its flanks spring streams which bring to the plains and to the valleys the water which cleanses from sin, the water which makes fertile and brings nourishment;
> And the laughing torrent rushes on toward sun-lit fields
> Where rise flourishing cities.
> In the thick shadow of forests rise rumors, cries of anguish and of desire, voices of hate and of love.
> But under peaceful trees you follow your course, O river in which is reflected the luminous sky.
> Happy is he whose eyes break on this river beloved of the gods:
> Its waters will carry his ashes to the vast sea.
> As the melting snow frees water purified
> So the declining body will at last release the soul
> To mount to the numberless stars.
> The sacred river which has bathed the temples of the holy city,
> In the silence of the night passing terraces yet obscure,
> Set off with banks of flowers, murmuring words divine,
> Descends to you, people immense, suppliant,
> People longing soon to see
> Reborn the sun of a new day.

Here an active, brilliant music leads to the following enthusiastic chorus:

> O sun, eye of the day, with warm light
> Thy ruddy glow already bursts forth among the branches of the great wood.
> You bring to blossom the flowers whose fragrant pollens the wind carries far and wide.
> The harvest of lotus flowers bows before thee, drinking in thy caresses,
> Hails thee, who creates the days,
> Thee, who each morning spreads over the mountain-tops the sheaf of thy new rays.
> Thou scatterest before thee the immense army of the stars
> And thy passionate beaty reigns alone on the ocean set aflame from the skies.

After this the orchestra subsides to the final pianissimo.

Monsieur Schmitt, in the review quoted, was not content with the praise which he bestowed in passing. He was enthused. He wished to express his enthusiasm. With fiery pen he did so in two flaming paragraphs. One need not agree with his negative remarks and comparisons. But the positive side of his remarks is good medicine—perhaps especially for a certain brand of Bostonian Philistines:

> For my own part, at the risk of being burned alive in the Place Saint Jacques, I boldly declare before all the gods that I would willingly sacrifice for it—meaning "Evocations"—the Mass in D and the "Beatitudes." For these "Evocations" cause me an emotion truly intense and complete. To the depth of the inspiration, to the magnificence of the ideas, to the intensity of the inner life which pulsates through it, is added a workmanship of an irresistible seduction. The rhythms are original and of infinite variety, the harmony revolutionary yet justified, the orchestration daring, iridescent, warm-colored, sensuous to the point of sadism and of a new and always mobile sonority. The enthusiastic applause with which the work and its interpreters were received deceived us for a moment into thinking that it would be repeated next Sunday. Alas, nothing of the kind—I cannot understand this mania for the past which is going to give us in its stead the frigid "Requiem" of Mozart—and a repetition once more of the Ninth Symphony—without the very praiseworthy alterations of Mahler. Oh! that Ninth Symphony!—In spite even of the vivid interpretation of M. Chevillard, it seemed to me insufferably tedious after the "Evocations"—as tiresome as a Lenten sermon or the [illegible] the same. TRANS [illegible] ent, after [illegible] played FEB 14 '29

Re-enter Bruckner

Having begun with Mahler and "The Song of The Earth," Mr. Koussevitzky goes on, at the Symphony Concerts of next week, to Bruckner and his Eighth Symphony. Since Dr. Muck's day not one of Bruckner's symphonies has been played in Boston; while the only performances hereabouts of The Eighth hark back to the distant time of Mr Fiedler. (Then, by the way, it was repeated "by general request.") It contains Bruckner's most rapt Adagio—and his symphonies live by the slow movements; a vigorous Scherzo—and there are some who set Bruckner's Scherzi next to Beethoven's: a first division freer than usual from structural weaknesses and unfulfilled progress. The presumption that American audiences hear with indifference both Mahler and Bruckner is a shibboleth of reviewing rather than an experienced fact. Here in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony was applauded and re-demanded more than once; the recent performances of "The Song of The Earth" went by no means unrewarded; while over nearly twenty years the memory of the Adagio in Bruckner's Eighth has survived. Like or dislike them, Mahler and Bruckner are still imposing figures in the music of our time. Mr. Koussevitzky does well to restore them to the Symphony Concerts. It is a part of his policy to keep the repertory catholic, plastic and unroutined. Since Bruckner's Symphony fills an hour and more, only Mr. Foote's Suite for String Orchestra will accompany it.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Bos. Amer.
FEBRUARY 12, 1929

NOTED PIANIST APPEARS WITH SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

At the fourth Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Yolanda Mero, pianist, was the soloist, a genius that is rapidly disappearing from the regular subscription series, and which appears less often on these supplementary programs.

Mme. Mero chose for her "vehicle" Liszt's A major concerto. The vigor and sonority of the music were not above the ample powers of the pianist. She could lay on her fortissimi as the most virile of male pianists. And the songful sections were produced with proper tonal contrast. The performance, with excellent and spirited accompaniment offered by the orchestra under Koussevitzky, was heartily applauded. Not until soloist and conductor had several times shaken hands in mutual congratulation and the men had stood up to receive tribute did the applause die down.

A nicely balanced rendition of the Bach fourth Brandenburg concerto opened the concert. Since this piece was played on last week's regula programs it requires no comment here. The same thing might be said of the last number, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," in which the mighty Strauss makes music out of Nietzsche. But the revival of this significant tone-poem is of sufficient importance to call for another word.

The orchestral performance was even more remarkable than that of last Friday. This music is extraordinarily difficult to play, but the Boston Symphony handled it with the utmost precision, with such sensitiveness as we had not suspected even this body was capable of. The almost legendary glories of Dr Muck's day needs no longer be recalled; we have them here and now.

As to Koussevitzky's interpretation, I could not see that it left anything to be desired.

TWO CONCERTOS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Feb 12

Yolanda Mero as Soloist Wins Hearty Applause

Concertos by Bach and Liszt and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" filled the program of the fourth Monday Symphony concert last night. Yolanda Mero, the distinguished Hungarian pianist, richly deserved the hearty applause that followed her playing of Liszt's A major concerto. Richard Burgin, Georges Laurent and G. Bladet of the orchestra were the soloists in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. They, too, won cordial applause.

Mme Mero has the technique for Liszt's showy and brilliant concerto. What is far more important, she understands and believes in the music. Even listeners prone to scoff at Liszt as bombastic and theatrical could not but be impressed with the dramatic effectiveness of this concerto last night. Mme Mero made the rhythms fiery and the melodies tender and brilliant by turns. One particularly admired the way in which she saved the chief theme from banality by shaping its phrases gracefully.

The other numbers were played last week in the regular series, so that extended comment is not now needed. The Strauss tone poem was better played than last Friday, though there were still some rough and jumbled spots. The Monday audience has the advantage of the regular subscribers in hearing pieces that the orchestra has whipped into shape in numerous performances. The Bach last night was played for the 50th time this season at least. It went fluently, too fluently, without sufficient shaping of melody nuances of rhythm.

The next concert in this series will be given March 18. P. R.

[illegible] gladly. His concert is announced for Saturday afternoon, March 9, in Jordan Hall. By no means has the new generation offered him.

FEB 12 1929

By agreeing report from New York [illegible] Koussevitzky, conducting in Honegger's "Rugby," makes it a more graphic and stirring music than did the composer at his recent concerts in Boston. It is also one of the new and interesting pieces of the year from an eminent hand. There seems no good reason why, after a courteous interval, it should not be played [illegible] at Symphony Hall.

FOURTH MONDAY CONCERT

Post

Strauss' "Zarathustra" Outstanding Piece on List

FEB 12

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of last evening, the fourth of the current Monday series, had much in common with the regular subscription concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Both programmes began with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto and ended with Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and in both a Piano Concerto in A major separated Bach and Strauss. On Friday and Saturday the composer was Mozart; the pianist, Mr. Orloff. Last evening the music was Liszt's, its performer Yolanda Mero.

STRAUSS' TONE POEM

Not so well as its companion piece in E flat has Liszt's second concerto for the pianoforte withstood the ravages of time, and Mme. Mero's performance of last evening was not one to make this composition sound better than it is. A certain propulsive energy appropriate in this or the other passage was its distinguishing feature. There was little subtlety, not too much poetry in her playing, and her tone lacked roundness and richness. The audience, however, received Mme. Mero with unwonted enthusiasm, and after she had been recalled many times Mr. Koussevitzky finally returned with her and summoned the orchestra to its feet.

Better than at last Friday afternoon's concert went Strauss' tone-poem of Nietzschean philosophy. The performance was more firmly knit, had greater clarity, came closer in many places to the music's peculiar and characteristic voice, though it is still possible to feel that the essential spirit of the piece as yet measurably escapes Mr. Koussevitzky's and the orchestra's performance. For the quality that, in the absence of a more fitting word, may be called intellectual or philosophical, is substituted a conventional sensuousness in this place, in that an equally conventional theatricality.

Last evening's audience received the tone-poem with the utmost cordiality and, as at the conclusion of the Concerto, Mr. Koussevitzky must needs bid his men rise and share in the applause.

HERALD FEB 12

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Bach—the Brandenburg concerto No. 4, in G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. Liszt—piano concerto in A major. Strauss—"Also Sprach Zarathustra." Could Henschel himself or Arthur Mickisch have devised a program better calculated to please?

There was Bach, no less, to lead, and to lend the dash of classicism almost needful. Also Bach, oddly enough, is just at present the composer above all others to add the note of fashion desirable in any program; he has had long to wait, but at last his day has come. Once the symmetrical measure of his Brandenburg concerto had been duly admired and perhaps forgotten. Liszt with his concerto of a quite different type found no difficulty whatever in rousing folk to enthusiasm with his forthright rhythms, sentimentalities and swelling ardors. The romantic, overbounding Strauss, at the tip of his popular vogue today, encountered less difficulty still in crowning all. This was an evening destined to delight.

If Mr. Koussevitzky showed rare acumen in piecing his program together, real genius he demonstrated throughout its performance. The Bach concerto he guided with a dainty touch that brought the succor of prettiness to musical lengths otherwise plain monotonous.

By laying on and sparing not, either its sonorities or its sentimentalisms, Mr. Koussevitzky set the Liszt concerto to raging and rushing like the Connecticut river at spring flood. In Mme. Yolanda Mero he found a fitting pianist to play "opposite" him and with him. Let him storm as he would with his orchestra, with her piano she held her own. Admittedly indeed Mme. Mero played, with tone ponderous or light as called for, silvery or highly colored, always beautiful, so rhythmically and musically that what she played seemed for the moment well worth playing. Pianist and leader, and orchestra too, were roundly applauded.

His highest feat Mr. Koussevitzky achieved with the Strauss poem. A "poem" they call it, so let us not question the worth of its poetical quality. Its rhetoric, at all events, its masterly management of color and mass and of accent, nobody can deny. Making the most, and something more, of every master-stroke, of every detail that makes for effect, Mr. Koussevitzky made an effect indeed. He did more: He made that music sound as though he believed in the worth of every note of it. More no man alive can accomplish, not Richard Strauss himself. R. R. G.

Symphony Concerts With Added Chorus

Roussel in The Far East, Schelling in Morocco, Also As Guest

TRANS FEB 14 29

TIME was when a single novelty in two or three concerts of the Symphony Orchestra was matter for comment in Boston. Now it is a poor week that does not bring more than one new piece. For the current concerts Mr. Koussevitzky offers two such, Mr. Ernest Schelling's symphonic poem, "Morocco," and M. Albert Roussel's triptych, "Evocations." One musingly wonders whether this is part of a new kind of "unified" program. For both pieces owe their origin to travel, both are on subjects which would lead one to expect a rather exotic music. In 1926 Mr. Schelling travelled through Morocco and parts of the great African deserts and came back with materials and ideas for a new work; in the winter of 1909-10 M. Roussel, on voyage as a French naval officer of the Styx, cruised to India and Cochin China, came back with the score of "Evocations," of which the trip had been the inspiration. The young naval officer's work was published in 1911, was given a first performance by the Societe Nationale de Musique on May 18, 1912, under Rhene-Baton. Mr. Schelling's latest score first came to performance under his own baton in New York with the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society on Dec. 12, 1927. He will also conduct it on Friday and Saturday in Boston.

The composer calls "Morocco" a symphonic poem in four connected movements. From native tunes of the Berbers (the oldest of the various races inhabiting Morocco), from Chleuh music of the great Atlas range which stretches from the Mediterranean to the Pacific, and even more from impressions gained from this Moroccan music, Mr. Schelling weaves his tone poem, while sights and incidents of the trip gave him his poetic or pictorial background. Wayward women have attracted—more properly one should say inspired—more than one composer. The Ouled Naïls of Taza (already painted in the tone language as the result of a similar trip by Gustav Holst) give Mr. Schelling subject matter for his first impression. For Mr. Gilman, editor of the program books of the Philharmonic in New York, Mr. Schelling wrote:

> At night, after a "fantasia" in the afternoon, everybody repairs to the Ouled-Naïls quarter, where these women dance. We saw them dance in what looked like the dried bed of a river, or "arroya," surrounded with high walls and lighted at each end by brush fires, from which the flames shot high into the air when replenished. The Ouled Naïls dance in the middle of this square, surrounded by hundreds of shrouded, turbaned figures, and with others looking down upon them from the high walls, their fierce faces intent and always unsmiling.
>
> Whenever the flames shot very high into the air, or a hero of the afternoon appeared in his regimentals, or the dancing reached a point of perfection, the women would give their strange, unforgettable yew-yew-yew cry, which sweeps down the assembly like a mist of sound. It is evidently their idea of applause, or an expression of true emotion.

Summoning a new mood for a second impression, Mr. Schelling turns to the music of their main instrument, the Raita, a sort of oboe, but > more like a primitive musette of uncertain pitch. With this they play a sort of endless solo, at times very beautiful and pathetic, and again at times strangely naif to our ears. Then there was the Chleuh lullaby with quite European harmonies.

Having completed his opening movement and his slow movement, Mr. Schelling turns to still another sort of impression.

> The Berber bard of story-teller, outside the walls of Fez [the capital of Morocco] at sunset, where the Berbers gather to listen to stories of the past grandeur of the Sultans of Morocco. He chants his story impressively on one tone, punctuated by a ritornello of percussion and wood-winds. Then there was the picturesque fire-eater—a Berber religious fanatic—who took up the story-teller's incantation and worked himself up into a frenzy of exaltation which enabled him to put a lighted torch into his mouth and to achieve other of the amazing feats that his kind perform.

Presumably this third movement has been the "scherzo." In any case, the story of the Berbers telling their story must produce a thrill, for it is these Berbers who thrice defeated the power of mighty Spain. For a fourth impression, a finale, let us say, Mr. Schelling turns to the glories of war:

> Lastly, the Baroud at Telouet, the Kasbah, the mountain stronghold of El Hadji Tschami El Glaoui, the great feudal lord of the Atlas. The Baroud is a preparation for war. The working up of the war spirit among the tribes by insistent, implacable rhythm.

Mr. Schelling uses the large orchestra of the present day, augmented somewhat

Continued on Following Page

Symphony Concerts With Added Chorus

TRANS FEB 14 '29

Continued from Preceding Page

in the percussion section, which includes a bendir or small Moroccan metal tambourine.

Roussel in India

For a description of Roussel's "Evocations" we turn to a most excellent review by his brother composer, Florent Schmitt, on the occasion of a performance under Chevillard. The following is based on a translation in The Musical Standard.

> The "Evocations" of M. Albert Roussel were composed after his return from a journey in India. The three sections the composer tells us, do not aim at an exact description of definite places nor does the music seek the aid of any exotic scales. They are extremely free, the composer having only attempted to translate into music the feelings or impressions which he experienced, and the form, so far at least as the first and last sections are concerned is only determined by their actual significance—in spite of more or less relationship to formal symphonic outline. No link connects the three movements other than the memory—real or imaginary—of this journey in the East.
>
> In this great triptych the interest continually increases throughout each section, The first, "The Gods in the Depths of the Caves," opens mysteriously, the complicated interweavings of the first and second violins divided in four parts is weirdly awesome—we seem to be feeling our way through the subterranean sanctuaries. Soon a melody, at first indefinite, gradually takes shape, and the eye, accustomed to the darkness, at last perceives in a thousand different forms the terrifying images of the gods carved out of the rock. I have no intention of describing the work—but my most vivid recollection of this movement is that of the moving strains of the muted first violins and violas indefinably anguished and halting, while the low flute sings a phrase of exquisite melancholy where it seems to me the composer has sought to express the tenderness of love.

Piecing out, one may add that after the section described by M. Schmitt there follows one with sustained brass harmonies above double-basses reiterating an awkward figure of which another writer has said that "the heavy and tortuous grunting of the contrabasses seemed as if some Fafner was on the rampage. . . . The musical accent is imperious, almost tragic." Above these same double-basses more instruments are gradually added—flutes and piccolos with flashing streaks of color, violins with tremolos and rapidly repeated figures. A climax follows to be succeeded by a highly animated music in which all instruments and all choirs take part. This grows to a tremendous climax, relaxes to an orchestration of not much more than chamber proportions, comes to another swift climax, again relaxes and ends quietly. For the second and third Evocations we turn again to M. Schmitt:

> "The Rosy City" is a sort of scherzo . . . of which the slow section in the middle is . . . the trio. The light and sprightly sounds of the woodwinds, the harps in harmonics, sprinkled with the aerial tones of the violins announce a distant procession which gradually draws near. The force of the evocation here is astounding. Transported far beyond Europe we actually seem to see the defile of the horsemen and elephants. The rajah appears, saluted by the horns, trumpets and trombones in a superb hymn. A calm episode of exquisite tenderness follows, where the flute and cor anglais sing in unison over the swaying rhythm of the violins in the upper register. Soon the music gradually quickens and we hear again most of the preceding themes wonderfully interwoven. The sounds of the city "en fête" grow more distant and die away in the night, and this second section ends as do the first and the third—on a sustained pianissimo.
>
> In the third section, "On the Banks of the Sacred River," the most important of the work, the chorus is used. [The Cecilia Society at these concerts.] It is often treated instrumentally without words as a fresh timbre of the orchestra,—richer and more flexible than any other, and it is thus I think that it is used most happily. At other times it sings to the words of M. Calvocoressi—a rhythmic prose of a beautiful lyricism, celebrating "the night whose perfumes invite to love." A baritone exalts the virtues of the Ganges, "sacred river wherein is reflected the luminous sky."

The moods of this movement follow closely M. Calvocoressi's text. The opening measures prepare for the opening chorus:

The sun has gone down into the sea
And the cool trees call the birds to their nests.
The sun has gone down into the sea
The fields of lotus close their flowery eyes
And darkness covers the earth
Like a black herd of elephants.

There is an interlude in which a graceful flute solo introduces a theme which is much heard throughout the work. As violins take it up the chorus continues:

But already the perfumes of the night awaken hearts to love;
By the light of the clear moon one sees couples, arms and bodies entwined happily strolling under the trembling leaves.

As the orchestra grows more quiet, more "impressionistic," the same theme continues and the first of these last two lines are repeated as a tenor solo. There is a [illegible] interlude that grows to heated passions [illegible] the other line. Then a contralto solo continues:

Sweeter than the perfumes of the night
And more ardent, is my love.

O sombre veils of heaven, why do you yield so soon to the dawn?

These words bring the first portion of this last evocation to an end. A baritone solo follows. It proceeds in recitatif-like manner, with only slight orchestral accompaniment. Occasionally when the emotional content runs high, the orchestra rises with it.

Under skies black, skies rent by blinding lightnings,
Higher than the eye can pierce or the bird fly.
Mounting in majesty even to the palace of the immortals,
Rises the sovereign mountain.
Its vast shadows terrify the hearts of timid humans;
No foot has ever trod the snows of these haughty summits.
None but eagles have heard the winds moaning in its caverns.
It is a God, whose voice comes down to us.
From its flanks spring streams which bring to the plains and to the valleys the water which cleanses from sin, the water which makes fertile and brings nourishment;
And the laughing torrent rushes on toward sun-lit fields
Where rise flourishing cities.
In the thick shadow of forests rise rumors, cries of anguish and of desire, voices of hate and of love.
But under peaceful trees you follow your course,
O river in which is reflected the luminous sky,
Happy is he whose eyes break on this river beloved of the gods:
Its waters will carry his ashes to the vast sea.
As the melting snow frees water purified
So the declining body will at last release the soul
To mount to the numberless stars.
The sacred river which has bathed the temples of the holy city,
In the silence of the night passing terraces yet obscure,
Set off with banks of flowers, murmuring words divine,
Descends to you, people immense, suppliant,
People longing soon to see
Reborn the sun of a new day.

Here an active, brilliant music leads to the following enthusiastic chorus:

O sun, eye of the day, with warm light
Thy ruddy glow already bursts forth among the branches of the great wood.
You bring to blossom the flowers whose fragrant pollens the wind carries far and wide.
The harvest of lotus flowers bows before thee, drinking in thy caresses,
Hails thee, who creates the days,
Thee, who each morning spreads over the mountain-tops the sheaf of thy new rays.
Thou scatterest before thee the immense army of the stars
And thy passionate beaty reigns alone on the ocean set aflame from the skies.

After this the orchestra subsides to the final pianissimo.

Monsieur Schmitt, in the review quoted, was not content with the praise which he bestowed in passing. He was enthused. He wished to express his enthusiasm. With fiery pen he did so in two flaming paragraphs. One need not agree with his negative remarks and comparisons. But the positive side of his remarks is good medicine—perhaps especially for a certain brand of Bostonian Philistines:

> For my own part, at the risk of being burned alive in the Place Saint Jacques, I boldly declare before all the gods that I would willingly sacrifice for it—meaning "Evocations"—the Mass in D and the "Beatitudes." For these "Evocations" cause me an emotion truly intense and complete. To the depth of the inspiration, to the magnificence of the ideas, to the intensity of the inner life which pulsates through it, is added a workmanship of an irresistible seduction. The rhythms are original and of infinite variety, the harmony revolutionary yet justified, the orchestration daring, iridescent, warm-colored, sensuous to the point of sadism and of a new and always mobile sonority. The enthusiastic applause with which the work and its interpreters were received deceived us for a moment into thinking that it would be repeated next Sunday. Alas, nothing of the kind—I cannot understand this mania for the past which is going to give us in its stead the frigid "Requiem" of Mozart—and a repetition once more of the Ninth Symphony—without the very praiseworthy alterations of Mahler. Oh! that Ninth Symphony!—In spite even of the vivid interpretation of M. Chevillard, it seemed to me insufferably tedious after the "Evocations"—as tiresome as a Lenten sermon or the reading of a legal document, after coming away from seeing a beloved one. A. H. M

[illegible] [illegible] Adagio—and his symphonies live by the slow movements; a vigorous Scherzo—and there are some who set Bruckner's Scherzi next to Beethoven's; a first division freer than usual from structural weaknesses and unfulfilled progress. The presumption that American audiences hear with indifference both Mahler and Bruckner is a shibboleth of reviewing rather than an experienced fact. Here in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony was applauded and re-demanded more than once; the recent performances of "The Song of The Earth" went by no means unrewarded; while over nearly twenty years the memory of the Adagio in Bruckner's Eighth has survived. Like or dislike them, Mahler and Bruckner are still imposing figures in the music of our time. Mr. Koussevitzky does well to restore them to the Symphony Concerts. It is a part of his policy to keep the repertory catholic, plastic and unroutined. Since Bruckner's Symphony fills an hour and more, only Mr. Foote's Suite for String Orchestra will accompany it.

90

ys and Players === Music and Musicians =

Many-Sided and Many-Voiced

(Mary Dale Clark)

Ernest Schelling

Composer-Cond[illegible] Today and To morrow, at the Symphony Concerts

90

ys and Players === Music and Musicians =

Many-Sided and Many-Voiced

(Mary Dale Clark)

Ernest Schelling

Composer-Cond[illegible]r, Today and Tomorrow, at the Symphony Concerts

Symphony

From Morocco To the Indies, By Old Russia

Mr. Koussevitzky Boxes the Tonal Compass, A Chorus Aiding

BY INFERENCE, the composers were at fault. . . .The Cecilia, as assisting chorus, bettered previous appearances at the Symphony Concerts. The voices were in truer balance; even the men were audible as such. Attack and release went more crisply. There were more regard for pace, more response to rhythm; at moments, as in the night-music of Roussel's "Evocations," a sensuous quality of tone. Only a Russian choir could range and ring through the Tartar choruses in Borodin's "Prince Igor." As it was, this Bostonian Cecilia brought them off with a rhythmic verve, a plasticity to the vocal moment that implied familiarity, freedom and confidence. Contrary to custom at this annual pair of Symphony Concerts with chorus, Mr. Koussevitzky seldom had need to goad the singers.

The conductor himself fell not a whit below his usual invigorating quality; while before him was music in which he is wont to excel. Franck's Psalm is an upspringing curve of praise. Mr. Koussevitzky knows how to shape and spin such an ascent. Roussel's "Evocations" are musical conjuring out of an exotic Orient upon ear and imagination. The conductor has long been adept manipulator of such magic. Time and again, as once more yesterday, he has caught the tribal voice, upflung the rhythmic leaps, whetted the contrasts, achieved the whole barbaric illusion of the dancing scene in the Polovtsian camp. . . . The orchestra is immune from blame. The composers and the conductors—for Mr. Schelling led through his own tone poem, "Morocco"—asked for rhythmic animation and precision. They received them. They asked also for characterizing color With it the orchestra abounded. . . . Yet there have been more interesting Symphony Concerts, to which the matinée audiences returned quicker, less labored, applause.

Elimination fixes the guilt upon the composers, save only Borodin in the dances from "Prince Igor"; while recollection and reflection bear out that quasi-mathematical process. The One Hundred and Fiftieth Psalm praises the Lord in sundry places and by sundry means. It was also the custom of le bon père Franck so to do, from a devout and honest heart. He was in his sixty-fifth year when he set these exultant verses. Possibly the musical procedure had become too customary. Other tasks may have more engrossed him. There were the pupils and the organist's duties at Sainte-Clothilde. The music to the Psalm is appropriate enough. It is well designed, well accomplished, skilful and singable, but rarely, if at all, does it sound either the rapt or the ardent Franckian note. The bon père praises his Lord becomingly and effectively; but more than once the unregenerate ear fancies it hears him barely shaving a pious banality. The Psalm has long stood in The Cecilia's repertory. It tuned up the singers; gave them confidence. Let it go at that.

Mr. Ernest Schelling, welcomed as composer-conductor to concerts that he has adorned as composer, pianist, or both, journeyed, not too long ago, through Morocco. As he made his travels, his ears opened, his imagination stirred, to the musical or quasi-musical sounds around him. He heard the Raita which the learned doctors, who compile program-books in New York and Boston, liken to a primitive oboe used as an instrument of iteration. He gave ear to the cries that sweep over fire-lit dances of common women. He listened to the chant of the story-teller by the city wall, to a lullaby at twilight. He marked "the implacable rhythms" of war-songs. Naturally enough his retaining mind associated these sounds with sights. The passing of a Cadi and his train had interrupted the lullaby. The chants of the story-teller, repeating ancient valors upon one tone, had stirred a fanatic fellow to dervish-like frenzies. Out of a mountain stronghold had sounded "the implacable rhythms." . . .

Obviously material for symphonic music in a concert-room of the arts where in these days the bizarre is accepted tonal currency. Mr. Schelling would fashion his matter and his memories into a symphonic poem; yet, as it seemed yesterday, has no more than outspread his collection, after the manner of those that come from a journey into a far country. There unmistakably was the reiterative voice of the Raita. Beyond peradventure the women at the dancing shrilled out "yew-yew-yew." The story-teller persisted upon his one tone. The percussion instruments sharpened, the whole orchestra hammered, the warlike rhythms, and rhythm—Heaven and Hades know—is the sign and seal of music nowadays. With a hint from the program-note, the passing show of the cadi, the frenetic exercises of the fanatic, were tonally recognizable.

There they were, each appropriately labelled—the musical specimens assembled by Mr. Schelling in the course of a Moroccan tour, as such fetched back to New York. Yet, if he will forgive a blunt word, not unkindly but honestly meant, his symphonic poem does no more than expose and catalogue them. Making his music, he does the works of recollection and exhibition, not the works of imagination. He takes the first step which was to assort, mentally, his "finds." He halts at the second which was to transfuse and transfigure them into a musical and an emotional impression. He unfolds the record; but fails to convey that more essential matter in artistic commerce, the sensation. Most of us heard as detachedly as we glance at the collection of ancient instruments on the other side of the corridor. Illusion there was not.

Where Mr. Schelling fails, Monsieur Roussel succeeds. He is transcribing into music impressions received and memories retained from external sounds and sights. His biographers and the omniscients of the program-books specify the source—Farther India and Cochin Chna, whither he journeyed as junior officer in the French navy before he became composer by profession. He himself, setting forewords to the three "Evocations," no more than notes Oriental origins—the images of the gods carven variously upon the walls of caverns; the distant city swimming in rosy haze, through which rises and falls the softened din of a pageant-life; the nocturnal rites, sunset to sunrise, sensuous and mystical, along the banks of the sacred river.

Monsieur Roussel's music never particularizes, never catalogues. It seeks to evoke visions, to convey sensations, less from actual contact with the source than from remembrance lingering and treasured. It precisely satisfies the definition of artistic creation as "emotion recollected in tranquillity." (In point of fact Monsieur Roussel wrote these "Evocations" long after his first visit to the Orient). Though his horns in "La Ville Rose" may sing the hymn of the Rajah, though the attentive ear may detect the pacing elephants, his city is an image only less vague than the Palace of Kubla Khan. He disembodies the night along the sacred river into sensuous sound and mystical suggestion. (The chorus often repeats mere syllables). Across it in swift blur passes the chant of the priest; upon it unfolds the dawn. Monsieur Roussel looks upon the carven figures of the caverns and hears the rustle of the gods—less of their bodily semblance than of the Divinity within.

Here is the very office of music—to impart the spiritual sensation at a hint from the pictorial fact; the very function of the composer seeing his visions, then transmuting them into tones. Monsieur Roussel pursues a sensitizing poetry; Mr. Schelling halts at a recording prose. Wherein, then, did the "Evocations" fall short, or seem to fall short, in the single hearing of yesterday? Possibly in a lack of the intensive quality that imposes upon the hearer the vision before the composer's spiritual eye, the sensation or the reaction that sent him forthwith to his work-table. The facture of the three "Evocations" invites only to praise. Resource, skill and imagination fashion and fill them by a method and with a matter manifestly individual. Never once does Monsieur Roussel decline into the commonplaces of Oriental "tone-picturing." A fastidious, rejecting temperament is ever in unobtrusive guard. The ear receives the music intently; the mind follows it unabatedly; the imagination takes pleasure in the unfolded design, this implication, that detail, along the way. There is the sensuous, mystical suggestion, says the listener to himself as he hears the third "Evocation." And there the roseate city peopled with sounds. Yet again the sense of the welter of Divinities. Never once, however, was appreciation submerged in illusion. Curiosity was satisfied; admiration awakened; while other, and more intimate, sensations lay cool and dormant.

Pass next to the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." To most of us the adjective is meaningless; "Prince Igor" a mere title of Russian opera; Borodin's no such conjuring name as Chaikovsky's, Rimsky-Korsakov's or Musorgsky's. None but the learned "programist" knows the place of the dances in the action. Few recall them in the theater unless they keep long memory of Monsieur Diaghilev's ballet. Yet no sooner do they sound across a concert-hall than illusion engulfs all that hear. The rhythms leap, bound, or relax in undulation; while to them we also beat. The pace stays or speeds and with it we keep course. The choruses sound and we answer to the contrasts of the mood and the voices. A tribe is at its revels and we are caught into the tumult—the native wildness that may yet lurk within us released and fanned. To Mr. Schelling his recordings; to Monsieur Roussel his visions; to Borodin his half hour of inspiration. It is all the difference in the world. H. T. P.

GLOBE FEB 17

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky will conduct Bruckner's Eighth Symphony at this week's Symphony concerts. It was last played here in 1909. In Germany the composer is regarded as one of the chief writers of the 19th century, but elsewhere his music has not been frequently performed. A suite for strings by Arthur Foote, the well-known Boston composer, is the only other number on the program.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was assisted at its concert yesterday afternoon by the Cecilia Society, which had been trained by Malcolm Lang, its conductor. The program was as follows: Franck, Psalm 150 for chorus, orchestra and organ. Schelling, "Morocco" symphonic poem. Roussel, "Evocations", three symphonic sketches for orchestra with chorus. Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor". The first and the third "Evocations" and "Morocco" were played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Schelling conducted his composition. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the other numbers.

Franck's treatment of the Psalm is one shout of jubilation, with a full use of the instruments named by the Psalmist. The music is a summons to praise the Lord of the universe, not a tribal deity. What is known as the "Hebraic spirit" is not here to be expected. It would be interesting to know how Ernest Bloch, who has expressed this spirit more eloquently than any other modern composer, would write music for this Psalm. No doubt there would be a wildness in his musical praise, the wildness of a race that would not allow another god and called all other worshippers, idolators.

Mr. Schelling visited Morocco. As a musician he was impressed by the native melodies, instruments, dances, songs, scenes and customs. His Morocco is not the land that has inspired other composers, who could not forget their own nationality and were bent on "civilizing" what to them were barbaric sounds, chiefly interesting to the ethnologist. If Ossendowski were a musician, he would write in Mr. Schelling's spirit as he has written in the prose account of his north African adventures. Mr. Schelling knew that there must be relieving measures, but he did not stray afar. There are at times the thought of orientalism as known to Rimsky-Korsakov and to Tchaikovsky when he was willing to forget Germany and turn his ear to the East.

"Morocco" is frankly descriptive and pictorial music. The most exotic section is the first with its introductory unaccompanied solo, a recollection of music for the native Raita, now represented by the oboe, beautifully played by Mr. Gillet; with the wild dance and strange encouraging cries of women. In this section there is no suggestion of the occident except for the technical skill which allows the composer's impressions to be shared by an audience. In the following "Lullaby" there is characteristic and pleasing monotony of melody and rhythm, which in spite of ingenious changes preserves the persistent mood peculiar to much oriental music; only broken by the highly original manner in which the Caid and his followers pass in state, musically the most impressive measures of the symphonic poem.

The remaining sections depict a scene outside the walls of Fez, with the teller of tales, the eater of fire, etc, as described by travellers drily or with gusto; The Finale, suggested by the stronghold of a chieftain, and the call to war.

It is not to belittle this work to call it entertaining. It is especially entertaining in that Mr. Schelling did not try to be more oriental than the Moroccans; that he did not strive to gain effect by bald realism; that he did not deliberately write as he thought a native composer would write, but as an accomplished musician of the West whose imagination appreciated what to others might have been barbaric strains pleasurable only to those accustomed to them from childhood.

Mr. Monteux brought out in Boston Roussel's second "Evocation" entitled "La Ville Rose." Only the third. "By the Banks of a Sacred River" calls for a chorus. The first "Evocation" was inspired by Roussel's visit, as a naval officer, later as a traveller, to the East, when he saw sculptured gods of love, hate, joy, violence in the shadow of a caravan.

It is a dangerous experiment, this translating a picture or sculptured work into tones, though brave men have risked it, as Liszt, Huber, Reger, Volbach, not to name others. Roussel is more fortunate in the charming introductory measures and those that close than in the musical portrayal of this or that god, music that is perfunctory and too self-conscious. "La Ville Rose," a kind of a Scherzo, is much more to Roussel's credit. Here is true fancy; here he evokes a scene that needs no set description, but may be imagined by any sensitive hearer, from the title itself, without any anxious waiting to hear "Elephants preceding the Rajah"; indifferent to his or any other Hindoo's hymn. The section with chorus was disappointing yesterday, nor was it the fault of the singers who sang valiantly here as in Franck's Psalm; as in the entrancing and splendidly savage dances from "Prince Igor"; nor was it Mr. McClosky's fault; he declaimed boldly the strange chant of the Priest. No; the music itself is at fault. It is, as a rule, singularly inexpressive of Calvocoressi's prose-poem. For example: what dry measures for the lines telling how perfumes of the night awaken love in hearts; how couples, quivering with happiness, stroll, enlaced beneath the moonbeams! But Roussel's Muse is intellectual, not sensuous.

In the "make-up" of the Program-Book, by an unfortunate transposition and the dropping of a line, the long chant of Roussel's Priest was attributed to the chorus and the translation of two lines for the chorus was put after the chant instead of before it. Books, including Program Books, have their fate.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Foote's Suite in E major for strings; Bruckner's Symphony, No. 8, C minor.

Programs to Hand

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next in substitution for the program announced:

Suite in E major for Strings.....Foote
Rhythmic Dance .....Debussy
Image for Orchestra, "Iberia".....Chaikovsky
Symphony in E minor, No. 5.....Chaikovsky

From The Flute-Players for their concert in the galleries of the Art Club next Sunday afternoon:

Trio for Piano, Violin, Viola.....Beethoven
Messrs. Lacroix, Eicus, Zighera
Concerto for Harp and Seven Wind Instruments .....Salzedo
Miss Lawrence: Messrs. Laurent, Gillet, Hamelin, Mimart, Laus, Boettcher, Mager: The Composer conducting
Five Pieces for Two Harps.....Salzedo
Miss Lawrence and Mr. Salzedo
Quartet, No. 24, for Flute, Violin, Viola, Violoncello .....Mozart
Messrs. Laurent, Eicus, Artières, Zighera

From Eugène Goossens for the concert of his own music in Jordan Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 25.

Quintet for Strings and Piano, Op. 23.
Burgin Quartet and The Composer.
Three Songs:
The Appeal.
Melancholy.
Philomel.
Miss Ehrhart and Mr. Slonimsky.
Concerto for Oboe and Piano.
Leon Goossens and The Composer.
Two Sketches for String Quartet:
By the Tarn.
Jack o' Lantern.
Burgin Quartet.
Piano-Pieces.
The Composer.
Four Songs:
Villanelle du Soir.
Epigram.
Tea-Time.
The Curse.
Miss Ehrhart and Mr. Slonimsky.
Sextet for Three Violins, Viola, Two Violoncellos.
Burgin Quartet, Mr. Langendoen, The Composer.

From Mr. George Copeland for his final concert of the season in Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26:

Capriccio .....Scarlatti
Bourrée .....Bach
Air—Menuet .....Mattheson
Adagio .....Graziolí
Gavotte .....Prokofiev
Scherzo .....Mendelssohn
La terrasse des audiences au clair de lune—La huerta del vino—Reflets dans l'eau—Les fess sont d'exquises danseuses—Prelude à l'après-midi d'un faune—Minstrels...Debussy
Silhouettes Ibériennes (MS).....Slonimsky
Aromas de Leyenda
Jota
Imperia
Tango Espagnole—El Polo.....Albéniz
Tango.....Grovlez

Items of the Day

It is definitely settled that the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon, March 24, will return to old custom and consist wholly of music from Wagner's operas. Whether there will be assisting singers is as yet undecided.

Discussing the concert-going public in various American cities, Mr. George Engles, the manager, as reported in the New York newspapers, paid this town a compliment:

Of the large metropolitan centers, Boston is perhaps the most genuinely musical. It is one of the few cities which place musicianship above office appeal.

At Mr. Sanromá's concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a deep-red curtain was let fall within the proscenium arch. The pianist was thus placed well forward upon a small stage. The auditorium was also darkened and a gentle light focussed upon him. It seemed an agreeable arrangement. Nor did the curtain perceptibly deaden sound.

TRANS. FEB 18 '29 H. T. P.

HERALD FEB 19 '29

AT SYMPHONY HALL

At the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the orchestra will be assisted by the Cecilia Society, of which Malcolm Lang is the director. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Cesar Franck's Psalm 150; Roussel's three "Evocations," the third of which calls for a chorus; Schelling's symphonic poem, "Morocco" (conducted by the composer), and the Polovtsian dances with chorus from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The "Evocations," of which "La Ville Rose" has been played in Boston, record Roussel's impressions of a visit to Cochin, China. The themes and coloring of "Morocco" are the result of Mr. Schelling's sojourn in northern Africa.

The fourth Monday night concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place tomorrow at 8:15 P. M. Bach's Brandenburg concerto for violin, two flutes and strings; Liszt's piano concerto No. 2 (Yolanda Mero, pianist); Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra" (after Nietzsche).

Post

SCHELLING CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Heard in Own Tone Poem—Cecilia Society in 3 Pieces

The presence of the chorus of the Cecilia Society for participation in three of the four pieces upon the programme and the conducting by Ernest Schelling of his newest orchestral work, the symphonic poem "Morocco," are the things which set this week's pair of Symphony concerts apart from their fellows. In Franck's Psalm 150 for chorus, orchestra and organ; Roussel's three symphonic sketches, collectively entitled "Evocations," and the Polovsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Mr. Koussevitzky was in his accustomed place upon the podium.

SCHELLING'S TONE POEM

As pianist, as composer and as lecturer-conductor in his altogether delightful concerts for children Mr. Schelling is a familiar figure to Boston's musical public, and he was warmly greeted yesterday. His tone-poem, "Morocco," which was having its first Boston performance, has had a curious history. Inspired by a trip to Morocco some years ago it was orginally written in June, 1927, but the score was lost and in September Mr. Schelling reworte the piece and himself conducted its first performance by the Philharmonic Society of New York in December of that year. He has since revised it and by token of his own words as quoted in the programme-book of yesterday, has "changed much."

Mr. Schelling has sought, and with success, to translate into the language of the modern symphonic orchestra the music of the peoples of Morocco. His poem of four connected movements, depicts first and most effectively the dancing of the Culed Nails; a lullaby is succeeded by the tonal picture of a Berber story-teller outside the walls of Fez at sunset, and the fourth and final section, rhythmically exciting, deals with "the working up of the war spirit" among the tribes in the mountain stronghold of El Glaoui.

Cordially Received

Needless to say, Mr. Schelling is not the first who has sought to convey in terms of the symphonic orchestra the atmosphere, the spirit and the native music of Morocco. That in tonal coloring and general effect his impressions of that land should bear a certain generic resemblance to those of others, say of the "Beni Mora" of Gustav Holst twice heard this season from the People's Symphony Orchestra, is not only natural, but undoubtedly an indication of the accuracy and validity of Mr. Schelling's musical reportings. Nor does that fact detract from the excellence of the craftsmanship with which Mr. Schelling has devised his picturings.

The chorus of the Cecilia Society, of which Malcolm Lang is the conductor, was heard first in the opening number upon the programme, the Psalm of Cesar Franck. This music, of the competent musician and cathedral organist rather than of the greater Franck, was first heard at these concerts in the regime of Mr. Rabaud. For conclusion to the concert came this chorus' stirring, wholly effective singing of the Polovtsian Dance of Borodin, long familiar to Symphony audiences and yesterday received with the wonted enthusiasm.

Symphony Program Change

On account of the additional preparation which Bruckner's Eighth Symphony requires, Mr. Koussevitzky has postponed the performance of this work, and will play it on the Symphony program, March 22-23. The Boston Symphony program for Friday and Saturday, Feb. 22-23, will be as follows: Foote, Suite in E major; Goossens, Rhythmic Dance; Debussy, "Iberia"; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5. MON. FEB 19 '29

Symphony

From Morocco To the Indies, By Old Russia

Mr. Koussevitzky Boxes the Tonal Compass, A Chorus Aiding

BY INFERENCE, the composers were at fault. . . .The Cecilia, as assisting chorus, bettered previous appearances at the Symphony Concerts. The voices were in truer balance; even the men were audible as such. Attack and release went more crisply. There were more regard for pace, more response to rhythm; at moments, as in the night-music of Roussel's "Evocations," a sensuous quality of tone. Only a Russian choir could range and ring through the Tartar choruses in Borodin's "Prince Igor." As it was, this Bostonian Cecilia brought them off with a rhythmic verve, a plasticity to the vocal moment that implied familiarity, freedom and confidence. Contrary to custom at this annual pair of Symphony Concerts with chorus, Mr. Koussevitzky seldom had need to goad the singers.

The conductor himself fell not a whit below his usual invigorating quality; while before him was music in which he is wont to excel. Franck's Psalm is an upspringing curve of praise. Mr. Koussevitzky knows how to shape and spin such an ascent. Roussel's "Evocations" are musical conjuring out of an exotic Orient upon ear and imagination. The conductor has long been adept manipulator of such magic. Time and again, as once more yesterday, he has caught the tribal voice, upflung the rhythmic leaps, whetted the contrasts, achieved the whole barbaric illusion of the dancing scene in the Polovtsian camp. . . . The orchestra is immune from blame. The composers and the conductors—for Mr. Schelling led through his own tone poem, "Morocco"—asked for rhythmic animation and precision. They received them. They asked also for characterizing color With it the orchestra abounded. . . . Yet there have been more interesting Symphony Concerts, to which the matinée audiences returned quicker, less labored, applause.

Elimination fixes the guilt upon the composers, save only Borodin in the dances from "Prince Igor"; while recollection and reflection bear out that quasi-mathematical process. The One Hundred and Fiftieth Psalm praises the Lord in sundry places and by sundry means. It was also the custom of le bon père Franck so to do, from a devout and honest heart. He was in his sixty-fifth year when he set these exultant verses. Possibly the musical procedure had become too customary. Other tasks may have more engrossed him. There were the pupils and the organist's duties at Sainte-Clothilde. The music to the Psalm is appropriate enough. It is well designed, well accomplished, skilful and singable, but rarely, if at all, does it sound either the rapt or the ardent Franckian note. The bon père praises his Lord becomingly and effectively; but more than once the unregenerate ear fancies it hears him barely shaving a pious banality. The Psalm has long stood in The Cecilia's repertory. It tuned up the singers; gave them confidence. Let it go at that.

Mr. Ernest Schelling, welcomed as composer-conductor to concerts that he has adorned as composer, pianist, or both, journeyed, not too long ago, through Morocco. As he made his travels, his ears opened, his imagination stirred, to the musical or quasi-musical sounds around him. He heard the Raita which the learned doctors, who compile program-books in New York and Boston, liken to a primitive oboe used as an instrument of iteration. He gave ear to the cries that sweep over fire-lit dances of common women. He listened to the chant of the story-teller by the city wall to a lullaby at twilight. He marked "the implacable rhythms" of war-songs. Naturally enough his retaining mind associated these sounds with sights. The passing of a Cadi and his train had interrupted the lullaby. The chants of the story-teller, repeating ancient valors upon one tone, had stirred a fanatic fellow to dervish-like frenzies. Out of a mountain stronghold had sounded "the implacable rhythms." . . .

Obviously material for symphonic music in a concert-room of the arts where in these days the bizarre is accepted tonal currency. Mr. Schelling would fashion his matter and his memories into a symphonic poem; yet, as it seemed yesterday, has no more than outspread his collection, after the manner of those that come from a journey into a far country. There unmistakably was the reiterative voice of the Raita. Beyond peradventure the women at the dancing shrilled out "yew-yew-yew." The story-teller persisted upon his one tone. The percussion instruments sharpened, the whole orchestra hammered, the war-like rhythms, and rhythm—Heaven and Hades know—is the sign and seal of music nowadays. With a hint from the program-note, the passing show of the cadi, the frenetic exercises of the fanatic, were tonally recognizable.

There they were, each appropriately labelled—the musical specimens assembled by Mr. Schelling in the course of a Moroccan tour, as such fetched back to New York. Yet, if he will forgive a blunt word, not unkindly but honestly meant, his symphonic poem does no more than expose and catalogue them. Making his music, he does the works of recollection and exhibition, not the works of imagination. He takes the first step which was to assort, mentally, his "finds." He halts at the second which was to transfuse and transfigure them into a musical and an emotional impression. He unfolds the record; but fails to convey that more essential matter in artistic commerce, the sensation. Most of us heard as detachedly as we glance at the collection of ancient instruments on the other side of the corridor. Illusion there was not.

Where Mr. Schelling fails, Monsieur Roussel succeeds. He is transcribing into music impressions received and memories retained from external sounds and sights. His biographers and the omniscients of the program-books specify the source—Farther India and Cochin Chna, whither he journeyed as junior officer in the French navy before he became composer by profession. He himself, setting forewords to the three "Evocations," no more than notes Oriental origins—the images of the gods carven variously upon the walls of caverns; the distant city swimming in rosy haze, through which rises and falls the softened din of a pageant-life; the nocturnal rites, sunset to sunrise, sensuous and mystical, along the banks of the sacred river.

Monsieur Roussel's music never particularizes, never catalogues. It seeks to evoke visions, to convey sensations, less from actual contact with the source than from remembrance lingering and treasured. It precisely satisfies the definition of artistic creation as "emotion recollected in tranquillity." (In point of fact Monsieur Roussel wrote these "Evocations" long after his first visit to the Orient). Though his horns in "La Ville Rose" may sing the hymn of the Rajah, though the attentive ear may detect the pacing elephants, his city is an image only less vague than the Palace of Kubla Khan. He disembodies the night along the sacred river into sensuous sound and mystical suggestions. (The chorus often repeats mere syllables). Across it in swift blur passes the chant of the priest; upon it unfolds the dawn. Monsieur Roussel looks upon the carven figures of the caverns and hears the rustle of the gods—less of their bodily semblance than of the Divinity within.

Here is the very office of music—to impart the spiritual sensation at a hint from the pictorial fact; the very function of the composer seeing his visions, then transmuting them into tones. Monsieur Roussel pursues a sensitizing poetry; Mr. Schelling halts at a recording prose. Wherein, then, did the "Evocations" fall short, or seem to fall short, in the single hearing of yesterday? Possibly in a lack of the intensive quality that imposes upon the hearer the vision before the composer's spiritual eye, the sensation or the reaction that sent him forthwith to his work-table. The facture of the three "Evocations" invites only to praise. Resource, skill and imagination fashion and fill them by a method and with a matter manifestly individual. Never once does Monsieur Roussel decline into the commonplaces of Oriental "tone-picturing." A fastidious, rejecting temperament is ever in unobtrusive guard. The ear receives the music intently; the mind follows it unabatedly; the imagination takes pleasure in the unfolded design, this implication, that detail, along the way. There is the sensuous, mystical suggestion, says the listener to himself as he hears the third "Evocation." And there the roseate city peopled with sounds. Yet again the sense of the welter of Divinities. Never once, however, was appreciation submerged in illusion. Curiosity was satisfied; admiration awakened; while other, and more intimate, sensations lay cool and dormant.

Pass next to the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." To most of us the adjective is meaningless; "Prince Igor" a mere title of Russian opera; Borodin's no such conjuring name as Chaikovsky's, Rimsky-Korsakov's or Musorgsky's. None but the learned "programist" knows the place of the dances in the action. Few recall them in the theater unless they keep long memory of Monsieur Diaghilev's ballet. Yet no sooner do they sound across a concert-hall than illusion engulfs all that hear. The rhythms leap, bound, or relax in undulation; while to them we also beat. The pace stays or speeds and with it we keep course. The choruses sound and we answer to the contrasts of the mood and the voices. A tribe is at its revels and we are caught into the tumult—the native wildness that may yet lurk within us released and fanned. To Mr. Schelling his recordings; to Monsieur Roussel his visions; to Borodin his half hour of inspiration. It is all the difference in the world. H. T. P.

GLOBE FEB 17

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky will conduct Bruckner's Eighth Symphony at this week's Symphony concerts. It was last played here in 1909. In Germany the composer is regarded as one of the chief writers of the 19th century, but elsewhere his music has not been frequently performed. A suite for strings by Arthur Foote, the well-known Boston composer, is the only other number on the program.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was assisted at its concert yesterday afternoon by the Cecilia Society, which had been trained by Malcolm Lang, its conductor. The program was as follows: Franck, Psalm 150 for chorus, orchestra and organ. Schelling, "Morocco" symphonic poem. Roussel, "Evocations", three symphonic sketches for orchestra with chorus. Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor". The first and the third "Evocations" and "Morocco" were played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Schelling conducted his composition. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the other numbers.

Franck's treatment of the Psalm is one shout of jubilation, with a full use of the instruments named by the Psalmist. The music is a summons to praise the Lord of the universe, not a tribal deity. What is known as the "Hebraic spirit" is not here to be expected. It would be interesting to know how Ernest Bloch, who has expressed this spirit more eloquently than any other modern composer, would write music for this Psalm. No doubt there would be a wildness in his musical praise, the wildness of a race that would not allow another god and called all other worshippers, idolators.

Mr. Schelling visited Morocco. As a musician he was impressed by the native melodies, instruments, dances, songs, scenes and customs. His Morocco is not the land that has inspired other composers, who could not forget their own nationality and were bent on "civilizing" what to them were barbaric sounds, chiefly interesting to the ethnologist. If Ossendowski were a musician, he would write in Mr. Schelling's spirit as he has written in the prose account of his north African adventures. Mr. Schelling knew that there must be relieving measures, but he did not stray afar. There are at times the thought of orientalism as known to Rimsky-Korsakov and to Tchaikovsky when he was willing to forget Germany and turn his ear to the East.

"Morocco" is frankly descriptive and pictorial music. The most exotic section is the first with its introductory unaccompanied solo, a recollection of music for the native Raita, now represented by the oboe, beautifully played by Mr. Gillet; with the wild dance and strange encouraging cries of women. In this section there is no suggestion of the occident except for the technical skill which allows the composer's impressions to be shared by an audience. In the following "Lullaby" there is characteristic and pleasing monotony of melody and rhythm, which in spite of ingenious changes preserves the persistent mood peculiar to much oriental music; only broken, by the highly original manner in which the Caid and his followers pass in state, musically the most impressive measures of the symphonic poem.

The remaining sections depict a scene outside the walls of Fez, with the teller of tales, the eater of fire, etc, as described by travellers drily or with gusto; The Finale, suggested by the stronghold of a chieftain, and the call to war.

It is not to belittle this work to call it entertaining. It is especially entertaining in that Mr. Schelling did not try to be more oriental than the Moroccans; that he did not strive to gain effect by bald realism; that he did not deliberately write as he thought a native composer would write, but as an accomplished musician of the West whose imagination appreciated what to others might have been barbaric strains pleasurable only to those accustomed to them from childhood.

Mr. Monteux brought out in Boston Roussel's second "Evocation" entitled "La Ville Rose." Only the third, "By the Banks of a Sacred River" calls for a chorus. The first "Evocation" was inspired by Roussel's visit, as a naval officer, later as a traveller, to the East, when he saw sculptured gods of love, hate, joy, violence in the shadow of a caravan.

It is a dangerous experiment, this translating a picture or sculptured work into tones, though brave men have risked it, as Liszt, Huber, Reger, Volbach, not to name others. Roussel is more fortunate in the charming introductory measures and those that close than in the musical portrayal of this or that god, music that is perfunctory and too self-conscious. "La Ville Rose," a kind of a Scherzo, is much more to Roussel's credit. Here is true fancy; here he evokes a scene that needs no set description, but may be imagined by any sensitive hearer, from the title itself, without any anxious waiting to hear "Elephants preceding the Rajah"; indifferent to his or any other Hindoo's hymn. The section with chorus was disappointing yesterday, nor was it the fault of the singers who sang valiantly here as in Franck's Psalm; as in the entrancing and splendidly savage dances from "Prince Igor"; nor was it Mr. McClosky's fault; he declaimed boldly the strange chant of the Priest. No; the music itself is at fault. It is, as a rule, singularly inexpressive of Calvocoressi's prose-poem. For example: what dry measures for the lines telling how perfumes of the night awaken love in hearts; how couples, quivering with happiness, stroll, enlaced beneath the moonbeams! But Roussel's Muse is intellectual, not sensuous.

In the "make-up" of the Program-Book, by an unfortunate transposition and the dropping of a line, the long chant of Roussel's Priest was attributed to the chorus and the translation of two lines for the chorus was put after the chant instead of before it. Books, including Program Books, have their fate.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Foote's Suite in E major for strings; Bruckner's Symphony, No. 8, C minor.

Programs to Hand

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next in substitution for the program announced:

Suite in E major for Strings ..... Foote
Rhythmic Dance ..... Goossens
Image for Orchestra, "Iberia" ..... Debussy
Symphony in E minor, No. 5 ..... Chaikovsky

From The Flute-Players for their concert in the galleries of the Art Club next Sunday afternoon:

Trio for Piano, Violin, Viola ..... Rave
Messrs. Lacroix, Ecus, Zighera
Concerto for Harp and Seven Wind Instruments ..... Salzed
Miss Lawrence: Messrs. Laurent, Gillet, Hamelin, Mimart, Laus, Boettcher, Mager: The Composer conducting
Five Pieces for Two Harps ..... Salzedo
Miss Lawrence and Mr. Salzedo
Quartet, No. 24, for Flute, Violin, Viola, Violoncello ..... Mozart
Messrs. Laurent, Ecus, Artières, Zighera

From Eugène Goossens for the concert of his own music in Jordan Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 25.

Quintet for Strings and Piano, Op. 23.
Burgin Quartet and The Composer.
Three Songs:
The Appeal.
Melancholy.
Philomel.
Miss Ehrhart and Mr. Slonimsky.
Concerto for Oboe and Piano.
Leon Goossens and The Composer.
Two Sketches for String Quartet:
By the Tarn.
Jack o' Lantern.
Burgin Quartet.
Piano-Pieces.
The Composer.
Four Songs:
Villanelle du Soir.
Epigram.
Tea-Time.
The Curse.
Miss Ehrhart and Mr. Slonimsky.
Sextet for Three Violins, Viola, Two Violoncellos.
Burgin Quartet, Mr. Langendoen,
The Composer.

From Mr. George Copeland for his final concert of the season in Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26:

Capriccio ..... Scarlatti
Bourrée ..... Bach
Air—Menuet ..... Mattheson
Adagio ..... Grazioli
Gavotte ..... Prokofiev
Scherzo ..... Mendelssohn
La terrasse des audiences au clair de lune—La huerta del vino—Reflets dans l'eau—Les fess sont d'exquises danseuses—Prelude à l'après-midi d'un faune—Minstrels. . . Debussy
Silhouettes Ibériennes (MS) ..... Slonimsky
Aromas de Leyenda
Jota
Imperia
Tango Espagnole—El Polo ..... Albéniz
Tango ..... Grovlez

Items of the Day

It is definitely settled that the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon, March 24, will return to old custom and consist wholly of music from Wagner's operas. Whether there will be assisting singers is as yet undecided.

Discussing the concert-going public in various American cities, Mr. George Engles, the manager, as reported in the New York newspapers, paid this town a compliment:

Of the large metropolitan centers, Boston is perhaps the most genuinely musical. It is one of the few cities which place musicianship above box office appeal.

At Mr. Sanromá's concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a deep-red curtain was let fall within the proscenium arch. The pianist was thus placed well forward upon a small stage. The auditorium was also darkened and a gentle light focussed upon him. It seemed an agreeable arrangement. Nor did the curtain perceptibly deaden sound.

TRANS. FEB 18 '29 H. T. P.

HERALD FEB 19 '29

AT SYMPHONY HALL

At the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the orchestra will be assisted by the Cecilia Society, of which Malcolm Lang is the director. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Cesar Franck's Psalm 150; Roussel's three "Evocations," the third of which calls for a chorus; Schelling's symphonic poem, "Morocco" (conducted by the composer), and the Polovtsian dances with chorus from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The "Evocations," of which "La Ville Rose" has been played in Boston, record Roussel's impressions of a visit to Cochin, China. The themes and coloring of "Morocco" are the result of Mr. Schelling's sojourn in northern Africa.

The fourth Monday night concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place tomorrow at 8:15 P. M. Bach's Brandenburg concerto for violin, two flutes and strings; Liszt's piano concerto No. 2 (Yolanda Mero, pianist); Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra" (after Nietzsche).

Post Feb 17

SCHELLING CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Heard in Own Tone Poem—Cecilia Society in 3 Pieces

The presence of the chorus of the Cecilia Society for participation in three of the four pieces upon the programme and the conducting by Ernest Schelling of his newest orchestral work, the symphonic poem "Morocco," are the things which set this week's pair of Symphony concerts apart from their fellows. In Franck's Psalm 150 for chorus, orchestra and organ; Roussel's three symphonic sketches, collectively entitled "Evocations," and the Polovsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Mr. Koussevitzky was in his accustomed place upon the podium.

SCHELLING'S TONE POEM

As pianist, as composer and as lecturer-conductor in his altogether delightful concerts for children Mr. Schelling is a familiar figure to Boston's musical public, and he was warmly greeted yesterday. His tone-poem, "Morocco," which was having its first Boston performance, has had a curious history. Inspired by a trip to Morocco some years ago it was orginally written in June, 1927, but the score was lost and in September Mr. Schelling reworte the piece and himself conducted its first performance by the Philharmonic Society of New York in December of that year. He has since revised it and by token of his own words as quoted in the programme-book of yesterday, has "changed much."

Mr. Schelling has sought, and with success, to translate into the language of the modern symphonic orchestra the music of the peoples of Morocco. His poem of four connected movements, depicts first and most effectively the dancing of the Culed Nails; a lullaby is succeeded by the tonal picture of a Berber story-teller outside the walls of Fez at sunset, and the fourth and final section, rhythmically exciting, deals with "the working up of the war spirit" among the tribes in the mountain stronghold of El Glaoui.

Cordially Received

Needless to say, Mr. Schelling is not the first who has sought to convey in terms of the symphonic orchestra the atmosphere, the spirit and the native music of Morocco. That in tonal coloring and general effect his impressions of that land should bear a certain generic resemblance to those of others, say of the "Beni Mora" of Gustav Holst twice heard this season from the People's Symphony Orchestra, is not only natural, but undoubtedly an indication of the accuracy and validity of Mr. Schelling's musical reportings. Nor does that fact detract from the excellence of the craftsmanship with which Mr. Schelling has devised his picturings.

The chorus of the Cecilia Society, of which Malcolm Lang is the conductor, was heard first in the opening number upon the programme, the Psalm of Cesar Franck. This music, of the competent musician and cathedral organist rather than of the greater Franck, was first heard at these concerts in the reghme of Mr. Rabaud. For conclusion to the concert came this chorus' stirring, wholly effective singing of the Polovtsian Dance of Borodin, long familiar to Symphony audiences and yesterday received with the wonted enthusiasm.

Symphony Program Change

On account of the additional preparation which Bruckner's Eighth Symphony requires, Mr. Koussevitzky has postponed the performance of this work, and will play it on the Symphony program, March 22-23. The Boston Symphony program for Friday and Saturday, Feb. 22-23, will be as follows: Foote, Suite in E major; Goossens, Rhythmic Dance; Debussy, "Iberia"; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5. MON. FEB 19 '29 as in the Lament of Bach, or to occupy himself with the less significant details or nuance in retarded passages, as in the Adagio of Beethoven's Sonata.

92

TRANS FEB 19 1929 N. M. J.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky has deferred the revival of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony to the concerts of March 22-23. As he did with Sibelius's Third, last autumn, he wishes to draw from it all that the composer would say. Hence the need of longer study and preparation. The only novel piece upon the revised program, printed in this place yesterday, is Mr. Goossens's "Rhythmic Dance," short and graphic.

Bostonian Bloch

Mr. Koussevitzky Makes Converts to the Much-Disputed "America"

IT'S as difficult as it is undesirable to remain disinterested. Listening to Bloch's "America" for the fifth time the other day (on this occasion under Mr. Koussevitzky) we went over to Bloch's camp, with the congenial society of a number of friends, lock, stock and barrel. We are ready to admit plenty of perishable stuff in the score. But when "America" is superbly played, as it then was, the flame of genius in many pages ought to be compelling and obvious. The blazing emotion of Bloch, his fiery sincerity blended with his disciplined and matchless craftsmanship and his unerring sense of color, all unite to lift this score higher in our estimation with each hearing.

If this is showmanship more power to it. To us "America" remains a work with flaws, continually treading on dangerous ground, but proclaiming with genius and sweeping power the unshakable convictions of a man with greatness in his soul. [Hollister Noble in Musical America

AM. FEB 23 - 1929

MUSIC OF RUSSIAN SCHOOL

By MOSES SMITH

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor is the closing and principal portion of this week's Symphony Concerts, which open, appropriately enough, with the Tchaikovskyan Suite in E major by Arthur Foote, Boston composer.

There is more than mere key relationship to make Foote's charming music recall the Russian. The prelude is ingratiating in a manner that Peter Ilyitsch might have employed. The second movement is devoted mostly to pizzicato strings, recalling Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, both in manner and matter. The fugal development of the third movement is, however, of a clarity that the romantic temperament rarely attains. Though the music of this suite is not strikingly original, it charms the ear, it disposes of an agreeable quarter of an hour. It was beautifully played on the holiday.

Goosens' "Rhythmic Dance" was played for the first time in Boston. Since the composer makes no pretentions to beautiful melody he has disarmed the critic. I can merely write that the piece is certainly rhythmic, orchestrated in the current fashion, and contributes its fair share to the vocabulary of dissonance.

The audience applauded the Foote composition mildly, though it was brilliantly performed. It was even less interested in Goosens. And the anti-climax was complete with its feeble response to Debussy's "Iberia." Debussy's Spanish painting in music is not obvious to the general run of concert audiences; nor was Mr. Koussevitsky's reading essentially illuminating.

But everyone woke up during the remarkable performance of the Symphony. It becomes trite to call attention to Mr. Koussevitsky's epic interpretations of the Tchaikovsky "Big Three" symphonies. On this occasion the orchestra was perhaps not so brilliant as it has been in previous performances of this music. But the conductor's conception was all the more penetrating, dynamic, emotionally propulsive. I know of no more sincere and inspired artist than Koussevitsky conducting the orchestra in this fateful work.

Chaikovsky And Debussy Full-Flavored

Afternoon of Familiar Pieces, A Salute to Arthur Foote Along the Way

TRANS FEB. 23. '29

AS the "city of holidays"—a working Westerner made the phrase—Boston was distinctly in evidence at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Outside the upper balcony, which was quickly filled, the audience assembled slowly, unfamiliarly. Here, there and everywhere seats usually occupied stood empty; while to look around was to discover, neighborhood for neighborhood, many strange faces. Out-of-doors, spring was hardly beckoning. Indoors, nothing upon the program was forbidding. Rather it promised that "very favorite" combination—Mr. Koussevitzky and a Symphony of Chaikovsky. As the signs went and as the authorities in such social-musical matters agreed, the triple holiday—for it is presumed to extend through Sunday—had scattered the usual company of the Friday matinée. As some averred, a new article is slipping into that intricate collection of unwritten statutes which is the Bostonian social code. Under this by-law, "it is better" not to be present at a Symphony Concert on a holiday afternoon. As Mr. Will Rogers knows only what he sees in the newspapers, so the reviewer, touching upon matters more or less outside his normal ken, knows only what he hears in the intermission. Musically, however, he can affirm that a truly remarkable performance if Debussy's "Ibéria" was coolly applauded by an audience to whom it was evidently unfamiliar piece; while the rhetorical pause before the coda in the finale of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was signal for premature clapping. Through thirty-seven long years that piece has gone to and fro in the repertory.

For the ninth time, "Ibéria" appeared upon the program for a pair of Symphony Concerts. Since Mr. Fiedler discovered the piece in 1911, not a conductor has overlooked it. True, the Debussyan repertory is not extensive; but the companion "Images" — "Gigues" and "Rondes de Printemps"—deserve more performances than they have received in Boston; while one task, as yet unaccomplished in America, clearly awaits Mr. Koussevitzky—the production, as orchestral-choral piece, with a reader for the spoken scenes, of Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." While he worked at these "Images," Debussy was on the edge of declining years; some even, thinking back to the "Nocturnes," "The Faun" and "The Sea," already descry traces of them; but "St. Sebastian" is unmistakable music of his prime. To the stage it may never return; but in some viable version it warrants place in the concert-hall where all things Debussyan are treasured. Above any conductor now working hereabouts, Mr. Koussevitzky could bring such a performance to pass; while across the river are the Cambridge choirs. In Paris, moreover, a concert version has been tried, not unsuccessfully.

Once, however, the performance of "Ibéria" was under weigh the listener put by these reflections. Conductor and orchestra were weaving the very texture of Debussy's music, jeweling it with his harmonic and instrumental colors, keeping it in motion and life with the play of his rhythms. Through the first and the third divisions they bind together a piece that might otherwise seem formless—an outspread palette of tonal tints. They lend it, besides, a singular quality of suspense. The best-remembering hearer never quite anticipates the course; feels and answers composer, conductor and orchestra preparing the next turn. It was this quality of unexpectedness—and with a repertory piece—that Mr. Koussevitzky infused yesterday into "Ibéria." Therewith it was new and fresh again. He did not tend, as he has sometimes, to dramatize an intrinsically pictorial music. He gave the second division the true illusion—of the lustrous silence of southern nights by sounds remotely traversed. The solo-melody came from nowhere; vanished nowhither; was only beauty piercing stillness. Out of the whole section stirred half-luminous, half-scented, wholly sensuous atmosphere—the poetry of these tones.

In the quick-paced beginning and the quicker-paced finale, it was as though every beat of the rhythm struck sparks, and these sparks, by the Debussyan alchemy, were transmuted into color, instrumental oftener than harmonic. Distributing and shading, the present orchestra, in the wind choir, in the percussion-group, throughout indeed, has seldom seemed more a band of virtuosi. And virtuosi with imagination. For here in "Ibéria" is Debussy altogether impressionistic, by the suggestion of rhythm and color working illusion upon his hearers. "The Sea" is a symphonic structure beside "Ibéria"; the prelude of the faun, a more sensuous tone-poetry; the Nocturnes, of a finer, more elusive imagination. In fact, beside them and the faun-piece, these Spanish impressions are hardly more, outside the second division, than prose. But what a multi-colored, light-footed, quick-witted prose as Mr. Koussevitzky played it! Not for nothing had Debussy twice used the word "alerte" in his stage-directions.

The conductor was as fortunate with his version of Chaikovsky's Symphony and for like reason. Nowhere did he overdo the page before him—which is not to say that he left it characterless. Heretofore with Chaikovsky, there has been reason to suspect that Mr. Koussevitzky over-manipulated here and there; that he prepared too obviously the entrance or the return of a significant motiv; that he over-intensified the contrast of orchestral song with orchestral tumult—all in devoted, but unmeasured, zeal and response. Of these occasional excesses, there was not a trace yesterday upon the Fifth. It can seem, as it then did, the best-conceived and best-accomplished of Chaikovsky's three final Symphonies, broadly human and universal beside the other two. "The Pathetic" is a cry across the night from an individual temperament in high nervous excitement. The Fourth is over-laden with the marchings and counter-marchings of fate à la Russe. The Fifth unfolds an emotional content by no means strange or unmoving upon non-Russian ears; is less conditioned by the composer's "very personal" reactions. The Introduction runs dark, oppressed, foreboding. The ensuing movement pursues relief and release questioningly; droops at last into weariness. The second would gain the solace of beauty; yet is crossed by the foreboding returned. The scherzo-waltz seeks the diversion of gayety—and turns shame-faced as it quests. The fourth upsprings in conquering energy; retrieves out of desolation the motiv of the beginning.

Though he departs from the orthodox formulas—and they counted for more in the 'eighties than they do today—in no other Symphony has Chaikovsky achieved so firm-knit and sustained a whole. Into fulfillment go the emotional design and the musical plan close-linked.

To Honor Debussy

Mr. Koussevitzky Asks Contributions to the Fund for a Monument in Paris

THE program-book at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon contained a note from Mr. Koussevitzky. It speaks for itself, saying:

> I have had the honor to be invited by M. Robert Brussel, the Director of the Association Française d'Expansion et d'Echanges artistiques, to assist a committee, headed by Président d'Honneur: M. G. Doumergue, Président de la République Française and M. André Messager, Membre de l'Institut, Président of the Comité d'Action, to solicit support of all Americans who might be interested in helping to erect a monument in Paris to Claude Debussy.
>
> I am sure that all of you will be glad to express your gratitude to the musical painter who has left us such wonderful pictures in tones.
>
> May I, therefore, suggest that all lovers of Debussy's music make a contribution, however small, so that the music-lovers of Boston may have a part in paying tribute to this great genius for the magic of his art.
>
> If each one gave at least twenty-five cents our contribution to this monument would be of splendid assistance to the committee. A box has been placed in the foyer at Symphony Hall in which gifts may be placed. Should it be more convenient to mail a contribution, kindly make your check payable to the Claude-Debussy Monument Fund and mail to me at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Throughout, as well, Chaikovsky escapes weaknesses of invention. The melody of the slow movement—sounded yesterday by Mr. Böttcher at the first horn as never before within the longest memory—touches beauty, and that beauty, little lessened, holds to the end. There are no forced repetitions, no merely nervous sequences, in the finale. The energy glows, self-maintained. The third movement deceives its melancholy with wisps of waltz. The first escapes technical banalities; attains a weary, restless pathos, beyond aught in the Symphony that is called "Pathetic." In that Symphony a conductor may run emotional riot and no one shall say him nay. In the Fourth he may be as clamant as he chooses when Fate thrusts in and drives. The intervening Fifth asks a less excitable and personal, a graver and loftier, speech. In weariness, in melancholy, with beauty, even in the finale with a certain nobility, Chaikovsky is making a music of life. Above preceding performances, Mr. Koussevitzky felt and conveyed this quality. Overlooking nothing, yet overdoing nothing, he lifted the whole Symphony to this new elevation, this larger eloquence. The orchestra gave him back the utmost richness of tone and plasticity of movement. A whole audience listened rapt.

Two shorter pieces diversified the concert—one, a happy revival; the other an incidental "novelty." The revival brought back Mr. Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for Strings, with the composer in presence. Though he wears his seventy-six years easily—the last of his New-England generation, save only Mr. Chadwick—seldom nowadays does he revisit the concert-hall. The more the pleasure, then, to hear his music warmly applauded and to see the conductor directing those plaudits whither they should go. Mr. Foote, however, kept to his modest place, as one who stores up, smilingly, an agreeable memory. Twenty seasons have not tarnished the skill, suavity, freshness and fancy of his Suite. The final Fugue still runs in light energy; with zest comes full-rounded. The Pizzicati, with the gentle song between, are still pleasing device. The Prelude has courtly flow. A wise composer was Mr. Foote, making his piece. He never exhausted the matter; always he kept the light hand. He diverted himself, and another generation is diverted with him. Not all the re-discoveries from the eighteenth century, which are current fashion, have so many flavors.

Mr. Goossens is a practised composer; out of long experience as conductor well versed in orchestral technique. He has an alert hand for rhythm. He can outturn readily enough a workable musical idea. So furnished, he made briefly the Rhythmic Dance of yesterday. It is neither classic nor romantic, orthodox nor modernist; impressive or boresome—merely good-enough music to fill its seven minutes and have done. Les jeunes, writing or listening, like these amiable sprices—into one ear, out by the other.

H. T. P.

Herald

TURDAY; FEBRUARY 23,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Foote, Suite in E major for string orchestra. Goossens, Rhythmic Dance (first time in Boston). Debussy, "Iberia." Tchaikovsky, Symphony, E minor, No. 5.

It was a pleasure to hear Mr. Foote's Suite again. The audience showed its pleasure by calling the composer to his feet. This music proves that an American composer can be technically skilful without undue consciousness of the fact, and without being dull; that he can show sentiment without a too obvious and catch-penny appeal to his hearers; that he can write as an individual and not as a disciple of this or that foreign master; that he can write effectively without summoning to his aid a huge orchestra containing an army of drums, xylophone, glockenspiel, cymbals, tam-tam and the full power of the organ. This Suite may well be reckoned among the finest compositions by Americans. A musical work is not to be judged chiefly by its length and breadth; nor by the number of instruments employed. There are composers in Europe, as in this country, who can rage and impose orchestrally, but they would make a pitiable showing if they were asked to write a suite for strings alone. Although Mr. Foote's Suite is over 20 years old, it is fresh; it charms today. This cannot be said of certain pieces written within the last five years. Although strange wild fowl have flapped their wings over musical marshes during the last 20 years, Mr. Foote, having watched them with natural and intelligent curiosity, has not envied them their flight.

Mr. Goossens's Rhythmic Dance was first performed at Rochester, N. Y., two years ago next month. Lively rhythm and lively orchestration are the chief features of this unpretentious music by a well-equipped musician, who would undoubtedly be the last to claim for it great significance or importance. It is an agreeable piece, easy to hear, but not one that will cling to the memory even by rhythm to which the title calls attention.

It is doubtful whether what might be called a miscellaneous audience would or could be quick to appreciate the many exquisite details of Debussy's "Iberia." Say the word "Spanish" in connection with music, and nine out of ten think of a strongly defined, intoxicating, heel-and-toe tune. Subtle hints at the dance music of Spain are lost to them. There is disappointment that the hint is not followed by the rhythmic and highly colored statement hammered out. And what is Mr. Gradgrind to make of "The Odors of The Night"? No more than of Whitman's apostrophe to the "bare-bos'om'd night, Night of south winds, night of the large few stars!

Still nodding night—mad, naked summer night."

Would he not say, "Why 'large few stars'; why not 'few large stars'?" and laugh fatuously?

Debussy's "Iberia" is not a musical Baedeker. Havelock Ellis has written with understanding of the soul of Spain. Debussy also knew that soul.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was poetic. Appreciating the many impressionistic details he did not emphasize them so as to destroy the prevailing subdued romanticism, nor did he vulgarize the joyous street and festival measures by over-insistence.

Mr. Ernest Newman in an acute examination of Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony wrote: "I can find no trace of a program in the Fourth symphony; but with the fifth and sixth we step upon quite unmistakable ground." Mr. Newman forgot that Tchaikovsky wrote a long program for his fourth symphony and sent it to Mme. Meck. This program has often been published. It is said that Tchaikovsky had a definite program in mind for his sixth, but could not be persuaded to divulge it. Every composer of a symphony has no doubt an aesthetic as well as a technical plan when he girds up his loins to write; but does this fifth symphony require a verbal and extensive argument? Is not the symphony the self-torturing composer, Tchaikovsky himself, with his moods of darkness, his moods of gaiety soon clouded and turned to sadness? Mr. Koussevitzky rightly saw and heard the symphony as a dramatic poem, with tragic episodes, ending in triumphant exaltation in the jubilant transformation of the early theme that dripped melancholy. Tschaikovsky could scream; Mr. Koussevitzky rightly saw and heard despair. Tschaikovsky had longings not to be fulfilled; Mr. Koussevitzky gave eloquence to these longings. When Tschaikovsky was in the depths of despair, Mr. Koussevitzky let him sob and wail. Thus was Mr. Koussevitzky, not hampered by the coldness, the inexpressiveness of the printed page, alive and sympathetic to the composer's emotions which are only feebly expressed by mere notes; emotions which are beyond the understanding of literal, pedestrian conductors.

The performance was of overwhelming effect. No wonder that conductor and orchestra were wildly applauded at the end. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of next week is as follows: Frederick the Great, Symphony, D major, No. 3. Janin, Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia." Sibelius, Violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist). Mousbition.

as in the Lament of Bach, or to occupy himself with the less significant details or nuance in retarded passages, as in the Adagio of Beethoven's Sonata. N. M. J.

TRANS FEB 19 1929

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky has deferred the revival of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony to the concerts of March 22-23. As he did with Sibelius's Third, last autumn, he wishes to draw from it all that the composer would say. Hence the need of longer study and preparation. The only novel piece upon the revised program, printed in this place yesterday, is Mr. Goossens's "Rhythmic Dance," short and graphic.

Bostonian Bloch

Mr. Koussevitzky Makes Converts to the Much-Disputed "America"

IT'S as difficult as it is undesirable to remain disinterested. Listening to Bloch's "America" for the fifth time the other day (on this occasion under Mr. Koussevitzky) we went over to Bloch's camp, with the congenial society of a number of friends, lock, stock and barrel. We are ready to admit plenty of perishable stuff in the score. But when "America" is superbly played, as it then was, the flame of genius in many pages ought to be compelling and obvious. The blazing emotion of Bloch, his fiery sincerity blended with his disciplined and matchless craftsmanship and his unerring sense of color, all unite to lift this score higher in our estimation with each hearing.

If this is showmanship more power to it. To us "America" remains a work with flaws, continually treading on dangerous ground, but proclaiming with genius and sweeping power the unshakable convictions of a man with greatness in his soul. [Hollister Noble in Musical America

AM. FEB 23 - 1929

MUSIC OF RUSSIAN SCHOOL

By MOSES SMITH

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor is the closing and principal portion of this week's Symphony Concerts, which open, appropriately enough, with the Tchaikovskyan Suite in E major by Arthur Foote, Boston composer.

There is more than mere key relationship to make Foote's charming music recall the Russian. The prelude is ingratiating in a manner that Peter Ilyitsch might have employed. The second movement is devoted mostly to pizzicato strings, recalling Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, both in manner and matter. The fugal development of the third movement is, however, of a clarity that the romantic temperament rarely attains. Though the music of this suite is not strikingly original, it charms the ear, it disposes of an agreeable quarter of an hour. It was beautifully played on the holiday.

Goosens' "Rhythmic Dance" was played for the first time in Boston. Since the composer makes no pretentions to beautiful melody he has disarmed the critic. I can merely write that the piece is certainly rhythmic, orchestrated in the current fashion, and contributes its fair share to the vocabulary of dissonance.

The audience applauded the Foote composition mildly, though it was brilliantly performed. It was even less interested in Goosens. And the anti-climax was complete with its feeble response to Debussy's "Iberia." Debussy's Spanish painting in music is not obvious to the general run of concert audiences; nor was Mr. Koussevitsky's reading essentially illuminating.

But everyone woke up during the remarkable performance of the Symphony. It becomes trite to call attention to Mr. Koussevitsky's epic interpretations of the Tchaikovsky "Big Three" symphonies. On this occasion the orchestra was perhaps not so brilliant as it has been in previous performances of this music. But the conductor's conception was all the more penetrating, dynamic, emotionally propulsive. I know of no more sincere and inspired artist than Koussevitsky conducting the orchestra in this fateful work.

Chaikovsky And Debussy Full-Flavored

Afternoon of Familiar Pieces, A Salute to Arthur Foote Along the Way

TRANS — FEB. 23. '29

AS the "city of holidays"—a working Westerner made the phrase—Boston was distinctly in evidence at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Outside the upper balcony, which was quickly filled, the audience assembled slowly, unfamiliarly. Here, there and everywhere seats usually occupied stood empty; while to look around was to discover, neighborhood for neighborhood, many strange faces. Out-of-doors, spring was hardly beckoning. Indoors, nothing upon the program was forbidding. Rather it promised that "very favorite" combination—Mr. Koussevitzky and a Symphony of Chaikovsky. As the signs went and as the authorities in such social-musical matters agreed, the triple holiday—for it is presumed to extend through Sunday—had scattered the usual company of the Friday matinée. As some averred, a new article is slipping into that intricate collection of unwritten statutes which is the Bostonian social code. Under this by-law, "it is better" not to be present at a Symphony Concert on a holiday afternoon. As Mr. Will Rogers knows only what he sees in the newspapers, so the reviewer, touching upon matters more or less outside his normal ken, knows only what he hears in the intermission. Musically, however, he can affirm that a truly remarkable performance if Debussy's "Ibéria" was coolly applauded by an audience to whom it was evidently unfamiliar piece; while the rhetorical pause before the coda in the finale of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was signal for premature clapping. Through thirty-seven long years that piece has gone to and fro in the repertory.

For the ninth time, "Ibéria" appeared upon the program for a pair of Symphony Concerts. Since Mr. Fiedler discovered the piece in 1911, not a conductor has overlooked it. True, the Debussyan repertory is not extensive; but the companion "Images" — "Gigues" and "Rondes de Printemps"—deserve more performances than they have received in Boston; while one task, as yet unaccomplished in America, clearly awaits Mr. Koussevitzky—the production, as orchestral-choral piece, with a reader for the spoken scenes, of Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." While he worked at these "Images," Debussy was on the edge of declining years; some even, thinking back to the "Nocturnes," "The Faun" and "The Sea," already descry traces of them; but "St. Sebastian" is unmistakable music of his prime. To the stage it may never return; but in some viable version it warrants place in the concert-hall where all things Debussyan are treasured. Above any conductor now working hereabouts, Mr. Koussevitzky could bring such a performance to pass; while across the river are the Cambridge choirs. In Paris, moreover, a concert version has been tried, not unsuccessfully.

Once, however, the performance of "Ibéria" was under weigh the listener put by these reflections. Conductor and orchestra were weaving the very texture of Debussy's music, jeweling it with his harmonic and instrumental colors, keeping it in motion and life with the play of his rhythms. Through the first and the third divisions they bind together a piece that might otherwise seem formless—an outspread palette of tonal tints. They lend it, besides, a singular quality of suspense. The best-remembering hearer never quite anticipates the course; feels and answers composer, conductor and orchestra preparing the next turn. It was this quality of unexpectedness—and with a repertory piece—that Mr. Koussevitzky infused yesterday into "Ibéria." Therewith it was new and fresh again. He did not tend, as he has sometimes, to dramatize an intrinsically pictorial music. He gave the second division the true illusion—of the lustrous silence of southern nights by sounds remotely traversed. The solo-melody came from nowhere: vanished nowhither; was only beauty piercing stillness. Out of the whole section stirred half-luminous, half-scented, wholly sensuous atmosphere—the poetry of these tones.

In the quick-paced beginning and the quicker-paced finale, it was as though every beat of the rhythm struck sparks, and these sparks, by the Debussyan alchemy, were transmuted into color, instrumental oftener than harmonic. Distributing and shading, the present orchestra, in the wind choir, in the percussion-group, throughout indeed, has seldom seemed more a band of virtuosi. And virtuosi with imagination. For here in "Ibéria" is Debussy altogether impressionistic, by the suggestion of rhythm and color working illusion upon his hearers. "The Sea" is a symphonic structure beside "Ibéria"; the prelude of the faun, a more sensuous tone-poetry; the Nocturnes, of a finer, more elusive imagination. In fact, beside them and the faun-piece, these Spanish impressions are hardly more, outside the second division, than prose. But what a multi-colored, light-footed, quick-witted prose as Mr. Koussevitzky played it! Not for nothing had Debussy twice used the word "alerte" in his stage-directions.

The conductor was as fortunate with his version of Chaikovsky's Symphony and for like reason. Nowhere did he overdo the page before him—which is not to say that he left it characterless. Heretofore with Chaikovsky, there has been reason to suspect that Mr. Koussevitzky over-manipulated here and there; that he prepared too obviously the entrance or the return of a significant motiv; that he over-intensified the contrast of orchestral song with orchestral tumult—all in devoted, but unmeasured, zeal and response. Of these occasional excesses, there was not a trace yesterday upon the Fifth. It can seem, as it then did, the best-conceived and best-accomplished of Chaikovsky's three final Symphonies, broadly human and universal beside the other two. "The Pathetic" is a cry across the night from an individual temperament in high nervous excitement. The Fourth is over-laden with the marchings and counter-marchings of fate à la Russe. The Fifth unfolds an emotional content by no means strange or unmoving upon non-Russian ears; is less conditioned by the composer's "very personal" reactions. The Introduction runs dark, oppressed, foreboding. The ensuing movement pursues relief and release questioningly; droops at last into weariness. The second would gain the solace of beauty; yet is crossed by the foreboding returned. The scherzo-waltz seeks the diversion of gayety—and turns shame-faced as it quests. The fourth upsprings in conquering energy; retrieves out of desolation the motiv of the beginning.

Though he departs from the orthodox formulas—and they counted for more in the 'eighties than they do today—in no other Symphony has Chaikovsky achieved so firm-knit and sustained a whole. Into fulfillment go the emotional design and the musical plan close-linked.

Throughout, as well, Chaikovsky escapes weaknesses of invention. The melody of the slow movement—sounded yesterday by Mr. Böttcher at the first horn as never before within the longest memory—touches beauty, and that beauty, little lessened, holds to the end. There are no forced repetitions, no merely nervous sequences, in the finale. The energy glows, self-maintained. The third movement deceives its melancholy with wisps of waltz. The first escapes technical banalities; attains a weary, restless pathos, beyond aught in the Symphony that is called "Pathetic." In that Symphony a conductor may run emotional riot and no one shall say him nay. In the Fourth he may be as clamant as he chooses when Fate thrusts in and drives. The intervening Fifth asks a less excitable and personal, a graver and loftier, speech. In weariness, in melancholy, with beauty, even in the finale with a certain nobility, Chaikovsky is making a music of life. Above preceding performances, Mr. Koussevitzky felt and conveyed this quality. Overlooking nothing, yet overdoing nothing, he lifted the whole Symphony to this new elevation, this larger eloquence. The orchestra gave him back the utmost richness of tone and plasticity of movement. A whole audience listened rapt.

Two shorter pieces diversified the concert—one, a happy revival; the other an incidental "novelty." The revival brought back Mr. Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for Strings, with the composer in presence. Though he wears his seventy-six years easily—the last of his New-England generation, save only Mr. Chadwick—seldom nowadays does he revisit the concert-hall. The more the pleasure, then, to hear his music warmly applauded and to see the conductor directing those plaudits whither they should go. Mr. Foote, however, kept to his modest place, as one who stores up, smilingly, an agreeable memory. Twenty seasons have not tarnished the skill, suavity, freshness and fancy of his Suite. The final Fugue still runs in light energy; with zest comes full-rounded. The Pizzicati, with the gentle song between, are still pleasing device. The Prelude has courtly flow. A wise composer was Mr. Foote, making his piece. He never exhausted the matter; always he kept the light hand. He diverted himself, and another generation is diverted with him. Not all the re-discoveries from the eighteenth century, which are current fashion, have so many flavors.

Mr. Goossens is a practised composer; out of long experience as conductor well versed in orchestral technique. He has an alert hand for rhythm. He can outturn readily enough a workable musical idea. So furnished, he made briefly the Rhythmic Dance of yesterday. It is neither classic nor romantic, orthodox or modernist; impressive or boresome—merely good-enough music to fill its seven minutes and have done. Les jeunes, writing or listening, like these amiable caprices—into one ear, out by the other.

H. T. P.

To Honor Debussy

Mr. Koussevitzky Asks Contributions to the Fund for a Monument in Paris

THE program-book at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon contained a note from Mr. Koussevitzky. It speaks for itself, saying:

> I have had the honor to be invited by M. Robert Brussel, the Director of the Association Française d'Expansion et d'Echanges artistiques, to assist a committee, headed by Président d'Honneur: M. G. Doumergue, Président de la République Française and M. André Messager, Membre de l'Institut, Président of the Comité d'Action, to solicit support of all Americans who might be interested in helping to erect a monument in Paris to Claude Debussy.
>
> I am sure that all of you will be glad to express your gratitude to the musical painter who has left us such wonderful pictures in tones.
>
> May I, therefore, suggest that all lovers of Debussy's music make a contribution, however small, so that the music-lovers of Boston may have a part in paying tribute to this great genius for the magic of his art.
>
> If each one gave at least twenty-five cents our contribution to this monument would be of splendid assistance to the committee. A box has been placed in the foyer at Symphony Hall in which gifts may be placed. Should it be more convenient to mail a contribution, kindly make your check payable to the Claude-Debussy Monument Fund and mail to me at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Herald

TURDAY; FEBRUARY 23,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Foote, Suite in E major for string orchestra. Goossens, Rhythmic Dance (first time in Boston). Debussy, "Iberia." Tchaikovsky, Symphony, E minor, No. 5.

It was a pleasure to hear Mr. Foote's Suite again. The audience showed its pleasure by calling the composer to his feet. This music proves that an American composer can be technically skilful without undue consciousness of the fact, and without being dull; that he can show sentiment without a too obvious and catch-penny appeal to his hearers; that he can write as an individual and not as a disciple of this or that foreign master; that he can write effectively without summoning to his aid a huge orchestra containing an army of drums, xylophone, glockenspiel, cymbals, tam-tam and the full power of the organ. This Suite may well be reckoned among the finest compositions by Americans. A musical work is not to be judged chiefly by its length and breadth; nor by the number of instruments employed. There are composers in Europe, as in this country, who can rage and impose orchestrally, but they would make a pitiable showing if they were asked to write a suite for strings alone. Although Mr. Foote's Suite is over 20 years old, it is fresh; it charms today. This cannot be said of certain pieces written within the last five years. Although strange wild fowl have flapped their wings over musical marshes during the last 20 years, Mr. Foote, having watched them with natural and intelligent curiosity, has not envied them their flight.

Mr. Goossens's Rhythmic Dance was first performed at Rochester, N. Y., two years ago next month. Lively rhythm and lively orchestration are the chief features of this unpretentious music by a well-equipped musician, who would undoubtedly be the last to claim for it great significance or importance. It is an agreeable piece, easy to hear, but not one that will cling to the memory even by rhythm to which the title calls attention.

It is doubtful whether what might be called a miscellaneous audience would or could be quick to appreciate the many exquisite details of Debussy's "Iberia." Say the word "Spanish" in connection with music, and nine out of ten think of a strongly defined, intoxicating, heel-and-toe tune. Subtle hints at the dance music of Spain are lost to them. There is disappointment that the hint is not followed by the rhythmic and highly colored statement hammered out. And what is Mr. Gradgrind to make of "The Odors of The Night"? No more than of Whitman's apostrophe to the "bare-bos'om'd night, Night of south winds, night of the large few stars!

Still nodding night—mad, naked summer night."

Would he not say, "Why 'large few stars'; why not, 'few large stars'?" and laugh fatuously?

Debussy's "Iberia" is not a musical Baedeker. Havelock Ellis has written with understanding of the soul of Spain. Debussy also knew that soul.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was poetic. Appreciating the many impressionistic details he did not emphasize them so as to destroy the prevailing subdued romanticism, nor did he vulgarize the joyous street and festival measures by over-insistence.

Mr. Ernest Newman in an acute examination of Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony wrote: "I can find no trace of a program in the Fourth symphony; but with the fifth and sixth we step upon quite unmistakable ground." Mr. Newman forgot that Tchaikovsky wrote a long program for his fourth symphony and sent it to Mme. Meck. This program has often been published. It is said that Tchaikovsky had a definite program in mind for his sixth, but could not be persuaded to divulge it. Every composer of a symphony has no doubt an aesthetic as well as a technical plan when he girds up his loins to write; but does this fifth symphony require a verbal and extensive argument? Is not the symphony the self-torturing composer, Tchaikovsky himself, with his moods of darkness, his moods of gaiety soon clouded and turned to sadness? Mr. Koussevitzky rightly saw and heard the symphony as a dramatic poem, with tragic episodes, ending in triumphant exaltation in the jubilant transformation of the early theme that dripped melancholy. Tschaikovsky could scream; Mr. Koussevitzky rightly saw and heard despair. Tschaikovsky had longings not to be fulfilled; Mr. Koussevitzky gave eloquence to these longings. When Tschaikovsky was in the depths of despair, Mr. Koussevitzky let him sob and wail. Thus was Mr. Koussevitzky, not hampered by the coldness, the inexpressiveness of the printed page, alive and sympathetic to the composer's emotions which are only feebly expressed by mere notes; emotions which are beyond the understanding of literal, pedestrian conductors.

The performance was of overwhelming effect. No wonder that conductor and orchestra were wildly applauded at the end. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of next week is as follows: Frederick the Great, Symphony, D major, No. 3. Janin, Symphonie Spirituelle. "Alleluia." Sibelius, Violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist). Mous-

...bition.

920

as in the Lament of Bach, or to cure himself with the less significant details or nuance in retarded passages, as in the Adagio of Beethoven's Sonata. N. M. J.

TRANS FEB 19 1929

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky has deferred the revival of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony to the concerts of March 22-23. As he did with Sibelius's Third, last autumn, he wishes to draw from it all that the composer would say. Hence the need of longer study and preparation. The only novel piece upon the revised program, printed in this place yesterday, is Mr. Goossens's "Rhythmic Dance," short and graphic.

Bostonian Bloch

Mr. Koussevitzky Makes Converts to the Much-Disputed "America"

IT'S as difficult as it is undesirable to remain disinterested. Listening to Bloch's "America" for the fifth time the other day (on this occasion under Mr. Koussevitzky) we went over to Bloch's camp, with the congenial society of a number of friends, lock, stock and barrel. We are ready to admit plenty of perishable stuff in the score. But when "America" is superbly played, as it then was, the flame of genius in many pages ought to be compelling and obvious. The blazing emotion of Bloch, his fiery sincerity blended with his disciplined and matchless craftsmanship and his unerring sense of color, all unite to lift this score higher in our estimation with each hearing.

If this is showmanship more power to it. To us "America" remains a work with flaws, continually treading on dangerous ground, but proclaiming with genius and sweeping power the unshakable convictions of a man with greatness in his soul. [Hollister Noble in Musical America

AM. FEB 23 - 1929

MUSIC OF RUSSIAN SCHOOL

By MOSES SMITH

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor is the closing and principal portion of this week's Symphony Concerts, which open, appropriately enough, with the Tchaikovskyan Suite in E major by Arthur Foote, Boston composer.

There is more than mere key relationship to make Foote's charming music recall the Russian. The prelude is ingratiating in a manner that Peter Ilyitsch might have employed. The second movement is devoted mostly to pizzicato strings, recalling Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, both in manner and matter. The fugal development of the third movement is, however, of a clarity that the romantic temperament rarely attains. Though the music of this suite is not strikingly original, it charms the ear, it disposes of an agreeable quarter of an hour. It was beautifully played on the holiday.

Goosens' "Rhythmic Dance" was played for the first time in Boston. Since the composer makes no pretentions to beautiful melody he has disarmed the critic. I can merely write that the piece is certainly rhythmic, orchestrated in the current fashion, and contributes its fair share to the vocabulary of dissonance.

The audience applauded the Foote composition mildly, though it was brilliantly performed. It was even less interested in Goosens. And the anti-climax was complete with its feeble response to Debussy's "Iberia." Debussy's Spanish painting in music is not obvious to the general run of concert audiences; nor was Mr. Koussevitsky's reading essentially illuminating.

But everyone woke up during the remarkable performance of the Symphony. It becomes trite to call attention to Mr. Koussevitsky's epic interpretations of the Tchaikovsky "Big Three" symphonies. On this occasion the orchestra was perhaps not so brilliant as it has been in previous performances of this music. But the conductor's conception was all the more penetrating, dynamic, emotionally propulsive. I know of no more sincere and inspired artist than Koussevitsky conducting the orchestra in this fateful work.

Chaikovsky And Debussy Full-Flavored

Afternoon of Familiar Pieces, A Salute to Arthur Foote Along the Way

TRANS—FEB. 23.'29

AS the "city of holidays"—a working Westerner made the phrase—Boston was distinctly in evidence at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Outside the upper balcony, which was quickly filled, the audience assembled slowly, unfamiliarly. Here, there and everywhere seats usually occupied stood empty; while to look around was to discover, neighborhood for neighborhood, many strange faces. Out-of-doors, spring was hardly beckoning. Indoors, nothing upon the program was forbidding. Rather it promised that "very favorite" combination—Mr. Koussevitzky and a Symphony of Chaikovsky. As the signs went and as the authorities in such social-musical matters agreed, the triple holiday—for it is presumed to extend through Sunday—had scattered the usual company of the Friday matinée. As some averred, a new article is slipping into that intricate collection of unwritten statutes which is the Bostonian social code. Under this by-law, "it is better" not to be present at a Symphony Concert on a holiday afternoon. As Mr. Will Rogers knows only what he sees in the newspapers, so the reviewer, touching upon matters more or less outside his normal ken, knows only what he hears in the intermission. Musically, however, he can affirm that a truly remarkable performance if Debussy's "Ibéria" was coolly applauded by an audience to whom it was evidently unfamiliar piece; while the rhetorical pause before the coda in the finale of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was signal for premature clapping. Through thirty-seven long years that piece has gone to and fro in the repertory.

For the ninth time, "Ibéria" appeared upon the program for a pair of Symphony Concerts. Since Mr. Fiedler discovered the piece in 1911, not a conductor has overlooked it. True, the Debussyan repertory is not extensive; but the companion "Images" — "Gigues" and "Rondes de Printemps"—deserve more performances than they have received in Boston; while one task, as yet unaccomplished in America, clearly awaits Mr. Koussevitzky—the production, as orchestral-choral piece, with a reader for the spoken scenes, of Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." While he worked at these "Images," Debussy was on the edge of declining years; some even, thinking back to the "Nocturnes," "The Faun" and "The Sea," already descry traces of them; but "St. Sebastian" is unmistakable music of his prime. To the stage it may never return; but in some viable version it warrants place in the concert-hall where all things Debussyan are treasured. Above any conductor now working hereabouts, Mr. Koussevitzky could bring such a performance to pass; while across the river are the Cambridge choirs. In Paris, moreover, a concert version has been tried, not unsuccessfully.

Once, however, the performance of "Ibéria" was under weigh the listener put by these reflections. Conductor and orchestra were weaving the very texture of Debussy's music, jeweling it with his harmonic and instrumental colors, keeping it in motion and life with the play of his rhythms. Through the first and the third divisions they bind together a piece that might otherwise seem formless—an outspread palette of tonal tints. They lend it, besides, a singular quality of suspense. The best-remembering hearer never quite anticipates the course; feels and answers composer, conductor and orchestra preparing the next turn. It was this quality of unexpectedness—and with a repertory piece—that Mr. Koussevitzky infused yesterday into "Ibéria." Therewith it was new and fresh again. He did not tend, as he has sometimes, to dramatize an intrinsically pictorial music. He gave the second division the true illusion—of the lustrous silence of southern nights by sounds remotely traversed. The solo-melody came from nowhere; vanished nowhither; was only beauty piercing stillness. Out of the whole section stirred half-luminous, half-scented, wholly sensuous atmosphere—the poetry of these tones.

In the quick-paced beginning and the quicker-paced finale, it was as though every beat of the rhythm struck sparks, and these sparks, by the Debussyan alchemy, were transmuted into color, instrumental oftener than harmonic. Distributing and shading, the present orchestra, in the wind choir, in the percussion-group, throughout indeed, has seldom seemed more a band of virtuosi. And virtuosi with imagination. For here in "Ibéria" is Debussy altogether impressionistic, by the suggestion of rhythm and color working illusion upon his hearers. "The Sea" is a symphonic structure beside "Ibéria"; the prelude of the faun, a more sensuous tone-poetry; the Nocturnes, of a finer, more elusive imagination. In fact, beside them and the faun-piece, these Spanish impressions are hardly more, outside the second division, than prose. But what a multi-colored, light-footed, quick-witted prose as Mr. Koussevitzky played it! Not for nothing had Debussy twice used the word

To Honor Debussy

Mr. Koussevitzky Asks Contributions to the Fund for a Monument in Paris

THE program-book at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon contained a note from Mr. Koussevitzky. It speaks for itself, saying:

> I have had the honor to be invited by M. Robert Brussel, the Director of the Association Française d'Expansion et d'Echanges artistiques, to assist a committee, headed by Président d'Honneur: M. G. Doumergue, Président de la République Française and M. André Messager, Membre de l'Institut, Président of the Comité d'Action, to solicit support of all Americans who might be interested in helping to erect a monument in Paris to Claude Debussy.
>
> I am sure that all of you will be glad to express your gratitude to the musical painter who has left us such wonderful pictures in tones.
>
> May I, therefore, suggest that all lovers of Debussy's music make a contribution, however small, so that the music-lovers of Boston may have a part in paying tribute to this great genius for the magic of his art.
>
> If each one gave at least twenty-five cents our contribution to this monument would be of splendid assistance to the committee. A box has been placed in the foyer at Symphony Hall in which gifts may be placed. Should it be more convenient to mail a contribution, kindly make your check payable to the Claude-Debussy Monument Fund and mail to me at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Throughout, as well, Chaikovsky escapes weaknesses of invention. The melody of the slow movement—sounded yesterday by Mr. Böttcher at the first horn as never before within the longest memory—touches beauty, and that beauty, little lessened, holds to the end. There are no forced repetitions, no merely nervous sequences, in the finale. The energy glows, self-maintained. The third movement deceives its melancholy with wisps of waltz. The first escapes technical banalities; attains a weary, restless pathos, beyond aught in the Symphony that is called "Pathetic." In that Symphony a conductor may run emotional riot and no one shall say him nay. In the Fourth he may be as clamant as he chooses when Fate thrusts in and drives. The intervening Fifth asks a less excitable and personal, a graver and loftier, speech. In weariness, in melancholy, with beauty, even in the finale with a certain nobility, Chaikovsky is making a music of life. Above preceding performances, Mr. Koussevitzky felt and conveyed this quality. Overlooking nothing, yet overdoing nothing, he lifted the whole Symphony to this new elevation, this larger eloquence. The orchestra gave him back the utmost richness of tone and plasticity of movement. A whole audience listened rapt.

Two shorter pieces diversified the concert—one, a happy revival; the other an incidental "novelty." The revival brought back Mr. Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for Strings, with the composer in presence. Though he wears his seventy-six years easily—the last of his New-England generation, save only Mr. Chadwick—seldom nowadays does he revisit the concert-hall. The more the pleasure, then, to hear his music warmly applauded and to see the conductor directing those

Frankfort citizens in town meeting ha accepted an offer by the Brenci & El Company of Peekskill, N. Y., to pay $200 in lieu of all back taxes, amounting t $2800, on the Mount Waldo granite qua ries, and it is understood that these, th largest quarries of the kind in the cou try, may be opened this season to supp material for large contracts in New Yor city and elsewhere. The quarries ha

California, why Mr. Hoover goes to Florida ca

$200.00 Will be required to be paid in cash by the purchaser at the time and place of sale. Other terms to be announced at the time and place of sale.

DR. NATHAN BEN-NATHAN
Assignee and present holder of mortgage.

February 21, 1929.

From the office of:
PARSONS & FLANDERS.

Herald

TURDAY; FEBRUARY 23,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Foote, Suite in E major for string orchestra. Goossens, Rhythmic Dance (first time in Boston). Debussy, "Iberia." Tchaikovsky, Symphony, E minor, No. 5.

It was a pleasure to hear Mr. Foote's Suite again. The audience showed its pleasure by calling the composer to his feet. This music proves that an American composer can be technically skilful without undue consciousness of the fact, and without being dull; that he can show sentiment without a too obvious and catch-penny appeal to his hearers; that he can write as an individual and not as a disciple of this or that foreign master; that he can write effectively without summoning to his aid a huge orchestra containing an army of drums, xylophone, glockenspiel, cymbals, tam-tam and the full power of the organ. This Suite may well be reckoned among the finest compositions by Americans. A musical work is not to be judged chiefly by its length and breadth; nor by the number of instruments employed. There are composers in Europe, as in this country, who can rage and impose orchestrally, but they would make a pitiable showing if they were asked to write a suite for strings alone. Although Mr. Foote's Suite is over 20 years old, it is fresh; it charms today. This cannot be said of certain pieces written within the last five years. Although strange wild fowl have flapped their wings over musical marshes during the last 20 years, Mr. Foote, having watched them with natural and intelligent curiosity, has not envied them their flight.

Mr. Goossens's Rhythmic Dance was first performed at Rochester, N. Y., two years ago next month. Lively rhythm and lively orchestration are the chief features of this unpretentious music by a well-equipped musician, who would undoubtedly be the last to claim for it great significance or importance. It is an agreeable piece, easy to hear, but not one that will cling to the memory even by rhythm to which the title calls attention.

It is doubtful whether what might be called a miscellaneous audience would or could be quick to appreciate the many exquisite details of Debussy's "Iberia." Say the word "Spanish" in connection with music, and nine out of ten think of a strongly defined, intoxicating, heel-and-toe tune. Subtle hints at the dance music of Spain are lost to them. There is disappointment that the hint is not followed by the rhythmic and highly colored statement hammered out. And what is Mr. Gradgrind to make of "The Odors of The Night"? No more than of Whitman's apostrophe to the "bare-bos'om'd night, Night of south winds, night of the large few stars!

Still nodding night—mad, naked summer night."

Would he not say, "Why 'large few stars'; why not 'few large stars'?" and laugh fatuously?

Debussy's "Iberia" is not a musical Baedeker. Havelock Ellis has written with understanding of the soul of Spain. Debussy also knew that soul.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was poetic. Appreciating the many impressionistic details he did not emphasize them so as to destroy the prevailing subdued romanticism, nor did he vulgarize the joyous street and festival measures by over-insistence.

Mr. Ernest Newman in an acute examination of Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony wrote: "I can find no trace of a program in the Fourth symphony; but with the fifth and sixth we step upon quite unmistakable ground." Mr. Newman forgot that Tchaikovsky wrote a long program for his fourth symphony and sent it to Mme. Meck. This program has often been published. It is said that Tchaikovsky had a definite program in mind for his sixth, but could not be persuaded to divulge it. Every composer of a symphony has no doubt an aesthetic as well as a technical plan when he girds up his loins to write; but does this fifth symphony require a verbal and extensive argument? Is not the symphony the self-torturing composer, Tchaikovsky himself, with his moods of darkness, his moods of gaiety soon clouded and turned to sadness? Mr. Koussevitzky rightly saw and heard the symphony as a dramatic poem, with tragic episodes, ending in triumphant exaltation in the jubilant transformation of the early theme that dripped melancholy. Tschaikovsky could scream; Mr. Koussevitzky rightly saw and heard despair. Tschaikovsky had longings not to be fulfilled; Mr. Koussevitzky gave eloquence to these longings. When Tschaikovsky was in the depths of despair, Mr. Koussevitzky let him sob and wail. Thus was Mr. Koussevitzky, not hampered by the coldness, the inexpressiveness of the printed page, alive and sympathetic to the composer's emotions which are only feebly expressed by mere notes; emotions which are beyond the understanding of literal, pedestrian conductors.

The performance was of overwhelming effect. No wonder that conductor and orchestra were wildly applauded at the end. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of next week is as follows: Frederick the Great, Symphony, D major, No. 3. Janin, Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia." Sibelius, Violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist). Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures at an Exhibition.

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Foote, Goossens, Debussy and Tchaikovsky

Koussevitzky Gives Brilliant Reading of Tchaikovsky

Globe Feb 23 '29

Mr Koussevitzky, having postponed until next month the performance of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, substituted a varied program for yesterday's Symphony concert. It began as originally planned with Arthur Foote's Suite in E major. The other numbers were a new "Rhythmic Dance" by Eugene Goossens; Debussy's "Iberia"; and Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony. Mr Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky was remarkably brilliant, one of the finest performances he has ever conducted in Boston of anything.

Mr Foote's Suite for Strings, opus 63, first played at these concerts in 1909, was repeated in 1921 and in 1925. It is well written, unpretentious music, light in character despite a fugue finale, original without any striving for modernity. The audience plainly enjoyed an excellent performance. The composer bowed repeatedly from his place in the audience.

Of Mr Goossens' music there will be occasion to write at length next week when he offers a program of his chamber pieces at Jordan Hall. The "Rhythmic Dance" heard yesterday was first performed at Rochester, N Y, in 1927 by the orchestra of which he is the conductor. It is lively light music by a man who writes with unforced ease in the idiom of his own day, a piece Mr Casella might easily popularize with the audiences at the Pop concerts.

The programs yesterday contained a slip asking those Bostonians who love Debussy's music to contribute to a fund now being raised to erect a statue to him in Paris. Mr Koussevitzky requests that small contributions be deposited in a box placed for the purpose in the foyer of Symphony Hall. Or checks may be mailed to him.

Debussy is now, therefore, to be considered as a classic composer, not as the dangerous modernist he seemed to most musicians 30 years ago. It is hard to see why his "Iberia," again dramatically interpreted by Mr Koussevitzky yesterday, should have been accused of exaggerated impressionism when it was new in 1910. Critics could find in it nothing but rhythm well defined. They thought it had no melodic design, no carefully woven harmonic web, that it was a riot of tonal color.

Yesterday the melodious outline was clear, the harmony no longer baffling. One admired the restraint and skill with which Debussy secured his effects without ever writing a superfluous note. The texture of the music seemed firm. Only in the titles of the three sections, "In streets and byways," "The fragrance of night," and "A holiday morning" could one find impressionism. And in giving such titles to music perfectly well able to make its way without their aid, Debussy was only following the fashion of his day, a fashion now happily passing.

No other conductor known here can equal Koussevitzky in the music of Tchaikovsky, as the remarkable performance of the Fifth Symphony yesterday again proved. The subtlety and restraint with which he moulded melodies that verge on banality so as to lend them a nobility one cannot quite believe really inherent in them; the flexibility and intensity with which he built up rhythms that might have seemed monotonous and disjointed into imposing and intricate musical patterns; the zest with which he revealed the sonority and variety Tchaikovsky often contrived to give his scoring for orchestra, were all alike amazing. In such music as this Koussevitzky is a master.

What wonder, then, that he, too, often applies the same methods in interpreting other music, to which they are not as well fitted. If he would but try to penetrate the secrets of Wagner's art, for instance, as deeply as he penetrates those of his celebrated compatriot, what superb performances he could give us. It is perhaps only natural that when he succeeds so marvelously with Tchaikovsky he should often fail to realize that to attain a comparable success with other music other methods are needed.

The program announced for next week includes a little symphony ascribed to Frederick the Great of Prussia, a new work entitled "Symphonie Spirituelle 'Alleluia'," by a Russian composer named Janin, Sibelius' violin concerto in D minor.

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES THE FIFTH

Post Feb 23 '29

Tchaikovsky's Great Work Played With Eloquence

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

By token of the warmth of the applause, the honors in yesterday's Symphony Concert went to a living American and to a Russian, to Arthur Foote, whose suite for strings, in E major, began the programme, and to Tchaikovsky, whose Fifth Symphony ended it. The pieces between, Eugene Goossens' "Rhythmic Dance" and Debussy's "Iberia" found less favor with the audience.

COOL TOWARDS THE DANCE

Not before had Mr. Goossens' Rhythmic Dance, a comparatively recent work, been played in Boston. Other pieces by this English musician, who conducts the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra and who has led the Boston Symphony as guest, have made a stronger impression. Monotonously thick in orchestration, without special distinction of any sort, this Rhythmic Dance has said its say in the first dozen measures. Yesterday's audience was almost disdainfully cool towards it.

Nor is "Iberia" the most perdurable of the orchestral compositions of Debussy. There are haunting pages in the second section, "The Fragrance of the Night" and captivating measures in the third, "The Morning of a Festival Day." But for the rest "Iberia" is the work of a Debussy who had begun to be a calculating artificer of music rather than of the poet in tones who gave us "The Afternoon of a Faun," the Nocturnes and "The Sea."

Invited to Aid Fund

Yesterday, by the way, the audience was invited, through a special letter from Mr. Koussevitzky inserted in the programme book, to contribute to a fund for the erecting of a monument to Debussy in his native Paris. For the receiving of such contributions a box was conspicuously placed in the foyer of Symphony Hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky did well yesterday to repeat from his earlier seasons both Mr. Foote's Suite and the Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The former is one of the satisfying and substantial American compositions that have won for themselves a fixed place in the repertory of our orchestra. Since 1909 this ingratiating suite has appeared four times on the Symphony programmes. Present to hear his own music, the composer was compelled to rise and bow repeatedly from his seat in the auditorium.

Utmost Possible Eloquence

As for Tchaikovsky's Symphony, not only is it, all things considered, the finest example of its species yet to have come from a Russian hand, but it is one of the pieces in which Mr. Koussevitzky is unsurpassed, even unapproachable as interpreter, one in which he and the orchestra attain to the utmost possible eloquence.

In the Andante George Boettcher, the orchestra's new first horn, had his most considerable opportunity since his coming to us last autumn. By him the familiar measures were played with a tone both firm and beautiful, a tone of true nobility that glorified a melody that might easily lapse into sentimentality.

Tomorrow's Soloist at Symphony Hall

TRAV. FEB 23 1929

ALBERT SPALDING

FOOTE'S SUITE BY SYMPHONY

Composer and His Work Given Acclaim by Large Audience

Mr. Koussevitzky opened his program at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon with Arthur Foote's suite in E major for string orchestra. It it one of the loveliest numbers given this season—particularly the second movement, which was played in a delightful manner and brought rapturous applause from the large audience. Mr. Foote was present, and rose to acknowledge the acclamation given him and his work.

Eugene Goossens's Ryhthmic Dance, given for the first time in Boston, is a delightful fragment and was performed in a charming manner. He has an imposing list of compositions to his credit, among them the opera "Judith."

"Iberia," an orchestral composition by Debussy, comprises—as it pleased him to call them—three images: In the Streets and By-ways, the Fragrance of the night, The Morning of a Festival Day. One does not find melody among them. The composer, it is said, attaches importance only to tonal color. And he has achieved it nobly here. We are given first a street in Spain where the bells of horses and mules are heard, and gay travellers went their joyous way. Then it is night, and the peace and tranquillity are beautifully suggested. With dawn comes the sounds of the awakening world. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of these images made them live!

It is hard to believe that Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor could ever have been frowned upon by music critics. Yet such was the case, and the fact brought great sadness to the composer. But the years have given it a place of eminence. Throughout is a haunting sadness that lifts itself at moments to majesty and magnificence. The audience burst into applause before the final measures had been given, but one can easily understand emotion unrestrained under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction of that symphony yesterday.

The program will be repeated this evening.

Incidents and Prospects

TRANS — FEB 25 '29

Mr. Heifetz, the violinist, who seldom plays with an orchestra either in Europe or America, will be "assisting artist" at the Symphony Concerts of March 15 and 16 in a Concerto to be announced. He wished, it seems, to appear with the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky. In Rabaud's time—or was it in the early years of Monteux?—he was heard at Symphony Hall in Beethoven's Concerto.

[illegible], returning to Boston but once this season, sets the following program for her concert in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, March 13:

Gioite al canto mio	Peri
Wohin	Schubert
Two Biblical Songs	Dvorák
L'heure silencieuse	Staub
Mandoline	Hahn
Les paons	Loeffler
Colloque sentimental	Debussy
Chanson des noisettes	Dupont
Nuit de printemps	Gretschaninov
Erinnerung	Arensky
Maria's Wiegenlied	Reger
La mort, chef d'armée	Musorgsky
I Kyällen	Merikanto
I Dandsen du mit Möder	Backer-Gröndahl
Jeg Elsker Dig—Eros	Grieg

Mr. Foote, the composer, was again in his place at the Symphony Concert of Saturday; heard anew his Suite for Strings; received the quick, warm applause of the audience. He rose and bowed; but, adhering to the modest custom of an earlier day, could not be persuaded to the stage. H. T. P.

Debussy's Monuments

More About The Projects in Paris to Which Boston is Asked to Contribute

NEWSPAPERS, arrived yesterday from Paris, bring particulars of the projected monument to Debussy that Mr. Koussevitzky commended last week to Bostonian support. Or rather the monuments. For two, it appears, will be set up—one by the eminent sculptor, Bourdelle, at Saint-Germain, the suburb of Paris in which Debussy was born; the other, by the Brothers Martel, at a spacious, impressive spot in the newer city. Le Temps implies that Bourdelle's monument is ready for erection and familiar to its readers. The Martels' memorial exists only in a model; is designed "on a vast scale" and must stand upon a site suiting its dimensions. As expectation goes, the monument at Saint-Germain will be erected on the terrace overlooking the valley with a distant view of Paris. (Most Americans know it as seat of the renowned restaurant in the Pavilion Henri IV.) The municipal authorities in the capital are considering the placement of the other.

According to Le Temps, the two funds will be merged and administered as one. Already, through the Association française d'expansion et d'échanges artistiques, the solicitation of funds outside France has begun. The Argentine responded with f. 40,000; Amsterdam with f. 28,000; substantial contributions are in sight from Warsaw, Bucharest and Rio de Janeiro. To Boston, through Mr. Koussevitzky, was sent the first appeal in the United States.

TRANS, FEB. 26 — 1929

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE FEB 24 1929

Mr Koussevitzky has put on the program for this week's Symphony concerts in the regular series a little symphony ascribed to no less an historical figure than Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, the most successful of 18th century monarchs, and the greatest of the Hohenzollerns. It is well known that Frederick played the flute, and patronized, among other composers, J. S. Bach; but there will be wicked skeptics to proclaim that if Kings can get their speeches written for them, it is only too probable that they get their symphonies written for them. The novelty is to be a work with the remarkable title, "Symphonie Spirituelle Alleluia," by a young and almost unknown Russian, Janin.

The second Tuesday Symphony program, like the first, is severely classical in character, drawn from Handel, Haydn and Brahms. This series is designed to introduce people to the masterpieces of orchestral music. It will include a few works by the moderns, but the emphasis is here distinctly on the established classics.

[illegible]

Mr Koussevitzky will give at the Boston Symphony concerts, on March 22 and 23, Bruckner's Eighth Symphony postponed from last week on account of the need of extra rehearsals.

[illegible] the Pension Fund concert Sunday, [illegible] 24, Mr Koussevitzky plans to offer a Wagner program similar to those given by the Boston Symphony at these concerts in many previous seasons.

TRANS

Plays and Pla

Evening of Mr. Goossens Full to Brim

FEB 26 '29

Over Seventeen of His Pieces Ranges a Chamber-Concert, He Himself Assisting

THROUGH the concert of his chamber pieces, last evening in Jordan Hall, Mr. Eugène Goossens was all things to all men, himself included. As executant, he eked out the Burgin Quartet in his Quintet for Piano and Strings; with the four and Mr. Langendoen from Symphony Hall, played third violin in his String-Sextet; took the piano-part in his Concerto for Oboe with his brother, Mr. Léon, at the solo-instrument; by himself ran through seven of his piano-pieces. As composer he contributed the Quintet, Sextet, Concerto and piano-miscellany already specified; added thereto a Fantasy Quartet for Strings, played by "The Burgins," along with six songs sung by Miss Ehrhart to the accompaniment of Mr. Slominsky. Through the one hundred and five minutes that all this spanned, he was also the man of the hour, receiving and acknowledging the handsome plaudits of the audience. The day before yesterday he was central figure of a similar concert in Providence; today he is rehearsing the Philadelphia Orchestra as guest-conductor. He has duties as teacher in the Eastman School at Rochester. He is setting a revising hand to his opera, "Judith"—from Arnold Bennett's play—for production in London next summer. And there are those who fondly believe the artist's life a pleasant, desultory leisure!

Outside the Concerto for Oboe, which was rather the event of the evening, and Mr. Slonimsky's playing of the piano-parts in the songs, performance was hardly finished. Out of what opportunity they could snatch, "The Burgins" made ready the three pieces for strings; in two were joined only Sunday by the composer. He himself played the piano-numbers with more will to the impression he would conjure than application to the keyboard. For the most part, Miss Ehrhart did her best with songs that are often subtly set; invite the singer to shaded mood or devious fantasy; now and again tax her diction. Mr. Goossens has a liking for archaic texts—time of Elizabeth or James—running in strange words from "conceit" to "conceit" of artificial fantasy. He has also a Milhaud-like flair for such verse as Doggerel, dithyramb, madrigal, jumble.

Of jackanape rhymes thro' my brain twist and tumble.
Reader, my scourges imprint as you thumb,
Mark, mark and pardon this inchoate jargon,
These strophes I have sung.

which are words to the song of "The Curse" through which Miss Ehrhart went swiftly, gamesomely, with well-placed accents.

The polished and elegant Goossens—for this Admirable Crichton of tones can write such pieces—was necessarily missing. So also was the Goossens of the theater, though some of us have heard his graphic, imaginative music to Mr. Maugham's Eurasian play, "East of Suez"—his most coloristic work—or have sat behind him as conductor to the British National Opera or to Monsieur Diaghilev's ballet. The symphonic Goossens was also absent; but as composer and conductor Boston has known and applauded him—twice at least in presence—over the way at Symphony Hall. Enough remained to leave him well-characterized through a concert the like of which is hard to recall in these parts.

Count Mr. Goossens first as the born and instinctive, as well as the thoroughly schooled, musician. He is in his thirty-sixth year, which in any country save these United States, is youth. Already his opus-numbers mount into the forties; in the fifteen years of his working life—the concert of yesterday stretched across ten—he has ventured many forms and genres. In every one he has been at technical ease, abounding in the necessary and distinctive resource. He has plied that ease as an individual composer, living his life and practising his calling in the second and the third decade of our present and not inglorious century. At will he can be scholarly; more than one musical paragraph, not few passing modulations, were last evening the proof. At will, also, in the string-pieces, he can condense and shear away orthodox forms that his measures may be more compact, move more freely, speak more pointedly or in the manner of fantasy, as becomes a tonal son of this good day.

By no means, however, has Mr. Goossens put the past behind him. The Concerto for Oboe is classic enough to have won applause in Mozart's Vienna. In any of the music for strings, especially in the more recent pieces, there are unmistakable classical touches. Mr. Goossens uses dissonance when it suits his constructive need or serves his imaginative purpose. He accomplishes his design, but in no way obtrudes his modernistic means. In his ear and from his hands the current devices are for use, not flaunting. With just sense of the continuance of music—his family is ancient in the practice of the art—he chooses, in equal sympathy and discernment, from present or past. He can be, for example, as chromatic as the most restless romantic. He can also space out chords in contrary motion in a fashion at which the youth from the University prick up their ears.

Some like to say that Mr. Goossens does all things equally well, which is to set him down as no better than a journalist in tones, passing with trained hand and ready mind from one day's stint to the next. Yet in the different genres that the program arrayed last evening there was clear evidence not only of an individual procedure, as already set out, but of its source and complement, an individual imagination. Four of the piano-pieces—"The Tug," "The Hurdy-Gurdy Man," "The Wooden Soldiers," "The Marionette-Show"—were little realisms out of the common life, evoked with musical fancy or musical humor, twined about with pianistic embroideries. The song of "Melancholy," the song of "Philomel"—both to archaic texts, the latter with a refrain to begin and end—were born of a sympathetic response to these mannered imaginings, which was clear personal idiosyncrasy. Such songs are written con amore; while others, like "The Curse," already cited and "Epigram," seem modernist instances ably brought to pass. Akin is "Tea-Time" gently sustaining the atmosphere of a tranquil room in the artful prose rather than the poetry of music.

Again the Quartet, the Quintet, the Sextet, stream with a restless but never undirected energy. The rhythms have propulsive force; the turns are plastic and suspensive; there are quick ingenuities of counterpoint, keen play of timbres—all in sign of a vitalizing, inventive composer. A composer as well of moods, if not passion—and for the latter, chamber-music is hardly a chosen vessel, unless a Beethoven is standing by. In each of the string-pieces, the slow-section evokes a pleasure of matter and mood altogether Goossens-like. A gentle poetry marks it; the songful voice often charms; to smooth classic tranquilities succeed light modernist pungencies—the mingled aroma of past and present which Mr. Goossens's finer-touched music more and more diffuses.

Once upon a time, in his days as conductor, Strauss was working through a drowsy August in the Royal Opera (as it then was) at Berlin. Any competent assistant could have carried sufficiently well most of the pieces he was "taking." To a friend, inclined to pity him at a summer task, Strauss explained, cheerfully enough, that he was busy "studying the horns." Many of his finest pages bear him witness. In similar fashion, the hearer suspects, Mr. Goossens, bending over Monsieur Diaghilev's limping orchestras, has been "studying the oboe." Certainly, his Concerto for his brother, speaks well for his pains. It indulges in no far-fetched virtuosities; by concision it avoids tedium; the songful section has intrinsic musical quality, yet is apt for the voice that sings it. Were the piece dated 1777, and not 1927, the antiquarians might hail a discovery. Mr. Léon Goossens, escaping both dryness and acidity, played it in smooth, rounded, moist and transparent tone, outflowing with technical skill transmuted into felicity and imagination. From composer and virtuoso again went the oboe characted in plaintive, pungent, penetrating voice. Here and there potentates from Symphony Hall were to be seen intently listening. As likely as not, they suspect that when oboes—or clarinets—are in question, their orchestra leaves something to be desired. H. T. P.

SECOND OF THE TUESDAY SERIES

Symphony Plays Three Classic Masterpieces

Post Feb 27

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of the current Tuesday afternoon series. As usual there was a large and enthusiastic audience, in spite of the inclement weather, and as always the programme was drawn from the "classics," that is to say, from the great masterpieces. Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, for string orchestra; Haydn's G major Symphony, ordinarily termed the "Surprise," and the Second Symphony of Brahms were the masterpieces yesterday.

Handel's Concerto was admirably played; the Larghetto seemed particularly smooth and flowing, the Allegro sparkling and gay. The performance of the "Surprise" Symphony, too, was wholly in the vein and gave great pleasure. Spontaneous applause burst forth after the Andante, and the charming Menuetto likewise delighted the audience. In short, conductor and band together played this familiar and well-loved piece in a noteworthy manner.

From Brahms' Symphony Mr. Koussevitsky now draws very nearly the utmost musical value. The serenity of the first movement was not marred, as it has sometimes been, by an over-eager brass. The last movement was stirring and brilliant; truly such verve is extraordinarily stimulating. Once more the orchestra seems to have added new glow and lustre to its tone, to have acquired an even greater pliancy and a still more dazzling virtuosity in its performance of these well-known compositions.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, gave its second Tuesday afternoon concert of the season yesterday at Symphony hall. The program consisted of Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra, Handel; Symphony in G major, Haydn; and Symphony No. 2 in D major, Brahms.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose an interesting program for this second concert, and as usual the orchestra played with unfailing proficiency. The legato music of the Handel Concerto Grosso assumed a new dignity under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, the phrases were smooth, finely finished, played with delicacy yet suggestive of latent power. This was also true of the Haydn symphony, though the tonality of the third movement was inclined to be harsh at times. The pensive thought and joyous ecstasy of Brahm's music was beautifully interpreted, attention was given to every detail of expression and the last movement of the symphony was played with stirring intensity which mounted to a powerful climax.

Her Feb 27 O. A.

TRANS

een

FEB 27 '29

An Hour of Handel, Haydn and Brahms

YESTERDAY afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second of the Tuesday series of symphonic concerts. It has been said more than once in these columns that the concerts of this series are devoted to "the classics." And the term has been broadly defined. No need for broad definition, however, for these first two programs. If the first traversed Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, the second (yesterday) ranged no farther than Handel, Haydn, Brahms. Handel contributed the Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor; Haydn the Symphony in G Major known as "The Surprise"; Brahms his second symphony, in D major. And though the weather man played some of the choicest pieces in his repertoire designed to assure the prevention of attendance, scarce a seat was empty.

The audience was well rewarded for its efforts. For these listeners came the breadths of the Handelian Largo, the incisiveness, the play of his rhythms in two Allegros, the melody—wondrous rich—of one Larghetto. All in the day's work was the writing of this music for Handel. Pomps were his to loose on his hearers as a child turns on water at a faucet. Rhythms to run their course, no less. But now and again such exercise of the duties of the day brought to earth the music of the gods themselves. Of such is this Larghetto. And to give it voice, warm, vibrant voice which comes from the depths and goes to the depths in the breast of man, there was on the platform a set of string players who played as if this one work was something for which they had been destined. Handel at his melodic best, Boston Symphony strings, Mr. Koussevitzky: rare combination.

As pleasure to the listeners came also Haydn's Symphony. Simple, straightforward music, marvellously direct amid all its fussy ornamentation. Music full of humors and gayeties and pleasantries—even if the "surprise" chord were never mentioned. One needs only to think of the peasant jollity of the minuet; if the mirth and the swing—and in places the swagger, possibly—of the first movement once the introductory Adagio is out of the way; of the rollicking good fun there is in the finale. Nor does the Andante with its variations detract one whit from the prevailing gayety. If in it Haydn attempts seriousness for a moment, he does so with a twinkle in his eye. "I must be serious because this is the place to be serious."

And after the intermission, Brahms's second symphony, symphony of melodies, melodies warm, full-throated, deep-toned. With grave seriousness horns sing their theme; in kind 'cellos soon answer them, while violins and flutes, between, have for the moment lightened the mood. An Adagio plucks a little more deeply at heartstrings. An Allegretto grows wistful; Brahms is unwilling to introduce the more positive mood of a Scherzo. In this second symphony at least, the Allegretto affords a happy let-down in the intensity of mood after the Adagio. In its own right, aside from consideration of its place in the symphony, it is a melody of rare charm and distinction. Finally the last movement with its bustle has its own more actively rhythmed melody. . . . It was a splendid performance yesterday afternoon, of this essentially lyric symphony. An audience gave rapt attention. Though the climax is far from an "apotheosis," it could not wait for the last chord to end before it burst in with applause. And then, though it was conclusion of an afternoon concert, applause continued. Mr. Koussevitzky came back once, twice, until finally the orchestra was on its feet, with him acknowledging the plaudits.

A. H. M.

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms' in D Major, Haydn's "Surprise"

Globe Feb. 27

Mr Koussevitzky, adhering to his announced intention of devoting the Tuesday afternoon series of Boston Symphony concerts to masterpieces old and modern, put two great familiar symphonies on yesterday's program, Haydn's "Surprise" and Brahms' Second. The only other number was Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor. An audience which filled the hall applauded the Brahms to the echo. Haydn won notably fewer plaudits, perhaps because the peroration of his symphony is less sonorous.

Mr Koussevitzky again stressed the warmth and languor of Handel's slow movements until one wondered whether a lighter touch and a swifter pace might not better suit their melodic and rhythmic character. The performance of this Concerto Grosso showed once more the excellence of the strings in the Boston Symphony.

Haydn's charming symphony was well played, particularly the minuet, which Mr Koussevitzky wisely takes at a slower pace than is customary. This music is not half so naive as some 19th century commentators would have it. Haydn's emotions may not have been those of a Don Juan or a Parsifal, but they are genuine. His style, for all its clarity and simplicity, is far from the superficial or the obvious. His music now sounds fresher and finer than that of many a 19th century romanticist. He has outlived Spohr, for example, and will probably outlive Schumann and Liszt.

One doubts whether Brahms meant his Second Symphony to have the dramatic intensity Mr Koussevitzky tried to give it yesterday. The first movement is usually made more lyric, more suave, and the finale more Mozartian. Only in the slow movement did one admire the interpretation.

Yet, granted the conductor's interpretation of the music, and his frequent indifference to absolute precision of ensemble and tonal balance between sections of the orchestra, the performance was stirring.

The next concert in this series will be given Tuesday, March 12. P. R.

Programs to Hand TRANS FEB 28

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of March 15 and 16, after conductor and orchestra have returned from a journey and cities southward:

Concerto for Orchestra in D major, C. P.-E. Bach
(Arranged by M. Steinberg)
Concerto, in D minor, for Violin with Orchestra ..... Brahms
(Violinist: Mr. Heifetz)
Symphony in F ..... Dukelsky
(First Times in America)
Overture, "Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz

An appearance with any orchestra is a compliment that Mr. Heifetz pays seldom. In this instance it was, indeed, mutual proposal. Dukelsky's Symphony, heard last June at the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, is work of a cosmopolite Russian rather more familiar with Paris, London, Scotland, Italy, than with his own country. Even now, he is in New York, likely to descend upon Boston for the performance of his piece. It is dissonant here, songful there, tersely but warmly written throughout.

From Symphony Hall for the concert of the Glee Clubs of Smith College and Harvard University on Thursday evening of next week with A. T. Davison and Ivan T. Gorokhov conducting the men's, the women's or the mixed choir:

Taffallied ..... I. Brahms
Smith and Harvard Glee Clubs (Mr. Gorokhov, conducting)
Meet and Right It Is ..... Archangelsky
When I View ..... Chadwick
Smith Glee Club (Mr. Gorokhov conducting)
Lord Who Has Made ..... Holst
Smith Glee Club (Dr. Davison conducting)
To All You Ladies Now on Land ..... Callcott
The City of Chow ..... Bantock
The Galway Piper ..... Irish Folk-Song
Harvard Glee Club
The Day of Judgment ..... Archangelsky
Ospodi Pomiluy ..... Isvonsky
Smith and Harvard Glee Clubs (Mr. Gorokhov conducting)
The Ring ..... Dvorák
Down the Waggon-Way, North-Country Folk-Song
The Keel Row ..... Tyneside Air
Smith Glee Club
In Dulci Jubilo ..... Gabrieli
Adoramus te ..... Palestrina
Harvard Glee Club
Then Round About the Starry Throne ..... Handel
Smith and Harvard Glee Clubs (Dr. Davison conducting)

TRANS

Plays and Pla

Evening of Mr. Goossens Full to Brim

FEB 26 '29

Over Seventeen of His Pieces Ranges a Chamber-Concert, He Himself Assisting

THROUGH the concert of his chamber pieces, last evening in Jordan Hall, Mr. Eugène Goossens was all things to all men, himself included. As executant, he eked out the Burgin Quartet in his Quintet for Piano and Strings; with the four and Mr. Langendoen from Symphony Hall, played third violin in his String-Sextet; took the piano-part in his Concerto for Oboe with his brother, Mr. Léon, at the solo-instrument; by himself ran through seven of his piano-pieces. As composer he contributed the Quintet, Sextet, Concerto and piano-miscellany already specified; added thereto a Fantasy Quartet for Strings, played by "The Burgins," along with six songs sung by Miss Ehrhart to the accompaniment of Mr. Slominsky. Through the one hundred and five minutes that all this spanned, he was also the man of the hour, receiving and acknowledging the handsome plaudits of the audience. The day before yesterday he was central figure of a similar concert in Providence; today he is rehearsing the Philadelphia Orchestra as guest-conductor. He has duties as teacher in the Eastman School at Rochester. He is setting a revising hand to his opera, "Judith"—from Arnold Bennett's play—for production in London next summer. And there are those who fondly believe the artist's life a pleasant, desultory leisure!

Outside the Concerto for Oboe, which was rather the event of the evening, and Mr. Slonimsky's playing of the piano-parts in the songs, performance was hardly finished. Out of what opportunity they could snatch, "The Burgins" made ready the three pieces for strings; in two were joined only Sunday by the composer. He himself played the piano-numbers with more will to the impression he would conjure than application to the keyboard. For the most part, Miss Ehrhart did her best with songs that are often subtly set; invite the singer to shaded mood or devious fantasy; now and again tax her diction. Mr. Goossens has a liking for archaic texts—time of Elizabeth or James—running in strange words from "conceit" to "conceit" of artificial fantasy. He has also a Milhaud-like flair for such verse as Doggerel, dithyramb, madrigal, jumble.

Of jackanape rhymes thro' my brain twist and tumble.
Reader, my scourges imprint as you thumb,
Mark, mark and pardon this inchoate jargon,
These strophes I have sung.

which are words to the song of "The Curse" through which Miss Ehrhart went swiftly, gamesomely, with well-placed accents.

The polished and elegant Goossens—for this Admirable Crichton of tones can write such pieces—was necessarily missing. So also was the Goossens of the theater, though some of us have heard his graphic, imaginative music to Mr. Maugham's Eurasian play, "East of Suez"—his most coloristic work—or have sat behind him as conductor to the British National Opera or to Monsieur Diaghilev's ballet. The symphonic Goossens was also absent; but as composer and conductor Boston has known and applauded him—twice at least in presence—over the way at Symphony Hall. Enough remained to leave him well-characterized through a concert the like of which is hard to recall in these parts.

Count Mr. Goossens first as the born and instinctive, as well as the thoroughly schooled, musician. He is in his thirty-sixth year, which in any country save these United States, is youth. Already his opus-numbers mount into the forties; in the fifteen years of his working life—the concert of yesterday stretched across ten—he has ventured many forms and genres. In every one he has been at technical ease, abounding in the necessary and distinctive resource. He has plied that ease as an individual composer, living his life and practising his calling in the second and the third decade of our present and not inglorious century. At will he can be scholarly; more than one musical paragraph, not few passing modulations, were last evening the proof. At will, also, in the string-pieces, he can condense and shear away orthodox forms that his measures may be more compact, move more freely, speak more pointedly or in the manner of fantasy, as becomes a tonal son of this good day.

By no means, however, has Mr. Goossens put the past behind him. The Concerto for Oboe is classic enough to have won applause in Mozart's Vienna. In any of the music for strings, especially in the more recent pieces, there are unmistakable classical touches. Mr. Goossens uses dissonance when it suits his constructive need or serves his imaginative purpose. He accomplishes his design, but in no way obtrudes his modernistic means. In his ear and from his hands the current devices are for use, not flaunting. With just sense of the continuance of music—his family is ancient in the practice of the art—he chooses, in equal sympathy and discernment, from present or past. He can be, for example, as chromatic as the most restless romantic. He can also space out chords in contrary motion in a fashion at which the youth from the University prick up their ears.

Some like to say that Mr. Goossens does all things equally well, which is to set him down as no better than a journalist in tones, passing with trained hand and ready mind from one day's stint to the next. Yet in the different genres that the program arrayed last evening there was clear evidence not only of an individual procedure, as already set out, but of its source and complement, an individual imagination. Four of the piano-pieces—"The Tug," "The Hurdy-Gurdy Man," "The Wooden Soldiers," "The Marionette-Show"—were little realisms out of the common life, evoked with musical fancy or musical humor, twined about with pianistic embroideries. The song of "Melancholy," the song of "Philomel"—both to archaic texts, the latter with a refrain to begin and end—were born of a sympathetic response to these mannered imaginings, which was clear personal idiosyncrasy. Such songs are written con amore; while others, like "The Curse," already cited and "Epigram," seem modernist instances ably brought to pass. Akin is "Tea-Time" gently sustaining the atmosphere of a tranquil room in the artful prose rather than the poetry of music.

Again the Quartet, the Quintet, the Sextet, stream with a restless but never undirected energy. The rhythms have propulsive force; the turns are plastic and suspensive; there are quick ingenuities of counterpoint, keen play of timbres—all in sign of a vitalizing, inventive composer. A composer as well of moods, if not passion—and for the latter, chamber-music is hardly a chosen vessel, unless a Beethoven is standing by. In each of the string-pieces, the slow-section evokes a pleasure of matter and mood altogether Goossens-like. A gentle poetry marks it; the songful voice often charms; to smooth classic tranquilities succeed light modernist pungencies—the mingled aroma of past and present which Mr. Goossens's finer-touched music more and more diffuses.

Once upon a time, in his days as conductor, Strauss was working through a drowsy August in the Royal Opera (as it then was) at Berlin. Any competent assistant could have carried sufficiently well most of the pieces he was "taking." To a friend, inclined to pity him at a summer task, Strauss explained, cheerfully enough, that he was busy "studying the horns." Many of his finest pages bear him witness. In similar fashion, the hearer suspects, Mr. Goossens, bending over Monsieur Diaghilev's limping orchestras, has been "studying the oboe." Certainly, his Concerto for his brother, speaks well for his pains. It indulges in no far-fetched virtuosities; by concision it avoids tedium; the songful section has intrinsic musical quality, yet is apt for the voice that sings it. Were the piece dated 1777, and not 1927, the antiquarians might hail a discovery. Mr. Léon Goossens, escaping both dryness and acidity, played it in smooth, rounded, moist and transparent tone, outflowing with technical skill transmuted into felicity and imagination. From composer and virtuoso again went the oboe characterized in plaintive, pungent, penetrating voice. Here and there potentates from Symphony Hall were to be seen intently listening. As likely as not, they suspect that when oboes—or clarinets—are in question, their orchestra leaves something to be desired. H. T. P.

SECOND OF THE TUESDAY SERIES

Symphony Plays Three Classic Masterpieces

Post Feb. 27

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of the current Tuesday afternoon series. As usual there was a large and enthusiastic audience, in spite of the inclement weather, and as always the programme was drawn from the "classics," that is to say, from the great masterpieces. Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, for string orchestra; Haydn's G major Symphony, ordinarily termed the "Surprise," and the Second Symphony of Brahms were the masterpieces yesterday.

Handel's Concerto was admirably played; the Larghetto seemed particularly smooth and flowing, the Allegro sparkling and gay. The performance of the "Surprise" Symphony, too, was wholly in the vein and gave great pleasure. Spontaneous applause burst forth after the Andante, and the charming Menuetto likewise delighted the audience. In short, conductor and band together played this familiar and well-loved piece in a noteworthy manner.

From Brahms' Symphony Mr. Koussevitsky now draws very nearly the utmost musical value. The serenity of the first movement was not marred, as it has sometimes been, by an over-eager brass. The last movement was stirring and brilliant; truly such verve is extraordinarily stimulating. Once more the orchestra seems to have added new glow and lustre to its tone, to have acquired an even greater pliancy and a still more dazzling virtuosity in its performance of these well-known compositions.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, gave its second Tuesday afternoon concert of the season yesterday at Symphony hall. The program consisted of Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra, Handel; Symphony in G major, Haydn; and Symphony No. 2 in D major, Brahms.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose an interesting program for this second concert, and as usual the orchestra played with unfailing proficiency. The legato music of the Handel Concerto Grosso assumed a new dignity under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand, the phrases were smooth, finely finished, played with delicacy yet suggestive of latent power. This was also true of the Haydn symphony, though the tonality of the third movement was inclined to be harsh at times. The pensive thought and joyous ecstasy of Brahm's music was beautifully interpreted, attention was given to every detail of expression and the last movement of the symphony was played with stirring intensity which mounted to a powerful climax.

Her Feb 27 O. A.

TRANS

'een FEB 27 '29

An Hour of Handel, Haydn and Brahms

YESTERDAY afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second of the Tuesday series of symphonic concerts. It has been said more than once in these columns that the concerts of this series are devoted to "the classics." And the term has been broadly defined. No need for broad definition, however, for these first two programs. If the first traversed Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, the second (yesterday) ranged no farther than Handel, Haydn, Brahms. Handel contributed the Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor; Haydn the Symphony in G Major known as "The Surprise"; Brahms his second symphony, in D major. And though the weather man played some of the choicest pieces in his repertoire designed to assure the prevention of attendance, scarce a seat was empty.

The audience was well rewarded for its efforts. For these listeners came the breadths of the Handelian Largo, the incisiveness, the play of his rhythms in two Allegros, the melody—wondrous rich—of one Larghetto. All in the day's work was the writing of this music for Handel. Pomps were his to loose on his hearers as a child turns on water at a faucet. Rhythms to run their course, no less. But now and again such exercise of the duties of the day brought to earth the music of the gods themselves. Of such is this Larghetto. And to give it voice, warm, vibrant voice which comes from the depths and goes to the depths in the breast of man, there was on the platform a set of string players who played as if this one work was something for which they had been destined. Handel at his melodic best, Boston Symphony strings, Mr. Koussevitzky: rare combination.

As pleasure to the listeners came also Haydn's Symphony. Simple, straightforward music, marvellously direct amid all its fussy ornamentation. Music full of humors and gayetics and pleasantries—even if the "surprise" chord were never mentioned. One needs only to think of the peasant jollity of the minuet; if the mirth and the swing—and in places the swagger, possibly—of the first movement once the introductory Adagio is out of the way; of the rollicking good fun there is in the finale. Nor does the Andante with its variations detract one whit from the prevailing gayety. If in it Haydn attempts seriousness for a moment, he does so with a twinkle in his eye. "I must be serious because this is the place to be serious."

And after the intermission, Brahms's second symphony, symphony of melodies, melodies warm, full-throated, deep-toned. With grave seriousness horns sing their theme; in kind 'cellos soon answer them, while violins and flutes, between, have for the moment lightened the mood. An Adagio plucks a little more deeply at heartstrings. An Allegretto grows wistful; Brahms is unwilling to introduce the more positive mood of a Scherzo. In this second symphony at least, the Allegretto affords a happy let-down in the intensity of mood after the Adagio. In its own right, aside from consideration of its place in the symphony, it is a melody of rare charm and distinction. Finally the last movement with its bustle has its own more actively rhythmed melody. . . . It was a splendid performance yesterday afternoon, of this essentially lyric symphony. An audience gave rapt attention. Though the climax is far from an "apotheosis," it could not wait for the last chord to end before it burst in with applause. And then, though it was conclusion of an afternoon concert, applause continued. Mr. Koussevitzky came back once, twice, until finally the orchestra was on its feet, with him acknowledging the plaudits.

A. H. M.

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms' in D Major, Haydn's "Surprise"

Globe Feb. 27

Mr Koussevitzky, adhering to his announced intention of devoting the Tuesday afternoon series of Boston Symphony concerts to masterpieces old and modern, put two great familiar symphonies on yesterday's program, Haydn's "Surprise" and Brahms' Second. The only other number was Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor. An audience which filled the hall applauded the Brahms to the echo. Haydn won notably fewer plaudits, perhaps because the peroration of his symphony is less sonorous.

Mr Koussevitzky again stressed the warmth and languor of Handel's slow movements until one wondered whether a lighter touch and a swifter pace might not better suit their melodic and rhythmic character. The performance of this Concerto Grosso showed once more the excellence of the strings in the Boston Symphony.

Haydn's charming symphony was well played, particularly the minuet, which Mr Koussevitzky wisely takes at a slower pace than is customary. This music is not half so naive as some 19th century commentators would have it. Haydn's emotions may not have been those of a Don Juan or a Parsifal, but they are genuine. His style, for all its clarity and simplicity, is far from the superficial or the obvious. His music now sounds fresher and finer than that of many a 19th century romanticist. He has outlived Spohr, for example, and will probably outlive Schumann and Liszt.

One doubts whether Brahms meant his Second Symphony to have the dramatic intensity Mr Koussevitzky tried to give it yesterday. The first movement is usually made more lyric, more suave, and the finale more Mozartian. Only in the slow movement did one admire the interpretation.

Yet, granted the conductor's interpretation of the music, and his frequent indifference to absolute precision of ensemble and tonal balance between sections of the orchestra, the performance was stirring.

The next concert in this series will be given Tuesday, March 12. P. R.

Programs to Hand TRANS FEB 28

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of March 15 and 16, after conductor and orchestra have returned from a journey and cities southward:

Concerto for Orchestra in D major, C. P.-E. Bach
(Arranged by M. Steinberg)
Concerto, in D minor, for Violin with Orchestra ..... Brahms
(Violinist: Mr. Heifetz)
Symphony in F ..... Dukelsky
(First Times in America)
Overture, "Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz

An appearance with any orchestra is a compliment that Mr. Heifetz pays seldom. In this instance it was, indeed, mutual proposal. Dukelsky's Symphony, heard last June at the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, is work of a cosmopolite Russian rather more familiar with Paris, London, Scotland, Italy, than with his own country. Even now, he is in New York, likely to descend upon Boston for the performance of his piece. It is dissonant here, songful there, tersely but warmly written throughout.

From Symphony Hall for the concert of the Glee Clubs of Smith College and Harvard University on Thursday evening of next week with A. T. Davison and Ivan T. Gorokhov conducting the men's, the women's or the mixed choir:

Taffallied ..... I. Brahms
Smith and Harvard Glee Clubs (Mr. Gorokhov, conducting)
Meet and Right It Is ..... Archangelsky
When I View ..... Chadwick
Smith Glee Club (Mr. Gorokhov conducting)
Lord Who Has Made ..... Holst
Smith Glee Club (Dr. Davison conducting)
To All You Ladies Now on Land ..... Callcott
The City of Chow ..... Bantock
The Galway Piper ..... Irish Folk-Song
Harvard Glee Club
The Day of Judgment ..... Archangelsky
Ospodi Pomiluy ..... Isvonsky
Smith and Harvard Glee Clubs (Mr. Gorokhov conducting)
The Ring ..... Dvorák
Down the Waggon-Way, North-Country Folk-Song
The Keel Row ..... Tyneside Air
Smith Glee Club
In Dulci Jubilo ..... Gabrieli
Adoramus te ..... Palestrina
Harvard Glee Club
Then Round About the Starry Throne ..... Handel
Smith and Harvard Glee Clubs (Dr. Davison conducting)

Strange Bedfellows At Symphony Hall

Music From A Great King And From An Obscure French Composer

THE NOVELTIES of the present week at Symphony Hall are two in number. Programs—like other things in life—sometimes make strange bedfellows. Thus it comes about that a great King of Prussia rubs elbows (to change the metaphor) with a youthful and rather obscure Frenchman. But the King of Prussia, cherishing French art and French culture, would never have felt other than at home in the company of a French composer. Not inappropriately, then, a Symphony of Frederick the Great stands side by side with a Symphony by Jacques Janin.

Frederick II. as a boy loved music, literature and the arts so warmly as to cause a break with is martinet-father, Frederick William. As Crown Prince Frederick assembled his own "kapelle," even though his father refused to maintain one. As King he was a steadfast patron of the arts, devoting his leisure, as he himself says, to personal practice of them. His household included Johann-Joachim Quantz, the foremost flutist of his day, as soloist, teacher and composer to the King; Carl-Heinrich Graun, as Kapellmeister and teacher of composition; Philip-Emanuel Bach as cembalist. Frederick wrote many sonatas and concertos for the flute upon which he played devotedly and skilfully, as well as music in other forms. His symphonies are not numerous. That in D major, to be played at Symphony Hall, is the only one that employs wind instruments in addition to strings. In the act of musical creation, the royal composer must have received help from his teachers; for his biographers make a point of it that in this particular symphony he had no assistance. Quantz is reported as having said to Nicolai: "The King showed me the score; in his presence I looked it over, but made no corrections beyond calling his attention to a few notes which were obviously mere errors in notation, and which the King changed." Spitta also vouches for the "blameless purity" of the piece.

Without Frederick's knowledge, the Symphony in D was printed, at the instigation of his sister, in 1743 (generally considered also as the year of composition) for a surprise for him. There are three movements—Allegro, Andante, Allegro Scherzando. In the original it is said to have been scored for two oboes, two horns and strings in the first and last movements; for two flutes and two violins in the Andante. The present editor, Gustav Lenzewski, in a foreword to his version says that he reconstructed the score from the printed parts of the edition of 1743. His orchestration, however, calls for flutes, oboes, horns, bassoons, piano, in addition to strings. With him also, the Andante is a flute-duet with violin accompaniment.

The scholar of today will be struck by the marked inclination toward sonata-form in the first movement, since strong tendencies toward that form are generally attributed to Philip-Emanuel Bach. There is a fluid first subject; a short but strong contrast. There is suggestion of development and recapitulation. The slow movement is melodic, as would be expected of a flute-duet in slow tempo. The last movement is a rather bright dance rhythm. The music is not highly original. It recalls occasionally the sons of Bach, occasionally Handel—a curious detail in view of the fact that Frederick chose to hear little, if any of Handel's music. His favorite composers were Quantz, Graun, Philip-Emanuel Bach and Frederick. But Frederick's father had oboists play whole operas of Handel to put him to sleep. Did this plant in the boy a seed for a future style? But the whole Symphony reminds one of his musical biographers of Diabelli!

To Introduce Janin

There is practically no biographical material forthcoming about Jacques Janin, other than the fact that he studied at the Paris Conservatory between 1909 and 1914 under Taudon, Caussade and Paul Vidal. The war created a hiatus in his musical activities, but he has since written prolifically. The title-page of the score of his Symphony, still in manuscript contains the dedication to Georges Bouche, and the title: Symphonie spirituelle, "Alleluia!" It is scored for the usual woodwinds, six horns, a trumpet piccolo in D, two trumpets in C, a trumpet-bass in F, trombones and tuba, the usual percussion and strings, organ, harp and celesta. At the end of the score stands the date, July 20, 1928.

Symphony Hall contributes the following synopsis, source not indicated:

"Alleluia on Earth and in Heaven" denotes the nature of this symphony: On earth intense rejoicing, tumultuous joy of souls who hold and live in God; in the heavens, a canticle of a more reflective religiosity, but not the less positive. It is heard afar; it comes nearer and at last bursts forth in full force. Mingled with these is a ritualitic lament, the grief of angels at man's impiety. The two motives are alternately employed and are blended, gradualy diminishing. Then the Alleluia is heard on earth in unbounded power."

As would be expected from this program, the piece runs in three divisions—a first which is evidently an Allegro, though the composer has not so indicated; a second, "Un poco plus lent"; finally, "Allegro ben marcato." In the first Allegro there are two opposing principles (which is probably fairer than to say two themes). The first is heard at once in the strings; the second comes in soon after for organ alone, later for organ with brass. Still farther on there is a slightly more lyric theme which yields contrapuntal imitations and a stretto. The slow section begins with a lyric motiv in flutes and clarinets, punctuated with strings. The final Allegro is short, mounting quickly to a strong climax. It is characteristic of Janin to change meter almost incessantly. The first two pages of his score bear the following succession of meter-signatures: 13-16, 9-16, 10-16, 15-16, 20-16.

A. H. M.

He Who Dreams

Jacques Janin

Composer of the New Symphony, "Alleluia," To Be Played at the Symphony Concerts This Week

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
FEB 1 - 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzsky's Bostonians Give Superb Performance in Program That Repeats Two Much-Discussed New Works

ORCHESTRAL playing of the highest quality lifted last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall to a place among the most memorable events of an unmemorable season. It was playing that may fairly be said to have transcended the quality of the music played in every instance save that of the Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"—since these are worthy of all the art of performance that can be lavished upon them by the most highly sensitized and fastidious hand. Serge Koussevitzky and his Bostonians some seasons ago gave us an almost miraculous performance of "Fetes," and if it was not quite equaled last night—something of the effect of the phantom procession being lost by reason of the too appreciable pause before this episode began—here was such Debussy playing as Manhattan has not heard in this music from any other orchestra or any other conductor. "Nuages" may have been less fleecy, less gossamer-like than was to be expected of Mr. Koussevitzky, but it was impossible to escape the sheer beauty of the ensemble.

Prokofieff's so-called "Classical" Symphony and two of the most discussed of recent novelties, Honegger's "Rugby" and Bloch's "America," were the other numbers which conspired to make the program an unusual one and to give opportunity, in the Honegger and Bloch works, for comparisons that redounded altogether to the glorification of the Koussevitzkyans. Mr. Honegger achieved no such brilliant results with his football jeu d'esprit as did the Boston leader, competent as was the Philharmonic performance of ten days ago led by the composer. Brilliance, however, only made the more clear that this is a work of no very notable inspiration. It is mildly amusing in its stridulous way, achieves a certain vitality by virtue of hard labor and bespeaks a superior craftsman, but all ends in a lesser "Pacific 231," one that has been slightly humanized, but is musically only of slight and unoriginal content.

THE little Prokofieff symphony, said to have been written with the thought of bringing back the spirit of Mozart and putting down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores, was deliciously delineated. Prokofieff was not the man to recapture the tenderness nor yet the suppleness of the master he imitated, but he wrote music of wit and gayety none the less appealing, because in its eighteenth-century guise it has something of the brittleness and the diamantine flash of his own harder era. In form and substance it is nearer a Mozart serenade or divertimento than a symphony. Concision is not the least of its good qualities.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
Courant
FEB 1 - 1929

Boston Symphony

There are a number of interesting episodes in the career of Serge Koussevitsky, the famous Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But probably there is no incident so entirely out of the ordinary, as the musical world goes, as his three trips down the Volga.

Some legends have arisen about these Volga tours. One is that the concerts were free. They were not. Koussevitzky never patronized these most unusual of symphony publics. They paid the regular theater prices, listened to the concert in their own town theaters; and were served with regular symphony programs.

Even the box office receipts Koussevitsky's Volga tours involved an appalling deficit. It is no simple matter to hire a hundred fine musicians, charter a steamer with accommodations for two hundred (counting musicians' wives, crew and friends) and sail for 2500 miles, stopping at towns of all sorts along the way. Each tour lasted about four weeks.

The orchestra will be at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon. Good seats are available at McCoy's, and mail orders will be filled by F. A. Sedgwick, 89 Asylum Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 1 - 1929

Koussevitzky And His Boston Orchestra Here

Contemporary Composers' Works Chosen for Opening Concert of 3d Visit

Bloch Symphony Given

Honneger's 'Rugby' Featured; Other Appearances

By Francis D. Perkins

Mr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began their third New York visit of the season last night in Carnegie Hall with an all-twentieth century program, except for Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," whose premiere antedated that of this century by less than a month. He prefaced the Debussy works with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, and completed his list with Arthur Honegger's "orchestral movement." "Rugby," and Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America."

Mr. Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges who unanimously chose the Bloch symphony for the prize given by "Musical America," and one of the conductors who took part in its nearly-simultaneous premiere in several American cities, would seem to be one of its most devoted interpreters.

To Play Three Times Here

Having repeated it in his two principal Boston series, he is giving three New York hearings to it, including tonight's Brookyn performance and tomorrow afternoon's in Carnegie Hall. Honegger's "Rugby" is also receiving its third and fourth Manhattan performances, and its first hearing in the transpontine borough.

Of course the audiences which hear Mr. Koussevitzky's New York performances of the Bloch and Honegger works are, at least to some extent, different from each other and from the Philharmonic-Symphony audiences which heard "America" under Damrosch in December and "Rugby" under its composer in January, and, as both are among the most interesting of the new works offered us so far this season, the Bostonians' triple performance is readily justifiable.

The Honegger depiction of a football game—psychological rather than pictorial, according to the program notes—had rewarding moments, especially in the proclamative brass near the close. It is spirited, sometimes brilliant, but sometimes lets interest lapse, despite its shortness.

"America" Is Analyzed

"America" has met with various opinions, but is undoubtedly the most ponderable novelty so far produced here in 1928-'29. A second hearing last night bore out the impressions of the first performance—that the "epic rhapsody" contains much eloquent and potent music, notably skillful and richly colored orchestration and unusually dextrous and effective interweaving of folk and popular melodies; that Bloch has almost succeeded in his stupendous attempt, but not quite. For his prolonged final climax, he must pile Pelion upon Ossa, reaching the supreme moment after the magnificent pages of preparation. But here comes the weak point of the work, the anthem which, apart from its reminiscences, is music of an inferior order.

The anthem was well sung by members of the Oratorio Society and the Glee Club of New York University, whose directors are Albert Stoessel and Alfred Greenfield. No attempt, apparently, was made to induce the audience to rise and join in, previous experience, perhaps, having shown that our symphony audiences do not incline readily to song.

The strong points of "America" were convincingly set forth last night in a superb performance, memorable for its color and potency, which proved Mr. Koussevitzky's devotion to the work well worth while. There were "Bravos" as well as manual plaudits at the close, while "Rugby" received polite, but not ardent applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 1 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HARTFORD NEXT SUNDAY

Once a year, the Hartford public is fortunate enough to have the opportunity of hearing one of the finest orchestras in the world, under the direction of the greatest conductor, Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony orchestra which will be heard Sunday afternoon at the Capitol theater, is experiencing the most remarkable season of its career, under the leadership of Koussevitzky, who is on his fourth season with the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is a magnetic personality, and his readings of the faster works are of the highest type, he having been styled "a virtuoso conductor."

A fine program is promised for the Hartford concert. The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's Music store, Hartford, under Mr. Sedgewick's direction. Good seats are available, and mail orders will be filled by mailing check to F. A. Sedgewick, 89 Asylum St.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N.Y. AMERICAN
FEB 1 - 1929

BLOCH'S 'AMERICA' BY BOSTON BAND

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ONE of the season's symphonic futilities, Ernest Bloch's "America," for orchestra and chorus finale, wound up the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last evening.

The composition had its New York premiere a few weeks ago under Philharmonic auspices. Since then it has been played by most of the other symphony orchestras in this country.

On the occasion of its first performance here this department gave the full "story" of the opus, consequently there is no need to do more now than to remind the faithful reader that its measures represent an effort to tonalize some of the salient events that have to do with the American spirit of personal freedom and spiritual liberation. Quotations from Walt Whitman poems are used as mottoes for many episodes in the Bloch pages. He winds up his lengthy work with a new American national anthem.

The whole symphony is dedicated to our people as a tribute of the admiration and love which they inspire in Ernest Bloch. (Will that other Ernest, Herr Krenek, who pokes heavy fun at us in his "Jøhnny Strikes Up the Band," please take particular notice?)

Somehow Bloch's symphonic compliment is as clumsy and overburdened as the operatic parody of Krenek, even though the former is a much finer musical craftsman. Krenek merely scraped the surface of Americanism with his jazz accents; Bloch does the same thing when he utilizes tunes like "Pop Goes the Weasel," "Dixie," "Old Hundred," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," "Old Folks at Home," etc.

Bloch does strike some reflective and soulful moods and he garbs them in dignified and finely-made musical and orchestral dress, but his effort to follow the flag too closely gives his huge production a topical character that very largely defeats its underlying lofty purpose.

The new national anthem (sung last night by a chorus from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club, although Bloch desires the audience to join vocally in the performance) is puerile in its music and commonplace in its words.

Serge Koussevitzky put [illegible] enthusiasm into his conducting, and the Boston orchestral forces played with all their customary musical and technical finish, but nevertheless the listeners failed to reward "America" with more than moderate applause.

A far higher degree of enthusiasm met Debussy's fragile and shadowy "Clouds" and "Festivals," tone-poems which have no patriotic or commemorative intention. Beauty of tone and delicacy of phrasing marked their delivery.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," also heard here before, would be a strange bed-fellow for the classical symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven and Brahms, and its cold feet would disturb even the lesser exalted masters like Franck, Bruckner, Schumann and Berlioz. The music of Prokofieff gives out an icy chill; only its name and formal shell are "classical."

Koussevitzky's peculiar programme included also Honegger's football scherzo, "Rugby," that ineffectual and tuneless series of contrapuntal geometrics which its composer led here recently at a Philharmonic concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
FEB 1 - 1929

Standees at the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall concert last night flinched under the eagle eye of a fireman stationed in the back of the auditorium. New York's fire laws allow only forty standees, and the flame-eater was counting the footsore group.

Strange Bedfellows At Symphony Hall

Music From A Great King And From An Obscure French Composer

THE NOVELTIES of the present week at Symphony Hall are two in number. Programs—like other things in life—sometimes make strange bedfellows. Thus it comes about that a great King of Prussia rubs elbows (to change the metaphor) with a youthful and rather obscure Frenchman. But the King of Prussia, cherishing French art and French culture, would never have felt other than at home in the company of a French composer. Not inappropriately, then, a Symphony of Frederick the Great stands side by side with a Symphony by Jacques Janin.

Frederick II. as a boy loved music, literature and the arts so warmly as to cause a break with is martinet-father, Frederick William. As Crown Prince Frederick assembled his own "kapelle," even though his father refused to maintain one. As King he was a steadfast patron of the arts, devoting his leisure, as he himself says, to personal practice of them. His household included Johann-Joachim Quantz, the foremost flutist of his day, as soloist, teacher and composer to the King; Carl-Heinrich Graun, as Kapellmeister and teacher of composition; Philip-Emanuel Bach as cembalist. Frederick wrote many sonatas and concertos for the flute upon which he played devotedly and skilfully, as well as music in other forms. His symphonies are not numerous. That in D major, to be played at Symphony Hall, is the only one that employs wind instruments in addition to strings. In the act of musical creation, the royal composer must have received help from his teachers; for his biographers make a point of it that in this particular symphony he had no assistance. Quantz is reported as having said to Nicolai: "The King showed me the score; in his presence I looked it over, but made no corrections beyond calling his attention to a few notes which were obviously mere errors in notation, and which the King changed." Spitta also vouches for the "blameless purity" of the piece.

Without Frederick's knowledge, the Symphony in D was printed, at the instigation of his sister, in 1743 (generally considered also as the year of composition) for a surprise for him. There are three movements—Allegro, Andante, Allegro Scherzando. In the original it is said to have been scored for two oboes, two horns and strings in the first and last movements; for two flutes and two violins in the Andante. The present editor, Gustav Lenzewski, in a foreword to his version says that he reconstructed the score from the printed parts of the edition of 1743. His orchestration, however, calls for flutes, oboes, horns, bassoons, piano, in addition to strings. With him also, the Andante is a flute-duet with violin accompaniment.

The scholar of today will be struck by the marked inclination toward sonata-form in the first movement, since strong tendencies toward that form are generally attributed to Philip-Emanuel Bach. There is a fluid first subject; a short but strong contrast. There is suggestion of development and recapitulation. The slow movement is melodic, as would be expected of a flute-duet in slow tempo. The last movement is a rather bright dance rhythm. The music is not highly original. It recalls occasionally the sons of Bach, occasionally Handel—a curious detail in view of the fact that Frederick chose to hear little, if any of Handel's music. His favorite composers were Quantz, Graun, Philip-Emanuel Bach and Frederick. But Frederick's father had oboists play whole operas of Handel to put him to sleep. Did this plant in the boy a seed for a future style? But the whole Symphony reminds one of his musical biographers of Diabelli!

To Introduce Janin

There is practically no biographical material forthcoming about Jacques Janin, other than the fact that he studied at the Paris Conservatory between 1909 and 1914 under Taudon, Caussade and Paul Vidal. The war created a hiatus in his musical activities, but he has since written prolifically. The title-page of the score of his Symphony, still in manuscript contains the dedication to Georges Bouche, and the title: Symphonie spirituelle, "Alleluia!" It is scored for the usual woodwinds, six horns, a trumpet piccolo in D, two trumpets in C, a trumpet-bass in F, trombones and tuba, the usual percussion and strings, organ, harp and celesta. At the end of the score stands the date, July 20, 1928.

Symphony Hall contributes the following synopsis, source not indicated:

> "Alleluia on Earth and in Heaven" denotes the nature of this symphony: On earth intense rejoicing, tumultuous joy of souls who hold and live in God; in the heavens, a canticle of a more reflective religiosity, but not the less positive. It is heard afar; it comes nearer and at last bursts forth in full force. Mingled with these is a ritualitic lament, the grief of angels at man's impiety. The two motives are alternately employed and are blended, gradualy diminishing. Then the Alleluia is heard on earth in unbounded power."

As would be expected from this program, the piece runs in three divisions—a first which is evidently an Allegro, though the composer has not so indicated; a second, "Un poco plus lent"; finally, "Allegro ben marcato." In the first Allegro there are two opposing principles (which is probably fairer than to say two themes). The first is heard at once in the strings; the second comes in soon after for organ alone, later for organ with brass. Still farther on there is a slightly more lyric theme which yields contrapuntal imitations and a stretto. The slow section begins with a lyric motiv in flutes and clarinets, punctuated with strings. The final Allegro is short, mounting quickly to a strong climax. It is characteristic of Janin to change meter almost incessantly. The first two pages of his score bear the following succession of meter-signatures: 13-16, 9-16, 10-16, 15-16, 20-16.

A. H. M.

He Who Dreams

Jacques Janin

Composer of the New Symphony, "Alleluia," To Be Played at the Symphony Concerts This Week

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

FEB 1 -

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzsky's Bostonians Give Superb Performance in Program That Repeats Two Much-Discussed New Works

ORCHESTRAL playing of the highest quality lifted last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall to a place among the most memorable events of an unmemorable season. It was playing that may fairly be said to have transcended the quality of the music played in every instance save that of the Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"—since these are worthy of all the art of performance that can be lavished upon them by the most highly sensitized and fastidious hand. Serge Koussevitzky and his Bostonians some seasons ago gave us an almost miraculous performance of "Fetes," and if it was not quite equaled last night—something of the effect of the phantom procession being lost by reason of the too appreciable pause before this episode began—here was such Debussy playing as Manhattan has not heard in this music from any other orchestra or any other conductor. "Nuages" may have been less fleecy, less gossamer-like than was to be expected of Mr. Koussevitzky, but it was impossible to escape the sheer beauty of the ensemble.

Prokofieff's so-called "Classical" Symphony and two of the most discussed of recent novelties, Honegger's "Rugby" and Bloch's "America," were the other numbers which conspired to make the program an unusual one and to give opportunity, in the Honegger and Bloch works, for comparisons that redounded altogether to the glorification of the Koussevitzkyans. Mr. Honegger achieved no such brilliant results with his football jeu d'esprit as did the Boston leader, competent as was the Philharmonic performance of ten days ago led by the composer. Brilliance, however, only made the more clear that this is a work of no very notable inspiration. It is mildly amusing in its stridulous way, achieves a certain vitality by virtue of hard labor and bespeaks a superior craftsman, but all ends in a lesser "Pacific 231," one that has been slightly humanized, but is musically only of slight and unoriginal content.

THE little Prokofieff symphony, said to have been written with the thought of bringing back the spirit of Mozart and putting down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores, was deliciously delineated. Prokofieff was not the man to recapture the tenderness nor yet the suppleness of the master he imitated, but he wrote music of wit and gayety, none the less appealing, because in its eighteenth-century guise it has something of the brittleness and the diamantine flash of his own harder era. In form and substance it is nearer a Mozart serenade or divertimento than a symphony. Concision is not the least of its good qualities.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 1 - 1929

Boston Symphony

There are a number of interesting episodes in the career of Serge Koussevitsky, the famous Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But probably there is no incident so entirely out of the ordinary, as the musical world goes, as his three trips down the Volga.

Some legends have arisen about these Volga tours. One is that the concerts were free. They were not. Koussevitzky never patronized these most unusual of symphony publics. They paid the regular theater prices, listened to the concert in their own town theaters; and were served with regular symphony programs.

Even the box office receipts Koussevitsky's Volga tours involved an appalling deficit. It is no simple matter to hire a hundred fine musicians, charter a steamer with accommodations for two hundred (counting musicians' wives, crew and friends) and sail for 2500 miles, stopping at towns of all sorts along the way. Each tour lasted about four weeks.

The orchestra will be at the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon. Good seats are available at McCoy's, and mail orders will be filled by F. A. Sedgwick, 89 Asylum Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 1 - 1929

Koussevitzky And His Boston Orchestra Here

Contemporary Composers' Works Chosen for Opening Concert of 3d Visit

Bloch Symphony Given

Honneger's 'Rugby' Featured; Other Appearances

By Francis D. Perkins

Mr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began their third New York visit of the season last night in Carnegie Hall with an all-twentieth century program, except for Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," whose premiere antedated that of this century by less than a month. He prefaced the Debussy works with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, and completed his list with Arthur Honegger's "orchestral movement," "Rugby," and Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America."

Mr. Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges who unanimously chose the Bloch symphony for the prize given by "Musical America," and one of the conductors who took part in its nearly-simultaneous premiere in several American cities, would seem to be one of its most devoted interpreters.

To Play Three Times Here

Having repeated it in his two principal Boston series, he is giving three New York hearings to it, including tonight's Brookyn performance and tomorrow afternoon's in Carnegie Hall. Honegger's "Rugby" is also receiving its third and fourth Manhattan performances, and its first hearing in the transpontine borough.

Of course the audiences which hear Mr. Koussevitzky's New York performances of the Bloch and Honegger works are, at least to some extent, different from each other and from the Philharmonic-Symphony audiences which heard "America" under Damrosch in December and "Rugby" under its composer in January, and, as both are among the most interesting of the new works offered us so far this season, the Bostonians' triple performance is readily justifiable.

The Honegger depiction of a football game—psychological rather than pictorial, according to the program notes—had rewarding moments, especially in the proclamative brass near the close. It is spirited, sometimes brilliant, but sometimes lets interest lapse, despite its shortness.

"America" Is Analyzed

"America" has met with various opinions, but is undoubtedly the most ponderable novelty so far produced here in 1928-'29. A second hearing last night bore out the impressions of the first performance—that the "epic rhapsody" contains much eloquent and potent music, notably skillful and richly colored orchestration and unusually dextrous and effective interweaving of folk and popular melodies; that Bloch has almost succeeded in his stupendous attempt, but not quite. For his prolonged final climax, he must pile Pelion upon Ossa, reaching the supreme moment after the magnificent pages of preparation. But here comes the weak point of the work, the anthem which, apart from its reminiscences, is music of an inferior order.

The anthem was well sung by members of the Oratorio Society and the Glee Club of New York University, whose directors are Albert Stoessel and Alfred Greenfield. No attempt, apparently, was made to induce the audience to rise and join in, previous experience, perhaps, having shown that our symphony audiences do not incline readily to song.

The strong points of "America" were convincingly set forth last night in a superb performance, memorable for its color and potency, which proved Mr. Koussevitzky's devotion to the work well worth while. There were "Bravos" as well as manual plaudits at the close, while "Rugby" received polite, but not ardent applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HARTFORD NEXT SUNDAY

Once a year, the Hartford public is fortunate enough to have the opportunity of hearing one of the finest orchestras in the world, under the direction of the greatest conductor, Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony orchestra which will be heard Sunday afternoon at the Capitol theater, is experiencing the most remarkable season of its career, under the leadership of Koussevitzky, who is on his fourth season with the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is a magnetic personality, and his readings of the faster works are of the highest type, he having been styled "a virtuoso conductor."

A fine program is promised for the Hartford concert. The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's Music store, Hartford, under Mr. Sedgewick's direction. Good seats are available, and mail orders will be filled by mailing check to F. A. Sedgewick, 89 Asylum St.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N.Y. AMERICAN

FEB 1 - 1929

BLOCH'S 'AMERICA' BY BOSTON BAND

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ONE of the season's symphonic futilities, Ernest Bloch's "America," for orchestra and chorus-finale, wound up the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last evening.

The composition had its New York premiere a few weeks ago under Philharmonic auspices. Since then it has been played by most of the other symphony orchestras in this country.

On the occasion of its first performance here this department gave the full "story" of the opus, consequently there is no need to do more now than to remind the faithful reader that its measures represent an effort to tonalize some of the salient events that have to do with the American spirit of personal freedom and spiritual liberation. Quotations from Walt Whitman poems are used as mottoes for many episodes in the Bloch pages. He winds up his lengthy work with a new American national anthem.

The whole symphony is dedicated to our people as a tribute of the admiration and love which they inspire in Ernest Bloch. (Will that other Ernest, Herr Krenek, who pokes heavy fun at us in his "Johnny Strikes Up the Band," please take particular notice?)

Somehow Bloch's symphonic compliment is as clumsy and overburdened as the operatic parody of Krenek, even though the former is a much finer musical craftsman. Krenek merely scraped the surface of Americanism with his jazz accents; Bloch does the same thing when he utilizes tunes like "Pop Goes the Weasel," "Dixie," "Old Hundred," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," "Old Folks at Home," etc.

Bloch does strike some reflective and soulful moods and he garbs them in dignified and finely-made musical and orchestral dress, but his effort to follow the flag too closely gives his huge production a topical character that very largely defeats its underlying lofty purpose.

The new national anthem (sung last night by a chorus from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club, although Bloch desires the audience to join vocally in the performance) is puerile in its music and commonplace in its words.

Serge Koussevitzky put life and enthusiasm into his conducting, and the Boston orchestral forces played with all their customary musical and technical finish, but nevertheless the listeners failed to reward "America" with more than moderate applause.

A far higher degree of enthusiasm met Debussy's fragile and shadowy "Clouds" and "Festivals," tone-poems which have no patriotic or commemorative intention. Beauty of tone and delicacy of phrasing marked their delivery.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," also heard here before, would be a strange bed-fellow for the classical symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven and Brahms, and its cold feet would disturb even the lesser exalted masters like Franck, Bruckner, Schumann and Berlioz. The music of Prokofieff gives out an icy chill; only its name and formal shell are "classical."

Koussevitzky's peculiar programme included also Honegger's football scherzo, "Rugby," that ineffectual and tuneless series of contrapuntal geometrics which its composer led here recently at a Philharmonic concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

FEB 1

Standees at the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall concert last night flinched under the eagle eye of a fireman stationed in the back of the auditorium. New York's fire laws allow only forty standees, and the flame-eater was counting the footsore group.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
FEB 2 - 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Music's Subservience to the Machine, and the Visit of the Composer of "Pacific 231"

ARTHUR HONEGGER has been among us, as composer, conductor and pianist. No pressing need arises to discuss him in either of the two latter capacities. His personality as it reached his audiences at the Philharmonic and Pro-Musica concerts was not a strange or a baffling one. It comported with his music as being full-blooded, well-muscled, suave and yet capable of a certain machine-like hardness which may be assumed to be one of the characteristics of the art of an unsentimental age. There was almost nothing of exoticism about the man or his music. Like him or not, accept or reject his art product, both conveyed the sense of conviction and honesty.

Though some of the works presented at the Pro-Musica's so-called Honegger Festival were of negligible effect, it is only necessary to recall the disappointing triteness of lesser works of Igor Stravinsky presented in connection with the visit of the illustrious Muscovite four years ago to find a parallel instance of composer of large achievement minified through exposition of the frailties of his preliminary or secondary labors. The spectacle of Richard Strauss presiding over a concert devoted to chamber music that might have been the work of almost any fairly gifted musician of the days of Max Reger remains a memory as curious, in view of his still unsurpassed mastery in the handling of orchestral masses, as the thought of Beethoven composing music for ballroom purposes or Wagner making piano arrangements of airs from Italian operas.

HONEGGER'S chamber music has personality. His characteristic use of atonality is as recognizable in his smaller compositions as in those orchestral and theatrical works on which his fame rests. But since atonality is only a means to an end, there is now in some of this music, much as it may have struck his associates some years ago as distinctive or daring, the quality of the demonstration, the example or praxis in something that no longer needs to be demonstrated, rather than the afflatus of vital music. This listener at the Pro-Musica concert of last week could only confess himself mystified by the new work for two pianos which then had its first performance anywhere. Was it a throw-back to the days of Eric Satie and the influence of Jean Cocteau, with parody as its aim? Was it a work of that category which caused Egon Wellesz of Vienna to lament the "saddening spectacle," "how everywhere, in all countries, a species of musical humor is coming to the front which is incapable of eliciting a smile from any one but the author"—as another of "the manifestations of reaction against romantic exuberance of feeling which might be called the Music of [illegible]

OF THE NEW HONEGGER orchestral work, "Rugby," first played in Manhattan by the Philharmonic under the composer's leadership and subsequently by the Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, enough has been said in the reviews of those concerts. Mr. Koussevitzky had been something of a Honegger specialist—to him it may be remembered, fell the distinction of conducting in Paris the first performance anywhere of "Horace Victorieux" and "Pacific 231"—and as he is also one of the world's really great conductors it was not surprising that he made the new work sound more robust and more exciting—if exciting it really was—than the composer, who is not a great conductor, nor yet a bad one, succeeded in doing. Nor was Honegger's projection of "Pacific 231" of Koussevitzky brilliance.

Yet of the Honegger works, old or new, brought to hearing because of the composer's visit, unquestionably that which most powerfully asserted the gifts of this paladin of modernity was "Pacific 231." It remains his most characteristic and most convincing achievement. And because, of all his adventures in many forms, it is this glorification of the machine that has most firmly established Honegger among the handful of really notable composers of the day, Honegger, symbol of an epoch, becomes the center of far graver questions than those prompted by atonality, polytonality or popular jazz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
FEB

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 o'clock. Assisted by chorus from Oratorio Society and New York University Glee Club.

Classical Symphony, Opus 25.....Prokofieff
Clouds; Festivals.....Debussy
"Rugby".....Honegger
"America".....Bloch
Orchestra and Chorus.

"Plugging," a word hitherto known exclusively to Tin Pan Alley, bids fair, like jazz, to invade the classical corner of Seventh Avenue and 57th Street. That at least is the conclusion to be drawn from Mr. Koussevitzky's crusade for Ernest Bloch's prize-winning epic rhapsody "America," which the Boston leader and his orchestra gave us last night with the assistance of the Oratorio Society and the University Glee Club.

Only five weeks ago Mr. Damrosch and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra introduced Mr. Bloch's epic to New York, a premiere which somehow failed to move an audience fed for weeks on printed reports of the patriotic magnitude of the Whitmanesque rhapsody. The newspaper boys too were lukewarm and some even downright irreverent in their analyses of the musical epic, a condition which may account for Mr. Koussevitzky's zeal in coming all the way from Boston to give the piece another chance. But how can one account for the promised repetition of "America" at the Boston matinee next Saturday? Is it possible that Mr. Koussevitzky knows best and that "America" is indeed a masterpiece?

I almost hesitate to report that a second hearing of the "prize" left me as unmoved as the first, though the Bostonians, inspired by their leader, lavished tons of superb playing on it. It goes without saying that Mr. Bloch shows himself in his latest opus, as in his other compositions, one of the most expert craftsmen of our age. But craftsmanship is a long way from inspiration, an element of which "America" is, I think, devoid.

Certainly in contriving the hymn upon which his rhapsody is based the composer has even abandoned that discrimination which he has often exercised in the past, for the tune is one of the most incredible platitudes ever penned by a gifted or any other kind of musician. What is worse, Mr. Bloch hands it out in bits, grudgingly, as if it were too precious a gift to tender whole.

Mr. Koussevitzky seems also fanatical about Mr. Honegger's football piece, "Rugby," which the composer himself brought to our attention a week ago Saturday night. Again, for all we know, this too may be a masterpiece. The "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff and Debussy's "Nocturnes" began the evening, throughout which Mr. Koussevitzky and his band managed their jobs in a manner reminiscent of the pre-war Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
FEB 1 - 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

THE articles of the next contest in musical composition should subjoin a stipulation that all awards will be void in case the winner suffers his opus to be performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch. Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which recently prevailed in Musical America's $3,000 competition, underwent at Carnegie Hall last night its second interpretation in this city, at the hands of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The exposure of the first production's betrayal was complete, pitiless and satanic.

This does not signify that the predominantly unfavorable verdict pronounced after the premiere of this work, by myself among others, is now to be totally reversed. The score still harbors, in my opinion, quantities of ill-advised and perishable stuff. What was not previously disclosed was that the manuscript also embodies crises of genius which flame with the incandescence of white-hot metal—that there are pages of a titanic energy, effulgence and sublimity which cannot soon let themselves expire.

* * *

Even Mr. Bloch's national anthem, proposed as a substitute for "The Star-Spangled Banner," emerged with new dignity, though on the former occasion there was none so poor as to give it reverence. Mr. Koussevitzky wisely disregarded the composer's plea that the audience should stand and sing the hymn, committing the vocal finale to a chorus selected from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club.

The fiery sincerity and majesty with which the Boston visitor proclaimed the psalm had much to do with its redemption. But the chief factor was the inescapable prominence which he conferred on the amazing feats of development to which Mr. Bloch had subjected this theme before flinging it forth at the last in its stark simplicity. Though still convinced of the melody's intrinsic mediocrity, one could not refuse respect to a musical kernel which had given rise to such tropical forests of sound. Not with perfunctory applause or hostility did last night's capacity audience put a period to the performance. It was an ovation which blazed aloft to salute a triumph.

* * *

During the first movement and the opening half of the second the writer yesterday evening remained unimpressed by the matter of the music. It was the fresh revelation of the composer's astounding workmanship which stamped itself upon the attention. The substance was frankly and confessedly derivative, instead of original. In the interest of erudite accuracy, I suppose, Mr. Bloch ransacked the archives for authentic Indian and English melodies and American folk songs of every complexion. These, so far as they were familiar, were literally quoted, in a sort of glorified medley. It was as if one should write history by pasting up clippings.

There came to mind Dvorak's procedure with one of the finest spirituals, "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," in the "New World" symphony. The Bohemian composer might have cited the melody without alteration. Instead, he absorbed it into his consciousness. Every superfluous note was eliminated and the tune even emerged with a new conclusion. It became in every way more succinct, serviceable and distinguished. Mr. Bloch's method was the objective one of letting "Swanee River" and "Pop Goes the Weasel" stand as melodies, and to garb them outwardly in all the wonders of counterpoint and harmony at his command.

* * *

It was in the second half of the Allegretto, entitled "Hours of Sorrow," that Mr. Bloch began really to find his own voice, in a lament upon the Civil War, the penetrating sadness of which still lingers upon the nerves as this is written, some hours later.

And then, with the beginning of the third movement, the composer loosed the invective of his hatred upon the present day in America, symbolized by jazz. Here was authentic passion, raucous and indignant. The mood passed into one of profound mourning, from which, with presages of America's future, the composer's spirit swept from the ground and pierced the sky upon pinions the mighty beat of which appeared to shake the horizon. The exultation of that apotheosis, blindingly radiant, puissant as an army with banners, will long thunder its march across the memory.

* * *

Earlier in the evening, Mr. Koussevitzky had rescued another work, this time from the clutches of its own composer. It was the orchestral movement "Rugby," by Arthur Honegger, which the Swiss modernist recently conducted on a Philharmonic-Symphony program. Authoritative reports were that the composition seemed to be another orgy of mechanical rhythm, a lesser "Pacific 231."

To the contrary, last night, "Rugby" soared upward as a creation incomparably more engaging, musical and sympathetic than the notorious locomotive piece. What the new work had to do with football one cared little. Certainly nothing of the realism of "Pacific 231" was forced upon the hearer. The vigorous thrust and collision of metres served only as muscular energy for music wholesome, youthful and wholly delightful. Thanks to the Bostonians, Mr. Honegger now stands exculpated from his own plea of guilty.

* * *

The program opened with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, a brief, charming and graceful work modeled upon Mozart, and proceeded to the "Clouds" and "Festivals" of Debussy, in the latter of which the famous processional met with a performance fit to shock one from his seat with its electricity.

Once more, throughout the program, the Boston organization proved itself the unquestioned sovereign of American orchestras, with Mr. Koussevitzky as one of the great trio composed of himself and Messrs. Stokowski and Toscanini.

ARTHUR WARWICK

Arthur Warwick's poetic temperament found utterance in interpretations of definite charm at his piano recital at Steinway Hall yesterday evening. His modest poise and earnestness of purpose won immediate favor from a large audience, who were not slow to come under the spell of his refined and tasteful treatment of the instrument.

There was an intimate quality about his playing, which, with a warm, sympathetic singing touch and a fluent technique, combined to make his efforts extremely pleasing. Mr. Warwick possesses individuality and a good sense of style. If his work was not of the brilliant, flashy variety, it had less common merits to make up for that deficiency.

He was especially at home in numbers calling for delicacy and atmosphere, like Zeckwer's "En Bateau," which won a repetition, or the "Vent dans la Plaine" and "Voiles" of Debussy. His program also contained the "Sonata Eroica" of MacDowell, Liszt's seldom-heard Fouth Rhapsody, and the Liszt Variations on a theme by Bach.

NOEL STRAUS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
~~AMERICAN~~
FEB 1 - 1929

BOSTON SINGERS JOIN ORCHESTRA IN "RHAPSODY"

125 Voices Lend Volume as Bloch's "America" Is Presented.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

Special Dispatch from a Staff Correspondent.

New York, Feb. 1.—Combined with the Boston symphony orchestra, the oratoric society and the New York University Glee club, a mixed chorus of about 125 singers, presented under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," as the big number of their symphony concert this evening at Carnegie hall.

The auditorium seats about 3,500 and was filled to the doors.

The addition of a mixed chorus to Bloch's composition gives a certain glamour to its last movement, but the orchestra continues the finale alone, which is almost anticlimatic, though Conductor Koussevitzky spurred on the brasses and the entire orchestral ensemble to great volumes of sound.

Skill Reveals Itself.

On repeated hearing one becomes aware of the masterly skill and the remarkable talents that Bloch possesses for symphonic writing. His uses of North American Indian, Negro and folk and patriotic American airs and themes are examples of harmonic and contrapuntal dexterities. His own themes, even the one upon which the anthem at the end, in the rendition of which the chorus is employed, is rather trite and not wholly original.

The orchestra under Koussevitzky gave the work a clear and artistic interpretation, and there was vigor and rhythmic snap in the "jazzy" parts of the last movement. The chorus sang with good tone balance and tonal volume. The conductors of the choruses are Albert Stoessel and Alfred Greenfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
FEB 1 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS MODERNS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives an Exhibition of Virtuoso Playing.

By PITTS SANBORN.

So much of the concert of the visiting Boston Symphony as I heard last evening at Carnegie Hall was marked by playing of superlative quality. The composers—Prokofieff, Debussy, Honegger—were doubtless dear to Mr. Koussevitzky's heart, and he interpreted their works with cherishing care and an uncanny feeling for orchestral tone.

Rehearing the "Classical" symphony of Prokofieff confirms me in my belief that its composer in his "advanced" phase is really a distorted classicist. This little symphony is a delicious trifle Some profess to be enraged because the sacred name of Mozart has been mentioned in connection with it. Why? Nobody is foolish enough to set it up in rivalry with Mozart, and, anyway, its Mozart had heard Rimsky-Korsakoff and Stravinsky. A description of the performance under Mr. Koussevitzky's guidance would beggar the vocabulary of praise. The audience, which packed Carnegie Hall, accorded this opening number an ovation.

To the "Clouds" and "Festivals" of Debussy Mr. Koussevitzky gave surpassingly fine treatment. Less vaporous than the usual reading, a trifle steelly even, the orchestral playing imparted to the former a texture as of wire-drawn gossamer, beaded with infinitesimal gray rain drops. The procession that traversed "Festivals" was of a rutilant brilliance quite beyond compare.

I had missed "Rugby" when Mr. Honegger himself introduced it here at a Philharmonic concert, so my impression of it last evening was without influence of memory. In what seemed to me to be a performance of the very first order it emerged as an unimaginative, unnecessary noise. Mr. Honegger as the engine-driver of "Pacific 231" I heartily admire, but as a football captain—well, not yet. At the conclusion of the piece there was moderate applause and some hissing.

The rest of the concert was devoted to Ernest Bloch's "America." I had sat dutifully through this "epic rhapsody" once, and not all the bright seraphim in burning row with their loud uplifted angel trumpets blowing would tempt me to repeat such a session of unprofitable boredom.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

FEB 2 - 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Music's Subservience to the Machine, and the Visit of the Composer of "Pacific 231"

ARTHUR HONEGGER has been among us, as composer, conductor and pianist. No pressing need arises to discuss him in either of the two latter capacities. His personality as it reached his audiences at the Philharmonic and Pro-Musica concerts was not a strange or a baffling one. It comported with his music as being full-blooded, well-muscled, suave and yet capable of a certain machine-like hardness which may be assumed to be one of the characteristics of the art of an unsentimental age. There was almost nothing of exoticism about the man or his music. Like him or not, accept or reject his art product, both conveyed the sense of conviction and honesty.

Though some of the works presented at the Pro-Musica's so-called Honegger Festival were of negligible effect, it is only necessary to recall the disappointing triteness of lesser works of Igor Stravinsky presented in connection with the visit of the illustrious Muscovite four years ago to find a parallel instance of composer of large achievement minified through exposition of the fruits of his preliminary or secondary labors. The spectacle of Richard Strauss presiding over a concert devoted to chamber music that might have been the work of almost any fairly gifted musician of the days of Max Reger remains a memory as curious, in view of his still unsurpassed mastery in the handling of orchestral masses, as the thought of Beethoven composing music for ballroom purposes or Wagner making piano arrangements of airs from Italian operas.

HONEGGER'S chamber music has personality. His characteristic use of atonality is as recognizable in his smaller compositions as in those orchestral and theatrical works on which his fame rests. But since atonality is only a means to an end, there is now in some of this music, much as it may have struck his associates some years ago as distinctive or daring, the quality of the demonstration, the example or praxis in something that no longer needs to be demonstrated, rather than the afflatus of vital music. This listener at the Pro-Musica concert of last week could only confess himself mystified by the new work for two pianos which then had its first performance anywhere. Was it a throw-back to the days of Eric Satie and the influence of Jean Cocteau, with parody as its aim? Was it a work of that category which caused Egon Wellesz of Vienna to lament the "saddening spectacle," "how everywhere, in all countries, a species of musical humor is coming to the front which is incapable of eliciting a smile from any one but its author"—as another of "the manifestations of reaction against romantic exuberance of feeling which might be called the [illegible] or the Music of [illegible]

OF THE NEW HONEGGER orchestral work, "Rugby," first played in Manhattan by the Philharmonic under the composer's leadership and subsequently by the Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, enough has been said in the reviews of those concerts. Mr. Koussevitzky had been something of a Honegger specialist—to him, it may be remembered, fell the distinction of conducting in Paris the first performance anywhere of "Horace Victorieux" and "Pacific 231"—and as he is also one of the world's really great conductors it was not surprising that he made the new work sound more robust and more exciting—if exciting it really was—than the composer, who is not a great conductor, nor yet a bad one, succeeded in doing. Nor was Honegger's projection of "Pacific 231" of Koussevitzky brilliance.

Yet of the Honegger works, old or new, brought to hearing because of the composer's visit, unquestionably that which most powerfully asserted the gifts of this paladin of modernity was "Pacific 231." It remains his most characteristic and most convincing achievement. And because, of all his adventures in many forms, it is this glorification of the machine that has most firmly established Honegger among the handful of really notable composers of the day, Honegger, symbol of an epoch, becomes the center of far graver questions than those prompted by atonality, polytonality or popular jazz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

FEB

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M. Assisted by chorus from Oratorio Society and New York University Glee Club.

Classical Symphony, Opus 25.....Prokofieff
Clouds; Festivals.....Debussy
"Rugby".....Honegger
"America".....Bloch
Orchestra and Chorus.

"Plugging," a word hitherto known exclusively to Tin Pan Alley, bids fair, like jazz, to invade the classical corner of Seventh Avenue and 57th Street. That at least is the conclusion to be drawn from Mr. Koussevitzky's crusade for Ernest Bloch's prize-winning epic rhapsody "America," which the Boston leader and his orchestra gave us last night with the assistance of the Oratorio Society and the University Glee Club.

Only five weeks ago Mr. Damrosch and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra introduced Mr. Bloch's epic to New York, a premiere which somehow failed to move an audience fed for weeks on printed reports of the patriotic magnitude of the Whitmanesque rhapsody. The newspaper boys too were lukewarm and some even downright irreverent in their analyses of the musical epic, a condition which may account for Mr. Koussevitzky's zeal in coming all the way from Boston to give the piece another chance. But how can one account for the promised appearance of "America" at the Boston's matinee next Saturday? Is it possible that Mr. Koussevitzky knows best and that "America" is indeed a masterpiece?

I almost hesitate to report that a second hearing of the "prize" left me as unmoved as the first, though the Bostonians, inspired by their leader, lavished tons of superb playing on it. It goes without saying that Mr. Bloch shows himself in his latest opus, as in his other compositions, one of the most expert craftsmen of our age. But craftsmanship is a long way from inspiration, an element of which "America" is, I think, devoid.

Certainly in contriving the hymn upon which his rhapsody is based the composer has even abandoned that discrimination which he has often exercised in the past, for the tune is one of the most incredible platitudes ever penned by a gifted or any other kind of musician. What is worse, Mr. Bloch hands it out in bits, grudgingly, as if it were too precious a gift to tender whole.

Mr. Koussevitzky seems also fanatical about Mr. Honegger's football piece, "Rugby," which the composer himself brought to our attention a week ago Saturday night. Again, for all we know, this too may be a masterpiece. The "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff and Debussy's "Nocturnes" began the evening, throughout which Mr. Koussevitzky and his band managed their jobs in a manner reminiscent of the pre-war Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

FEB 1 - 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

THE articles of the next contest in musical composition should subjoin a stipulation that all awards will be void in case the winner suffers his opus to be performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch. Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which recently prevailed in Musical America's $3,000 competition, underwent at Carnegie Hall last night its second interpretation in this city, at the hands of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The exposure of the first production's betrayal was complete, pitiless and satanic.

This does not signify that the predominantly unfavorable verdict pronounced after the premiere of this work, by myself among others, is now to be totally reversed. The score still harbors, in my opinion, quantities of ill-advised and perishable stuff. What was not previously disclosed was that the manuscript also embodies crises of genius which flame with the incandescence of white-hot metal—that there are pages of a titanic energy, effulgence and sublimity which cannot soon let themselves expire.

* * *

Even Mr. Bloch's national anthem, proposed as a substitute for "The Star-Spangled Banner," emerged with new dignity, though on the former occasion there was none so poor as to give it reverence. Mr. Koussevitzky wisely disregarded the composer's plea that the audience should stand and sing the hymn, committing the vocal finale to a chorus selected from the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club.

The fiery sincerity and majesty with which the Boston visitor proclaimed the psalm had much to do with its redemption. But the chief factor was the inescapable prominence which he conferred on the amazing feats of development to which Mr. Bloch had subjected this theme before flinging it forth at the last in its stark simplicity. Though still convinced of the melody's intrinsic mediocrity, one could not refuse respect to a musical kernel which had given rise to such tropical forests of sound. Not with perfunctory applause or hostility did last night's capacity audience put a period to the performance. It was an ovation which blazed aloft to salute a triumph.

* * *

During the first movement and the opening half of the second the writer yesterday evening remained unimpressed by the matter of the music. It was the fresh revelation of the composer's astounding workmanship which stamped itself upon the attention. The substance was frankly and confessedly derivative, instead of original. In the interest of erudite accuracy, I suppose, Mr. Bloch ransacked the archives for authentic Indian and English melodies and American folk songs of every complexion. These, so far as they were familiar, were literally quoted, in a sort of glorified medley. It was as if one should write history by pasting up clippings.

There came to mind Dvorak's procedure with one of the finest spirituals, "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," in the "New World" symphony. The Bohemian composer might have cited the melody without alteration. Instead, he absorbed it into his consciousness. Every superfluous note was eliminated and the tune even emerged with a new conclusion. It became in every way more succinct, serviceable and distinguished. Mr. Bloch's method was the objective one of letting "Swanee River" and "Pop Goes the Weasel" stand as melodies, and to garb them outwardly in all the wonders of counterpoint and harmony at his command.

* * *

It was in the second half of the Allegretto, entitled "Hours of Sorrow," that Mr. Bloch began really to find his own voice, in a lament upon the Civil War, the penetrating sadness of which still lingers upon the nerves as this is written, some hours later.

And then, with the beginning of the third movement, the composer loosed the invective of his hatred upon the present day in America, symbolized by jazz. Here was authentic passion, rancorous and indignant. The mood passed into one of profound mourning, from which, with presages of America's future, the composer's spirit swept from the ground and pierced the sky upon pinions the mighty beat of which appeared to shake the horizon. The exultation of that apotheosis, blindingly radiant, puissant as an army with banners, will long thunder its march across the memory.

* * *

Earlier in the evening, Mr. Koussevitzky had rescued another work, this time from the clutches of its own composer. It was the orchestral movement "Rugby," by Arthur Honegger, which the Swiss modernist recently conducted on a Philharmonic-Symphony program. Authoritative reports were that the composition seemed to be another orgy of mechanical rhythm, a lesser "Pacific 231."

To the contrary, last night, "Rugby" soared upward as a creation incomparably more engaging, musical and sympathetic than the notorious locomotive piece. What the new work had to do with football one cared little. Certainly nothing of the realism of "Pacific 231" was forced upon the hearer. The vigorous thrust and collision of metres served only as muscular energy for music wholesome, youthful and wholly delightful. Thanks to the Bostonians, Mr. Honegger now stands exculpated from his own plea of guilty.

* * *

The program opened with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, a brief, charming and graceful work modeled upon Mozart, and proceeded to the "Clouds" and "Festivals" of Debussy, in the latter of which the famous processional met with a performance fit to shock one from his seat with its electricity.

Once more, throughout the program, the Boston organization proved itself the unquestioned sovereign of American orchestras, with Mr. Koussevitzky as one of the great trio composed of himself and Messrs. Stokowski and Toscanini.

ARTHUR WARWICK

Arthur Warwick's poetic temperament found utterance in interpretations of definite charm at his piano recital at Steinway Hall yesterday evening. His modest poise and earnestness of purpose won immediate favor from a large audience, who were not slow to come under the spell of his refined and tasteful treatment of the instrument.

There was an intimate quality about his playing, which, with a warm, sympathetic singing touch and a fluent technique, combined to make his efforts extremely pleasing. Mr. Warwick possesses individuality and a good sense of style. If his work was not of the brilliant, flashy variety, it had less common merits to make up for that deficiency.

He was especially at home in numbers calling for delicacy and atmosphere, like Zeckwer's "En Bateau," which won a repetition, or the "Vent dans la Plaine" and "Voiles" of Debussy. His program also contained the "Sonata Eroica" of MacDowell, Liszt's seldom-heard Fouth Rhapsody, and the Liszt Variations on a theme by Bach.

NOEL STRAUS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

FEB 1 - 1929

BOSTON SINGERS JOIN ORCHESTRA IN "RHAPSODY"

125 Voices Lend Volume as Bloch's "America" Is Presented.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.
Special Dispatch from a Staff Correspondent.

New York, Feb. 1.—Combined with the Boston symphony orchestra, the oratoric society and the New York University Glee club, a mixed chorus of about 125 singers, presented under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," as the big number of their symphony concert this evening at Carnegie hall.

The auditorium seats about 3,500 and was filled to the doors.

The addition of a mixed chorus to Bloch's composition gives a certain glamour to its last movement, but the orchestra continues the finale alone, which is almost anticlimatic, though Conductor Koussevitzky spurred on the brasses and the entire orchestral ensemble to great volumes of sound.

Skill Reveals Itself.

On repeated hearing one becomes aware of the masterly skill and the remarkable talents that Bloch possesses for symphonic writing. His uses of North American Indian, Negro and folk and patriotic American airs and themes are examples of harmonic and contrapuntal dexterities. His own themes, even the one upon which the anthem at the end, in the rendition of which the chorus is employed, is rather trite and not wholly original.

The orchestra under Koussevitzky gave the work a clear and artistic interpretation, and there was vigor and rhythmic snap in the "jazzy" parts of the last movement. The chorus sang with good tone balance and tonal volume. The conductors of the choruses are Albert Stoessel and Alfred Greenfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

FEB 1 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS MODERNS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives an Exhibition of Virtuoso Playing.

By PITTS SANBORN.

So much of the concert of the visiting Boston Symphony as I heard last evening at Carnegie Hall was marked by playing of superlative quality. The composers—Prokofieff, Debussy, Honegger—were doubtless dear to Mr. Koussevitzky's heart, and he interpreted their works with cherishing care and an uncanny feeling for orchestral tone.

Rehearing the "Classical" symphony of Prokofieff confirms me in my belief that its composer in his "advanced" phase is really a distorted classicist. This little symphony is a delicious trifle Some profess to be enraged because the sacred name of Mozart has been mentioned in connection with it. Why? Nobody is foolish enough to set it up in rivalry with Mozart, and, anyway, its Mozart had heard Rimsky-Korsakoff and Stravinsky. A description of the performance under Mr. Koussevitzky's guidance would beggar the vocabulary of praise. The audience, which packed Carnegie Hall, accorded this opening number an ovation.

To the "Clouds" and "Festivals" of Debussy Mr. Koussevitzky gave surpassingly fine treatment. Less vaporous than the usual reading, a trifle steelly even, the orchestral playing imparted to the former a texture as of wire-drawn gossamer, beaded with infinitesimal gray rain drops. The procession that traversed "Festivals" was of a rutilant brilliance quite beyond compare.

I had missed "Rugby" when Mr. Honegger himself introduced it here at a Philharmonic concert, so my impression of it last evening was without influence of memory. In what seemed to me to be a performance of the very first order it emerged as an unimaginative, unnecessary noise. Mr. Honegger as the engine-driver of "Pacific 231" I heartily admire, but as a football captain—well, not yet. At the conclusion of the piece there was moderate applause and some hissing.

The rest of the concert was devoted to Ernest Bloch's "America." I had sat dutifully through this "epic rhapsody" once, and not all the bright seraphim in burning row with their loud uplifted angel trumpets blowing would tempt me to repeat such a session of unprofitable boredom.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 1 - 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is a certain danger in the virtuoso performance of an orchestra, especially when, in addition to surpassing virtuosity on the part of the players, the conductor possesses a compelling and creative imagination. The performance can then do so much to illuminate and reinforce the inherent virtues of a composition and minimize whatever shortcomings it may possess that a reviewer's scale of values is upset and the reviewer himself bewildered and uncertain of his own opinions. And this, to be perfectly frank, was the case with one commentator when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed works by Honegger, Bloch and other composers last night in Carnegie Hall.

The moot point of the program was Ernest Bloch's symphony, or, as the work is more fittingly called by the composer, "epic rhapsody, America." It will be remembered that Walter Damrosch and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra gave the first New York performance of this score on the 19th of last December. "America" was then received with considerably qualified praise. It was rated as the work of a composer of genius, as a score characterized in many pages by consummate mastery, but, also, as an excursion into the realm of program music and as a rather unsuccessful essay in Americanism by a composer born in Europe, without the background of experience and association necessary to produce a work which should be genuinely and spiritually the product of this land.

Mr. Bloch, using many themes found on the American soil, had composed a "rhapsody" in three long movements, bound together by a phrase of the patriotic anthem which is sung by a mixed chorus as a conclusion. The score was considered so episodic, so panoramic, as to suggest in places the cinema. The final anthem, designed by the composer to be sung by audiences when his work was publicly performed, was intended as a melody which a bootblack could understand and sing. The "anthem" is as simple as that, but it was and is one of the most disappointing features of the symphony.

Now, last night, facing an audience with [illegible] experience and [illegible] ed to hear Ernst Bloch's prize epic rhapsody, "America." A chorus from the Oratorio Society and the University Glee Club had been provided to chant the composer's national hymn around which the work is written. This particular music lover, who has known the thrill of saluting the flag from the quarter-deck at colors while the band played the broad anthem prescribed by the regulations, admits that it is not easy for amateurs to sing, but he would rather try to sing it than Mr. Bloch's apostrophe to America, which might be fittingly included in a collection of Sunday school hymns.

The first movement of this work is the best, though even here the most excellent material is in quotation marks. The second movement rejoices in the presentation of some tunes which belong here, such as "Pop Goes the Weasel" (which must be astonished to find itself put to symphonic use) and the Creole "M'sieu Banjo." The last movement reaches its climax with the singing of Mr. Bloch's national anthem, which will probably continue to be his private property. Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat the symphony tomorrow afternoon, perhaps to prove that he believes in it or his own judgment. That the composition was well performed goes without saying. But this music lover prefers to hear the splendid Boston organization playing other creations.

the place that America holds in his imagination arose like a vision from the instruments.

When it is said that the work assumed a new unity, a new significance, and passionateness of expression not previously realized, allowance must be made for the fact that for many in the audience this was a second hearing. A second hearing is almost certain to result in better correlation of the parts of the score, and better perception of its meaning and its true proportions on the part of the listener. But Mr. Koussevitzy's performance came nearer and further than that. It constituted, unquestionably, a new conception of the music. Its effect was shown in the response of the audience.

The first movement, in particular, gained in nobility and sweep of horizon. The slow movement was performed without attempt to gloss over its sentimentalities, with deep feeling and a word—until the battle episodes—of haunting poetic beauty. There is heard the voice of Bloch, the prophet, cursing as cursed his ancestors of old the inequities of a people and an age—clamor which suddenly subsided, to give place to a return of the very opening of the symphony—the evocation to nature and the virgin land, the sweep of its waters and skies, the shadows of its forests, the cry of the wild bird that Whitman heard on the shores of Paumanok, calling to its mate. What was clear through this performance was the blazing emotion of the composer, his extraordinary sense of architecture as well as dramatic contrast, and his gift for sheer, direct, democratic musical speech. With which reflections the present writer purposes to leave Mr. Bloch until he has had opportunity again to revise his opinions after Mr. Kousevitsky's second performance of "America" tomorrow afternoon.

Honegger's "Rugby," had a performance in many respects superior to the recent one directed by the composer, so that this work also rose in the reviewer's estimation. It is a musical organization sufficient, without its gratuitously bestowed title, to interest the listener, and with some passages of admirable clarity, power and invention. It is not likely, however, that "Rugby" will have the importance or the success of "Pacific 23."

The detail of the evening upon which all present will probably agree was the mysterious loveliness and atmosphere bestowed upon Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes"—a performance which can only be compared for finish and sensitiveness of feeling to the interpretation of "L'Apres midi d'un faun" by Mr. Koussevitzky at his preceding visit here—and the scintillating interpretation of Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony." This is a score which, despite Mr. Koussevitzky's powers, we are unable to accept as of lasting value. Some of the "Classic" Symphony is "classic," not in the manner of a Haydn or a Mozart, but, say, a Boccherini.

Some of it, such as the opening of the slow movement, is downright cheap. Very little of it escapes the charge of plausible bluff. But the evening belonged to the orchestra. One composer—Debussy—emerged with a strength of invention and a [illegible] of beauty that neither time

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
FEB [illegible]

Boston Symphony Gives Concert

Serge Koussevitsky Presents Program of Wide Range at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town for last evening's concert like the famous Drysdale in "Tom Brown at Oxford"—"laden with swag." For Serge Koussevitzky had prepared a program of many sorts all congenial to himself and undoubtedly intended to be instructive to the audience. To begin with there was Serge Prokofieff's "Classial" symphony wherein that customarily prancing knight of modernism undertook to show us that he could roar as gently as Mozart, and he so wished.

Perhaps it was a little French Mozart that was in his mind, or the ingenuous one who told a princess of the blood that she was a nice girl and he would marry her when she grew up.

At any rate, this classical symphony is a piquant and charming piece of musical badinage, written with amazing spontaneity and with a ready assumption of grace of style. It is not an immortal masterpiece, but one does not live by these alone. Deft and ingratiating music has also its place, especially when performed as Mr. Prokofieff's was by the company of virtuosi from Symphony Hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky next entered the mystic domain of Debussy, and once again gave us his delightful reading of the "Nuages" and "Fetes." From Debussy to Honegger and his "Rugby" was a seven-league boots step, but Mr. Koussevitzky made it with his habitual savoir faire. Mr. Honegger's football composition is not new and it is not yet old, but we fear it will age early. It is a well-made score, but does not get over for a touchdown. It seems unnecessary to expatiate upon it again.

After an intermission for rest and cigarettes the audience was permit-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
FEB [illegible] 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY I ORCHESTRA IN

By IRVIN

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was probably the most amusingly interesting illustration of the aims, methods and characteristics of Serge Koussevitzky as a conductor that he has given in all the five years he has been directing it—in any case, so far as this suburb of the Hub on the River Charles is concerned.

The concert, for example, brought out by delightful inference this conductor's ill-concealed unease among the so-called classics of the standard orchestral repertoire (which he customarily plays with a strange and disquieted emphasis), for it contained none of them and he, therefore, has never appeared more sure of himself than last night.

He was dealing with nothing but

DIRECTS BOSTON MODERN MUSIC

'G WEIL.

modern music, nearly all of it by living men, and he was dealing with it, moreover, at the top of his theatrical bent. The rhetorical gravity with which he applied his fur-lined and top-hatted rant to it had its own pat, if unconscious irony, for it fitted three-quarters of this music as neatly as a mould—fitted it, because it, too, was essentially as rhetorical, as theatric as the treatment it got.

The music we are talking about was the young Russian, Serge Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, a self-conscious attempt to reproduce Mozart as of today, which is admirably successful in quite simply covering that eighteenth century genius of peerless taste with gold paint; the young Frenchman, Arthur Honegger's "Rugby," an attempt to write music of the football field which is merely a reshuffling of the rhythms and the noises of his locomotive idyll, "Pacific-231," relying upon the suggestive implication of a new title, and the not-so-young Swiss-American, Ernest Bloch's cinema medley, "America," which he calls an "epic rhapsody."

This was all music that Mr. Koussevitzky, with the sympathies of a brother, threw his arms about—sometimes quite literally. As a fact it seemed to stir him to the commission of the most charming and elaborate piece of podium histrionics that we believe we have ever seen, either from him or from any one else. If he chances upon a programme much like this again—or perhaps even a bit more so—we shall be petulantly, indeed grievously disappointed if he does not then forthwith follow his already well foreshadowed musical evolution and appear in costume, varied appropriately to each piece.

USES PANTOMIME.

But short of that, he last night really satisfied most of one's illusions that one was in the theatre or at least in a cinema that knew its business. His pantomime seemed to match his direction perfectly. He plucked niceties of effect from the air as though they were forget-me-nots; he drew melodic curves in space to illustrate every solo passage; he pumped out his fortissimi with the elegant dumb-show of a boy in an old-fasrioned organ loft; in short, he did everything except interpretative dancing to supply the needful graphic accompaniment to his orchestral melodrama.

Unfortunately, as a theatrical manager, he made one mistake. He included on his programme some of the music of Debussy. It was that music of a world of dream, the two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," Debussy's remote and etherealized visions fashioned into a mirage of tone—a tissue so fine and so delicately wrought that one habitually gazes upon its shimmering beauty with something like awe. But Mr. Koussevitsky changed all that. He shifted one's gaze to him, for he tore the tissue to shreds with his antic rhodomontade and substituted a ten-twen-and-thirt back-drop in kobalt blue and chrome yellow. Debussy shriveled up and disappeared. Only Mr. Koussevitzky remained.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
FEB 2 - 1929

97

World of Music

Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts Two Novelties At the Brooklyn Academy of Music

By FELIX DEYO

THANKS TO MR. KOUSSEVITZKY, Brooklyn patrons of symphony concerts are afforded the opportunity of hearing latest contemporary music. With the exception of Walter Damrosch's "Five Cities" programme at the beginning of the season, the Philharmonic-Symphony offerings in Brooklyn this season have been persistently selected from the routine repertory. But Mr. Koussevitzky, despite the indignation and protest following his performance of Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre" a few seasons ago, has consistently made the conservative section of Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers listen to a reasonable percentage of modern music. And few subscribers have been lost thereby.

All of which is preamble to the fact that last evening, at the Academy of Music, Mr. Koussevitzky gave first Brooklyn performances of Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" and Ernest Bloch's "America," two of the current season's musical novelties. Apart from the matter of their permanent value as contributions to tonal art, such works should be heard, at least. Else, how may the devotees of Enterpe be enabled at first hand to determine what-is-what in contemporary trend and production?

Last evening's programme was balanced off by Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor (No. 12), and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes."

* * *

WE will comment now, briefly but with critical earnestness, on the superb playing of the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton. True, it has been our pleasure to have done likewise on erstwhile occasions, but the subject re-invites commentation. To ourself, last evening, it seemed that the Boston players achieved a very high plane of instrumental ensemble perfection. The decisiveness and clarity of the strings was a pleasure to hear, also the delicacy and tonal purity of the woodwind. The brass was brilliant without being blatant, the percussion plangent without losing refinement. The full orchestra blend was little short of splendrous.

* * *

"RUGBY" is termed a "mouvement symphonique." Brisk and bristling, the score (lasting about twelve minutes in performance) makes one's feelings tingle. The agile contrapuntal lines of M. Honegger's writing, the subtlety of his polyphony, the precipitate onrush of his rhythms, the terseness of his thematic development, the conciseness of his instrumentation (in this work he omits all percussions), contribute to the sharp effect attained in his orchestral conceptions. His style is possessed of sureness and precision, and his compositional ideas reach fulfillment without falter.

"Rugby" is a sport epic in music, and one of the most salubrious pieces we recall ever having heard. Notwithstanding its name and an expectation realized in moments of similitude, M. Honegger's music is not to be classed as programmatic, but rather as intensely suggestive pure (absolute) music. The composer is essentially a classicist.

"It is impossible to consider music as a cloistered art secluded from all contact with actual life," writes Henry Prunieres. "It should find its inspiring subjects in the tastes and emotions of our own age. Already the machine and the factory, both of which occupy so commanding a place in our lives, have inspired powerful works of Hindemith, Prokofieff, and Honegger. The time is ripe for sport, which to-day, as in the time of ancient Greece, has become a kind of religion, to provide such inspiration. The rhythms of a car racing at one hundred miles an hour, the posture of tennis players, the speed of the runners, can be translated in a hundred different ways into music. * * * 'Rugby' shows us men—struggling, fighting, playing. They are not links and rods ["Pacific, 231"], but sensitive human organisms."

* * *

ERNEST BLOCH'S "America," an Epic Rhapsody, was the prize package score selected by Messrs. Damrosch, Koussevitzky, Hertz, Stock and Stokowski from amongst the ninety-two manuscripts submitted in the three-thousand-dollar symphony contest conducted by "Musical America." It has already been heard in two performances under Mr. Damrosch at Carnegie Hall and elsewhere throughout the United States. Critical consensus has been cordial if not enthusiastic. Mr. Bloch, a Swiss-American of Jewish blood, is one of the world's five or six greatest musical craftsmen. His handling of an orchestra is masterful. He has accomplished several scores of outstanding eminence, such as the "Israel" Symphony and "Schelomo"; this country yet awaits the production of his opera, "Macbeth," produced in Paris eighteen years ago and said to be a consummate work.

In "America," Bloch draws inspiration from Walt Whitman's lines: "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The rhapsody is jointly dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman.

In "America" Mr. Bloch has composed a history in music of the United States from the Indians and Mayflower pilgrims of 1620 to the jazz and materialism of the present century. His thematic material includes innumerable snatches of olden and modern national folksongs and ditties. These are deftly woven in orchestral treatment. The conclusion is reached with an anthem symbolic of faith and hope in the future "mission" and "destiny" of America.

The Bloch anthem, culminative of the rhapsody's spiritual scope, is unfortunately, as music, a banal inspiration. Last evening it was sung by more than one hundred singers from the Oratorio Society chorus and New York University Glee Club. It truly seemed the limit of absurdity to detain so large a number of singers on the stage for nearly an hour so that they might raise their united voices in so musically trite a hymn. It was the composer's original hope that his anthem would be sung by the audience, in standing posture. Despite coaxing, however, in the shape of printed words and music plus Walter Damrosch's winning personality, Manhattan audiences [illegible] declined to sing. Last night's Brooklyn audience was not invited to participate in this vocal apostrophe; patriotism, when en masse singing is involved, may be evoked but not forced.

The hovering figure of nationalism lurks over Bloch's "America." It is a figure known to us of old as possessing none too happy a reputation, and wanted by the police of all the arts. Nationalism, as such, has always been the most charlatan of the spirits which influence the creative artist. And conscious attempts at transcribing a nationalism into music are doomed to failure.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 2 - 1929

Boston Symphony

Walter Brown's review of the Boston Symphony concert last year, published in The Courant, said:

Some of the oldest inhabitants of Hartford recall the years when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played here in series of concerts, but of late music-lovers have had to be satisfied with one concert a year—well, not satisfied, but very glad to get one rather than none. Each season finds the tours of the Boston orchestra reduced and Hartford is now one of a very few cities blessed with even one concert by the great organization.

Mr. Sedwick deserves the thanks of the public for sponsoring Sunday's concert at the Capitol Theater. The orchestra was in splendid form and the program numbers were brilliantly played. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed in the best of spirits and conducted with evident delight. His readings of the scores brought out new beauties in familiar measures and offered keenest pleasure in the Ravel ballet suite which was the least well-known number on the program. The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky many times. The players were also thrice called upon to acknowledge with their leader, the applause.

The Boston Symphony will play tomorrow at the Capitol Theater at 3. Tickets available at McCoy's until 9 o'clock this evening, and the box office opens at the Capitol Theater at 9:30 tomorrow.

Bond Ballroom

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 1 - 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is a certain danger in the virtuoso performance of an orchestra, especially when, in addition to surpassing virtuosity on the part of the players, the conductor possesses a compelling and creative imagination. The performance can then do so much to illuminate and reinforce the inherent virtues of a composition and minimize whatever shortcomings it may possess that a reviewer's scale of values is upset and the reviewer himself bewildered and uncertain of his own opinions. And this, to be perfectly frank, was the case with one commentator when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed works by Honegger, Bloch and other composers last night in Carnegie Hall.

The moot point of the program was Ernest Bloch's symphony, or, as the work is more fittingly called by the composer, "epic rhapsody, America." It will be remembered that Walter Damrosch and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra gave the first New York performance of this score on the 19th of last December. "America" was then received with considerably qualified praise. It was rated as the work of a composer of genius, as a score characterized in many pages by consummate mastery, but, also, as an excursion into the realm of program music and as a rather unsuccessful essay in Americanism by a composer born in Europe, without the background of experience and association necessary to produce a work which should be genuinely and spiritually the product of this land.

Mr. Bloch, using many themes found on the American soil, had composed a "rhapsody" in three long movements, bound together by a phrase of the patriotic anthem which is sung by a mixed chorus as a conclusion. The score was considered so episodic, so panoramic, as to suggest in places the cinema. The final anthem, designed by the composer to be sung by audiences when his work was publicly performed, was intended as a melody which a bootblack could understand and sing. The "anthem" is as simple as that, but it was and is one of the most disappointing features of the symphony.

Now, last night, facing an audience with these experiences and reservations concerning the work, Mr. Koussevitzky performed it for the second time in this city.

He will give the third New York performance, with the same orchestra and in the same auditorium, tomorrow afternoon, since he believes that familiarity with the composition is the only thing necessary to make it appreciated.

Lo, and behold! The noble conception of the composer, his hot and now unquestionable sincerity, his vehement dramatic temperament and the place that America holds in his imagination arose like a vision from the instruments.

When it is said that the work assumed a new unity, a new significance, and passionateness of expression not previously realized, allowance must be made for the fact that for many in the audience this was a second hearing. A second hearing is almost certain to result in better correlation of the parts of the score, and better perception of its meaning and its true proportions on the part of the listener. But Mr. Koussevitzy's performance came nearer and further than that. It constituted, unquestionably, a new conception of the music. Its effect was shown in the response of the audience.

The first movement, in particular, gained in nobility and sweep of horizon. The slow movement was performed without attempt to gloss over its sentimentalities, with deep feeling and a word—until the battle episodes—of haunting poetic beauty. There is heard the voice of Bloch, the prophet, cursing as cursed his ancestors of old the inequities of a people and an age—clamor which suddenly subsided, to give place to a return of the very opening of the symphony—the evocation to nature and the virgin land, the sweep of its waters and skies, the shadows of its forests, the cry of the wild bird that Whitman heard on the shores of Paumanok, calling to its mate. What was clear through this performance was the blazing emotion of the composer, his extraordinary sense of architecture as well as dramatic contrast, and his gift for sheer, direct, democratic musical speech. With which reflections the present writer purposes to leave Mr. Bloch until he has had opportunity again to revise his opinions after Mr. Kousevitsky's second performance of "America" tomorrow afternoon.

Honegger's "Rugby," had a performance in many respects superior to the recent one directed by the composer, so that this work also rose in the reviewer's estimation. It is a musical organization sufficient, without its gratuitously bestowed title, to interest the listener, and with some passages of admirable clarity, power and invention. It is not likely, however, that "Rugby" will have the importance or the success of "Pacific 23."

The detail of the evening upon which all present will probably agree was the mysterious loveliness and atmosphere bestowed upon Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes"—a performance which can only be compared for finish and sensitiveness of feeling to the interpretation of "L'Apres midi d'un faun" by Mr. Koussevitzky at his preceding visit here—and the scintillating interpretation of Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony." This is a score which, despite Mr. Koussevitzky's powers, we are unable to accept as of lasting value. Some of the "Classic" Symphony is "classic," not in the manner of a Haydn or a Mozart, but, say, a Boccherini.

Some of it, such as the opening of the slow movement, is downright cheap. Very little of it escapes the charge of plausible bluff. But the evening belonged to the orchestra. One composer — Debussy — emerged with a strength of invention and a rapture of beauty that neither time nor the conductor's art can affect. The others were in part revealed, in part created, as it seemed, by the originating power of the conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
FEB 1 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY I ORCHESTRA IN

By IRVIN

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was probably the most amusingly interesting illustration of the aims, methods and characteristics of Serge Koussevitzky as a conductor that he has given in all the five years he has been directing it—in any case, so far as this suburb of the Hub on the River Charles is concerned.

The concert, for example, brought out by delightful inference this conductor's ill-concealed unease among the so-called classics of the standard orchestral repertoire (which he customarily plays with a strange and disquieted emphasis), for it contained none of them and he, therefore, has never appeared more sure of himself than last night.

He was dealing with nothing but

DIRECTS BOSTON MODERN MUSIC

'G WEIL.

modern music, nearly all of it by living men, and he was dealing with it, moreover, at the top of his theatrical bent. The rhetorical gravity with which he applied his fur-lined and top-hatted rant to it had its own pat, if unconscious irony, for it fitted three-quarters of this music as neatly as a mould—fitted it, because it, too, was essentially as rhetorical, as theatric as the treatment it got.

The music we are talking about was the young Russian, Serge Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, a self-conscious attempt to reproduce Mozart as of today, which is admirably successful in quite simply covering that eighteenth century genius of peerless taste with gold paint; the young Frenchman, Arthur Honegger's "Rugby," an attempt to write music of the football field which is merely a reshuffling of the rhythms and the noises of his locomotive idyll, "Pacific-231," relying upon the suggestive implication of a new title, and the not-so-young Swiss-American, Ernest Bloch's cinema medley, "America," which he calls an "epic rhapsody."

This was all music that Mr. Koussevitzky, with the sympathies of a brother, threw his arms about—sometimes quite literally. As a fact it seemed to stir him to the commission of the most charming and elaborate piece of podium histrionics that we believe we have ever seen, either from him or from any one else. If he chances upon a programme much like this again—or perhaps even a bit more so—we shall be petulantly, indeed grievously disappointed if he does not then forthwith follow his already well foreshadowed musical evolution and appear in costume, varied appropriately to each piece.

USES PANTOMIME.

But short of that, he last night really satisfied most of one's illusions that one was in the theatre or at least in a cinema that knew its business. His pantomime seemed to match his direction perfectly. He plucked niceties of effect from the air as though they were forget-me-nots; he drew melodic curves in space to illustrate every solo passage; he pumped out his fortissimi with the elegant dumb-show of a boy in an old-fasrioned organ loft; in short, he did everything except interpretative dancing to supply the needful graphic accompaniment to his orchestral melodrama.

Unfortunately, as a theatrical manager, he made one mistake. He included on his programme some of the music of Debussy. It was that music of a world of dream, the two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," Debussy's remote and etherealized visions fashioned into a mirage of tone—a tissue so fine and so delicately wrought that one habitually gazes upon its shimmering beauty with something like awe. But Mr. Koussevitsky changed all that. He shifted one's gaze to him, for he tore the tissue to shreds with his antic rhodomontade and substituted a ten-twen-and-thirt back-drop in kobalt blue and chrome yellow. Debussy shriveled up and disappeared. Only Mr. Koussevitzky remained.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
FEB 2 - 1929

97

World of Music

Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts Two Novelties At the Brooklyn Academy of Music

By FELIX DEYO

THANKS TO MR. KOUSSEVITZKY, Brooklyn patrons of symphony concerts are afforded the opportunity of hearing latest contemporary music. With the exception of Walter Damrosch's "Five Cities" programme at the beginning of the season, the Philharmonic-Symphony offerings in Brooklyn this season have been persistently selected from the routine repertory. But Mr. Koussevitzky, despite the indignation and protest following his performance of Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre" a few seasons ago, has consistently made the conservative section of Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers listen to a reasonable percentage of modern music. And few subscribers have been lost thereby.

All of which is preamble to the fact that last evening, at the Academy of Music, Mr. Koussevitzky gave first Brooklyn performances of Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" and Ernest Bloch's "America," two of the current season's musical novelties. Apart from the matter of their permanent value as contributions to tonal art, such works should be heard, at least. Else, how may the devotees of Enterpe be enabled at first hand to determine what-is-what in contemporary trend and production?

Last evening's programme was balanced off by Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor (No. 12), and Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes."

* * *

WE will comment now, briefly but with critical earnestness, on the superb playing of the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton. True, it has been our pleasure to have done likewise on erstwhile occasions, but the subject re-invites commentation. To ourself, last evening, it seemed that the Boston players achieved a very high plane of instrumental ensemble perfection. The decisiveness and clarity of the strings was a pleasure to hear, also the delicacy and tonal purity of the woodwind. The brass was brilliant without being blatant, the percussion plangent without losing refinement. The full orchestra blend was little short of splendrous.

* * *

"RUGBY" is termed a "mouvement symphonique." Brisk and bristling, the score (lasting about twelve minutes in performance) makes one's feelings tingle. The agile contrapuntal lines of M. Honegger's writing, the subtlety of his polyphony, the precipitate onrush of his rhythms, the terseness of his thematic development, the conciseness of his instrumentation (in this work he omits all percussions), contribute to the sharp effect attained in his orchestral conceptions. His style is possessed of sureness and precision, and his compositional ideas reach fulfillment without falter.

"Rugby" is a sport epic in music, and one of the most salubrious pieces we recall ever having heard. Notwithstanding its name and an expectation realized in moments of similitude, M. Honegger's music is not to be classed as programmatic, but rather as intensely suggestive pure (absolute) music. The composer is essentially a classicist.

"It is impossible to consider music as a cloistered art secluded from all contact with actual life," writes Henry Prunieres. "It should find its inspiring subjects in the tastes and emotions of our own age. Already the machine and the factory, both of which occupy so commanding a place in our lives, have inspired powerful works of Hindemith, Prokofieff, and Honegger. The time is ripe for sport, which to-day, as in the time of ancient Greece, has become a kind of religion, to provide such inspiration. The rhythms of a car racing at one hundred miles an hour, the posture of tennis players, the speed of the runners, can be translated in a hundred different ways into music. * * * 'Rugby' shows us men—struggling, fighting, playing. They are not links and rods ["Pacific, 231"], but sensitive human organisms."

* * *

ERNEST BLOCH'S "America," an Epic Rhapsody, was the prize package score selected by Messrs. Damrosch, Koussevitzky, Hertz, Stock and Stokowski from amongst the ninety-two manuscripts submitted in the three-thousand-dollar symphony contest conducted by "Musical America." It has already been heard in two performances under Mr. Damrosch at Carnegie Hall and elsewhere throughout the United States. Critical consensus has been cordial if not enthusiastic. Mr. Bloch, a Swiss-American of Jewish blood, is one of the world's five or six greatest musical craftsmen. His handling of an orchestra is masterful. He has accomplished several scores of outstanding eminence, such as the "Israel" Symphony and "Schelomo"; this country yet awaits the production of his opera, "Macbeth," produced in Paris eighteen years ago and said to be a consummate work.

In "America," Bloch draws inspiration from Walt Whitman's lines: "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The rhapsody is jointly dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman.

In "America" Mr. Bloch has composed a history in music of the United States from the Indians and Mayflower pilgrims of 1620 to the jazz and materialism of the present century. His thematic material includes innumerable snatches of olden and modern national folksongs and ditties. These are deftly woven in orchestral treatment. The conclusion is reached with an anthem symbolic of faith and hope in the future "mission" and "destiny" of America.

The Bloch anthem, culminative of the rhapsody's spiritual scope, is, unfortunately, as music, a banal inspiration. Last evening it was sung by more than one hundred singers from the Oratorio Society chorus and New York University Glee Club. It truly seemed the limit of absurdity to detain so large a number of singers on the stage for nearly an hour so that they might raise their united voices in so musically trite a hymn. It was the composer's original hope that his anthem would be sung by the audience, in standing posture. Despite coaxing, however, in the shape of printed words and music and Walter Damrosch's winning personality, Manhattan audiences refused and declined to sing. Last night's Brooklyn audience was not invited to participate in this vocal apostrophe; patriotism, when en masse singing is involved, may be evoked but not forced.

The hovering figure of nationalism lurks over Bloch's "America." It is a figure known to us of old as possessing none too happy a reputation, and wanted by the police of all the arts. Nationalism, as such, has always been the most charlatan of the spirits which influence the creative artist. And conscious attempts at transcribing a nationalism into music are doomed to failure.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 2 - 1929

Boston Symphony

Walter Brown's review of the Boston Symphony concert last year, published in The Courant, said:

Some of the oldest inhabitants of Hartford recall the years when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played here in series of concerts, but of late music-lovers have had to be satisfied with one concert a year—well, not satisfied, but very glad to get one rather than none. Each season finds the tours of the Boston orchestra reduced and Hartford is now one of a very few cities blessed with even one concert by the great organization.

Mr. Sedwick deserves the thanks of the public for sponsoring Sunday's concert at the Capitol Theater. The orchestra was in splendid form and the program numbers were brilliantly played. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed in the best of spirits and conducted with evident delight. His readings of the scores brought out new beauties in familiar measures and offered keenest pleasure in the Ravel ballet suite which was the least well-known number on the program. The audience was most enthusiastic and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky many times. The players were also thrice called upon to acknowledge with their leader, the applause.

The Boston Symphony will play tomorrow at the Capitol Theater at 3. Tickets available at McCoy's until 9 o'clock this evening, and the box office opens at the Capitol Theater at 9:30 tomorrow.

Rand Ballroom

THIS CLIPPING FROM

...d Domesu...

...town for last eve-
...ysdale in "Tom Brown at
...or Serge Koussevitzky had
...ts all congenial to himself
...ructive to the audience. To
...eff's "Classial" symphony
...might of modernism un-
and he could roar as gently as Mozart,
...sned.

Perhaps it was a little French Mozart that was in his mind, or the ingenuous one who told a princess of the blood that she was a nice girl and he would marry her when she grew up.

At any rate, this classical symphony is a piquant and charming piece of musical badinage, written with amazing spontaneity and with a ready assumption of grace of style. It is not an immortal masterpiece, but one does not live by these alone. Deft and ingratiating music has also its place, especially when performed as Mr. Prokofieff's was by the company of virtuosi from Symphony Hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky next entered the mystic domain of Debussy, and once again gave us his delightful reading of the "Nuages" and "Fetes." From Debussy to Honegger and his "Rugby" was a seven-league boots step, but Mr. Koussevitzky made it with his habitual savoir faire. Mr. Honegger's football composition is not new and it is not yet old, but we fear it will age early. It is a well-made score, but does not get over for a touchdown. It seems unnecessary to expatiate upon it again.

After an intermission for rest and cigarettes the audience was permitted to hear Ernst Bloch's prize epic rhapsody, "America." A chorus from the Oratorio Society and the University Glee Club had been provided to chant the composer's national hymn around which the work is written. This particular music lover, who has known the thrill of saluting the 'flag from the quarter-deck at colors while the band played the broad anthem prescribed by the regulations, admits that it is not easy for amateurs to sing, but he would rather try to sing it than Mr. Bloch's apostrophe to America, which might be fittingly included in a collection of Sunday school hymns.

The first movement of this work is the best, though even here the most excellent material is in quotation marks. The second movement rejoices in the presentation of some tunes which belong here, such as "Pop Goes the Weasel" (which must be astonished to find itself put to symphonic use) and the Creole "M'sieu Banjo." The last movement reaches its climax with the singing of Mr. Bloch's national anthem, which will probably continue to be his private property. Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat the symphony tomorrow afternoon, perhaps to prove that he believes in it or his own judgment. That the composition was well performed goes without saying. But this music lover prefers to hear the splendid Boston organization playing other creations.

98

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
FEB 2 - 1929

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussewitsky conducting, gave the third of its series of concerts in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Mr. Koussewitsky's program was almost an exact replica of the one played Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, the exception being Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12, which was played in place of Prokofiew's pseudo classical symphony.

It seems likely that Handel's concerto, which already has something like two centuries of vigorous life behind it, will outlive all the other music played at tonight's concert. (In making this statement we do not by any means overlook the exquisite but more perishable beauties of the Debussy Nocturne, which followed.) The string section of the orchestra played this undying music, for which Mr. Koussewitsky seems to have a special fondness, with great beauty of tone and expressiveness—now heartily and gayly, and in the slower movements tenderly and consolingly, but always with the nobility inherent in the style.

Debussy's "Nuages" and Fetes," which came next, received an equally polished and stylistically perfect performance. Every nuance of the "Nuages," which reminds one, in its delicately tinted scoring, of a Monet landscape, was observed and the result was a tone-picture of subtle beauty. The "Fetes," which, to keep up the similie with painting, has more of the riotous coloring of one of Sorolla's paintings of Seville, though here the comparison must cease because the Spaniard has none of the subtlety of the French composer, was also given a rendition which was as near to perfection as one is apt to hear.

And now followed music of an entirely different character. Mr. Honegger's "Rugby" had been presented in New York by the Philharmonic Society with the composer conducting a short time ago. The impression gained then was that of a fairly amusing tour-de-force, which was none too well directed by Mr. Honegger. Mr. Koussewitsky and his men gave the piece as fine a performance as it is likely ever to get, and the result can scarcely be said to have been a more favorable one. No playing, be it ever so brilliant and compelling, can compensate for lack of genius in a composer. In truth, such playing—and this applies to the Bloch Symphony "America," which ended the program, the very fact that such a master of the baton as Mr. Koussewitsky and such a wonderful orchestra as the Boston Symphony plays these works with such clarity and finish—only serves to accentuate their inherent impotence and renders void any question of doubt as to their merit. We imagine that it is fairly safe to predict that the game of rugby, which Mr. Honegger attempts to portray in tones, will be played long after the Swiss composer's athletic counterpoint has been consigned to oblivion.

In criticizing Ernest Bloch's "America," two theories may be advanced, either of which might help to explain this exceedingly disappointing composition. First, we might assume that Mr. Bloch, who has given undoubtable signs of great talent, if not genius, has succumbed to the rotarian influence of the American provinces and has deteriorated until he has become a charlatan. This theory is put forth with the sincere hope that it is false. The second theory, although unpleasant, would not necessarily prove fatal to Mr. Bloch's gifts as a composer: it is that Mr. Bloch, who is of an ironic, pessimistic turn of mind, has, with his tongue in his cheek, written a parody on 100 percent Americanism.

If the composition is to be seriously considered, then we can only say that a more tawdry, more banal and—for the man who has written the "Israel" symphony, the "Poemes Juifs," the violin sonata, the Psalms for voice and orchestra, the Viola Suite and the "Schelomo," for cello and orchestra—pitiable piece of music cannot be imagined. It contains no thematic material of any value; the themes of the first movement vary from resembling excerpts from Nicolai's "Lustige Weiber von Windsor" to "Oh! Tannenbaum." The second movement is a weak potpourri of Southern melodies conventionally harmonized for the most part and partially sounding like one of Mr. Godowsky's Viennese paraphrases. The last movement, closing, as it does, with the incredible anthem "America, America," is a fitting apotheosis for the first two movements. The work as it stands is appropriate to accompany one of those pageants which are given at the "Cirkus Busch" in Berlin. Needless to say, Mr. Koussewitsky and his men gave the work a performance far beyond its merits.

JEROME BOHM.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUNDAY AFTERNOON

Annual Concert at the Capitol Theater.

In forty-seven years, the Boston Symphony orchestra has become a great cultural force and one of the finest musical organizations in the world. In size, in schedule, in cultural influence, and in prestige, it has grown from relatively small beginnings to a present estate as busy as it is glorious. Hartford has figured long and importantly in the consecutive seasons of the orchestra's concerts, and it may well be called the orchestra of New England rather than of Boston. Its coming will be welcomed this Sunday in the Capitol theater as an organization long recognized and esteemed by the Hartford public.

The gradual growth of the Boston Symphony orchestra is interesting to follow. In 1881 the orchestra, as founded by Major Henry Lee Higginson, numbered sixty players, a personnel which has since grown to 110. Its original season of twenty concerts in Boston, and occasional appearances elsewhere, has increased to more than seventy-three concerts in greater Boston, and concerts on tour, which brings the total number of each season to considerably over one hundred. The most illustrious personnel which could be obtained, under the guiding hand of a succession of great conductors, has resulted in an orchestra—the name of which has long stood throughout the musical world as a by-word of the nearest thing to perfection in symphonic performance humanly possible.

The Boston Symphony orchestra began its career by giving twenty concerts on successive Saturday evenings in Boston. Soon the practice was started of admitting the public to the last rehearsal on the preceding Friday afternoon, for the small fee of 25 cents. These rehearsals eventually took on the aspect of a regular concert, except the name which likewise was finally dropped. Thus a weekly Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concert, at which the same program was played, brought the annual number of concerts in Boston to forty-eight. When the demand for seats became greater than these concerts could supply, a series of five Monday evening concerts was added, and later still another series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts. These, together with Pension Fund concerts on Sunday afternoons, concerts for the young people, and nine concerts which are given in Cambridge, across the Charles river, under the auspices of Harvard university, gives the total of annual concerts by this orchestra in its own city.

On five weeks during the season, which lasts from early October until the end of April, the orchestra visits New York, giving each time a concert in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, a concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening, and another concert with a different program in Carnegie hall on Saturday afternoon. The full itinerary also includes a series of five concerts in Providence, R. I., orchestral concerts in New England, and an annual tour of the north, middle west, or south, which carries the orchestra as far as Canada, Chicago, or Washington.

The principal universities in New England engage the orchestra each year to give a concert under their auspices, notably: Harvard university in Cambridge, Yale university in New Haven, Wellesley college at Wellesley, Cornell university in Ithaca, N. Y., Brown university in Rhode Island, and Smith college at Northampton, Mass.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has travelled as far as Chicago, and in 1915, the summer of the Panama-Pacific exposition at San Francisco, travelled in a body across 3,000 miles of the continent to the Pacific coast, giving a notable series on the exposition grounds.

To hear symphonic music again and again as has the Boston Symphony public each season, has proven to be the only way by which a public such as that of Boston, Hartford, and other cities, can come to love and expect this glorious field of art as a regular recurring part of life's experience.

Good seats are obtainable. Ticket sale at McCoy's Music store and at the box office, Capitol theater, Sunday at 9:30 a. m. Phone 2-0375. Tickets at McCoy's till 9 o'clock to-night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 3 - 1929

Boston Symphony Plays Today At Capitol Theater

Serge Koussevitsky Again To Lead Famous Orchestra in Concert

On the stand before the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the public is familiar with Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian leader whose eloquent back and wrist are inseparably involved in the eloquence of a Boston Symphony concert.

Curious to meet this publicly conspicuous figure in the relaxation of his own drawing room, a reporter penetrated to Boston, to Jamaica Plain, its suburb, and to the address on Lochstead Avenue where the Russian virtuoso was said to live.

Serge Koussexitzky

There was nothing Slavic in suggestion about the old colonial house which bore the assigned number, nor about the entry hall, which was hung with a canvas of a Union general, a sword, and other Civil War relics. Apprehension of a possible mistake were dispelled by a maid in evident terror of the English language, and a private secretary whose English was fluent, punctiliously correct, an evident intellectual effort, but still a triumph of literacy. Musical scores were strewn about the piano and furniture; in a corner stood the famous double-bass.

The conductor entered to extend a courteous welcome. His tweeds and spats bespoke a good tailor, and perhaps a shade more attention to dress than is customary with Americans.

Asked what he thought of his audiences in America, he spoke with quick enthusiasm.

"I have come in contact with a number of American audiences," he said, "not only in Boston and New York and the cities of our regular visits, but further afield in the Orchestra's occasional tours into Canada, New York State, and the South. The audiences everywhere I have found particularly responsive, their reactions interesting. The only measure of success in a symphony concert is a close sympathy and understanding between orchestra and audience. I usually find there is an intimate contact, a close 'rapport.' The score I am leading possesses me—I feel its moods and its beauties most vividly. When the audience responds with me to the music, I can perceive this response, almost intuitively. To me this is the ultimate achievement—it is the one justification of the painstaking efforts of orchestra and conductor in preparation and in performance."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at 3 p. m. today at the Capitol Theater.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1929

Bostonians Play Honegger

His 'Rugby' Is Among Program Numbers in Carnegie Hall

The subscription matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky occupied Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, repeating, in the latter half of the program, the Bostonian leader's interesting version of Bloch's prize symphony "America" and Honegger's orchestral movement "Rugby."

The opening numbers of the list were played by this organization for the first time here this season: a rather inept and unsympathetic performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, and a delicate, skillful, almost dazzling presentation of two Satie "Gymnopedias" orchestrated by Debussy.

M.W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Under Serge Koussevitzky's baton, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, last night cloaked Bloch's epic rhapsody "America" with a new fluency and devoleped the finer beauty of the composition that has stirred so much controversy among critics. A fresh revelation of the composer's masterly workmanship came forth from passages that before had seemed uninspired, and again we admired Mr. Bloch's method of letting "Swanee River" and "Pop Goes the Weasel" weave themselves in their original form through the composition.

Bloch's national anthem, which climaxes the final movement of "America" was reverently sung by the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club.

Prior to this musical treat, the orchestra had already played Handel's concerto grosso for string orchestra and Debussy's nocturnes.

Then in astounding Seven-League-Boot strides, Mr. Koussevitzky moved from the calm placid numbers to Honegger's "Rugby," which was recently presented in New Yrok under the composer's own direction. Again his realistic tone picture impressed us with the glamor and noise of the football contest.

Such programs as these make Boston Symphony night big nights in Brooklyn.

C. E. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
FEB 3 - 1929

Golden Age In Tone

Boston Orchestra Evokes Scenes of Ancient Greece

SCENES out of ancient Greece were presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Carnegie Hall program yesterday afternoon. The pictures were introduced through "Gymnopedies" of Satie-Debussy.

This unique and potent work was inspired by the story of the celebrations held annually in old Athens. The athletes paraded before the statues of the gods and indulged in graceful and curious movements of adoration.

There was no doubt in the minds of all who listened that Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, had studied not only the score but the whole historical background of its narrative and had sought to evoke in the imagination the massed ensemble of the handsome naked bodies of the Greek youths. A veritable set of marble statuary rose in the pit as the music pursued its sonorous and exotic course.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
FEB 3 - 1929

MUSIC

Mr. Koussevitzky repeated only two of the works which graced his program Thursday at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. These were the Bloch "America" and Arthur Honegger's "Rugby." As on Thursday, his orchestral foundation was reinforced by a chorus drawn jointly from the Oratorio Society and the University Glee Club.

In place of Prokofieff and an earlier Debussy, Mr. Koussevitzky substituted Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Debussy's orchestration of Erik Satie's first and third "Gymnopedies." Mr. Philip Hale's program notes inform all who care to read that "Satie wrote three 'Gymnopedies' for pianoforte in 1888. Debussy orchestrated the first and third, but in the score the third stands first." Be that as it may, Mr. Hale goes on to explain that the Gymnopaedia, the festival of "naked youths," was celebrated annually at Sparta in honor of Apollo Pythaeus, Artemis and Leto. Apparently this rite was an exhibition of boxing, wrestling and athletic games.

98

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
FEB 2 - 1929

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussewitsky conducting, gave the third of [illegible] ries of concerts in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Mr. Koussewitsky's program was almost an exact replica of the one played Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, the exception being Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12, which was played in place of Prokofiew's pseudo classical symphony.

It seems likely that Handel's concerto, which already has something like two centuries of vigorous life behind it, will outlive all the other music played at tonight's concert. (In making this statement we do not by any means overlook the exquisite but more perishable beauties of the Debussy Nocturne, which followed.) The string section of the orchestra played this undying music, for which Mr. Koussewitsky seems to have a special fondness, with great beauty of tone and expressiveness—now heartily and gayly, and in the slower movements tenderly and consolingly, but always with the nobility inherent in the style.

Debussy's "Nuages" and Fetes," which came next, received an equally polished and stylistically perfect performance. Every nuance of the "Nuages," which reminds one, in its delicately tinted scoring, of a Monet landscape, was observed and the result was a tone-picture of subtle beauty. The "Fetes," which, to keep up the similie with painting, has more of the riotous coloring of one of Sorolla's paintings of Seville, though here the comparison must cease because the Spaniard has none of the subtlety of the French composer, was also given a rendition which was as near to perfection as one is apt to hear.

And now followed music of an entirely different character. Mr. Honegger's "Rugby" had been presented in New York by the Philharmonic Society with the composer conducting a short time ago. The impression gained then was that of a fairly amusing tour-de-force, which was none too well directed by Mr. Honegger. Mr. Koussewitsky and his men gave the piece as fine a performance as it is likely ever to get, and the result can scarcely be said to have been a more favorable one. No playing, be it ever so brilliant and compelling, can compensate for lack of genius in a composer. In truth, such playing—and this applies to the Bloch Symphony "America," which ended the program, the very fact that such a master of the baton as Mr. Koussewitsky and such a wonderful orchestra as the Boston Symphony plays these works with such clarity and finish—only serves to accentuate their inherent impotence and renders void any question of doubt as to their merit. We imagine that it is fairly safe to predict that the game of rugby, which Mr. Honegger attempts to portray in tones, will be played long after the Swiss composer's athletic counterpoint has been consigned to oblivion.

In criticizing Ernest Bloch's "America," two theories may be advanced, either of which might help to explain this exceedingly disappointing composition. First, we might assume that Mr. Bloch, who has given undoubtable signs of great talent, if not genius, has succumbed to the rotarian influence of the American provinces and has deteriorated until he has become a charlatan. This theory is put forth with the sincere hope that it is false. The second theory, although unpleasant, would not necessarily prove fatal to Mr. Bloch's gifts as a composer: it is that Mr. Bloch, who is of an ironic, pessimistic turn of mind, has, with his tongue in his cheek, written a parody on 100 percent Americanism.

If the composition is to be seriously considered, then we can only say that a more tawdry, more banal and—for the man who has written the "Israel" symphony, the "Poemes Juifs," the violin sonata, the Psalms for voice and orchestra, the Viola Suite and the "Schelomo," for cello and orchestra—pitiable piece of music cannot be imagined. It contains no thematic material of any value; the themes of the first movement vary from resembling excerpts from Nicolai's "Lustige Weiber von Windsor" to "Oh! Tannenbaum." The second movement is a weak potpourri of Southern melodies conventionally harmonized for the most part and partially sounding like one of Mr. Godowsky's Viennese paraphrases. The last movement, closing, as it does, with the incredible anthem "America, America," is a fitting apotheosis for the first two movements. The work as it stands is appropriate to accompany one of those pageants which are given at the "Cirkus Busch" in Berlin. Needless to say, Mr. Koussewitsky and his men gave the work a performance far beyond its merits.

JEROME BOHM.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUNDAY AFTERNOON

Annual Concert at the Capitol Theater.

In forty-seven years, the Boston Symphony orchestra has become a great cultural force and one of the finest musical organizations in the world. In size, in schedule, in cultural influence, and in prestige, it has grown from relatively small beginnings to a present estate as busy as it is glorious. Hartford has figured long and importantly in the consecutive seasons of the orchestra's concerts, and it may well be called the orchestra of New England rather than of Boston. Its coming will be welcomed this Sunday in the Capitol theater as an organization long recognized and esteemed by the Hartford public.

The gradual growth of the Boston Symphony orchestra is interesting to follow. In 1881 the orchestra, as founded by Major Henry Lee Higginson, numbered sixty players, a personnel which has since grown to 110. Its original season of twenty concerts in Boston, and occasional appearances elsewhere, has increased to more than seventy-three concerts in greater Boston, and concerts on tour, which brings the total number of each season to considerably over one hundred. The most illustrious personnel which could be obtained, under the guiding hand of a succession of great conductors, has resulted in an orchestra—the name of which has long stood throughout the musical world as a by-word of the nearest thing to perfection in symphonic performance humanly possible.

The Boston Symphony orchestra began its career by giving twenty concerts on successive Saturday evenings in Boston. Soon the practice was started of admitting the public to the last rehearsal on the preceding Friday afternoon, for the small fee of 25 cents. These rehearsals eventually took on the aspect of a regular concert, except the name which likewise was finally dropped. Thus a weekly Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concert, at which the same program was played, brought the annual number of concerts in Boston to forty-eight. When the demand for seats became greater than these concerts could supply, a series of five Monday evening concerts was added, and later still another series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts. These, together with Pension Fund concerts on Sunday afternoons, concerts for the young people, and nine concerts which are given in Cambridge, across the Charles river, under the auspices of Harvard university, gives the total of annual concerts by this orchestra in its own city.

On five weeks during the season, which lasts from early October until the end of April, the orchestra visits New York, giving each time a concert in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, a concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening, and another concert with a different program in Carnegie hall on Saturday afternoon. The full itinerary also includes a series of five concerts in Providence, R. I., orchestral concerts in New England, and an annual tour of the north, middle west, or south, which carries the orchestra as far as Canada, Chicago, or Washington.

The principal universities in New England engage the orchestra each year to give a concert under their auspices, notably: Harvard university in Cambridge, Yale university in New Haven, Wellesley college at Wellesley, Cornell university in Ithaca, N. Y., Brown university in Rhode Island, and Smith college at Northampton, Mass.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has travelled as far as Chicago, and in 1915, the summer of the Panama-Pacific exposition at San Francisco, travelled in a body across 3,000 miles of the continent to the Pacific coast, giving a notable series on the exposition grounds.

To hear symphonic music again and again as has the Boston Symphony public each season, has proven to be the only way by which a public such as that of Boston, Hartford, and other cities, can come to love and expect this glorious field of art as a regular recurring part of life's experience.

Good seats are obtainable. Ticket sale at McCoy's Music store and at the box office, Capitol theater, Sunday at 9:30 a. m. Phone 2-0375. Tickets at McCoy's till 9 o'clock to-night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 3 - 1929

Boston Symphony Plays Today At Capitol Theater

Serge Koussevitsky Again To Lead Famous Orchestra in Concert

On the stand before the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the public is familiar with Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian leader whose eloquent back and wrist are inseparably involved in the elocquence of a Boston Symphony concert.

Curious to meet this publicly conspicuous figure in the relaxation of his own drawing room, a reporter penetrated to Boston, to Jamaica Plain, its suburb, and to the address on Lochstead Avenue where the Russian virtuoso was said to live.

Serge Koussevitzky

There was nothing Slavic in suggestion about the old colonial house which bore the assigned number, nor about the entry hall, which was hung with a canvas of a Union general, a sword, and other Civil War relics. Apprehension of a possible mistake were dispelled by a maid in evident terror of the English language, and a private secretary whose English was fluent, punctiliously correct, an evident intellectual effort, but still a triumph of literacy. Musical scores were strewn about the piano and furniture; in a corner stood the famous double-bass.

The conductor entered to extend a courteous welcome. His tweeds and spats bespoke a good tailor, and perhaps a shade more attention to dress than is customary with Americans.

Asked what he thought of his audiences in America, he spoke with quick enthusiasm.

"I have come in contact with a number of American audiences," he said, "not only in Boston and New York and the cities of our regular visits, but further afield in the Orchestra's occasional tours into Canada, New York State, and the South. The audiences everywhere I have found particularly responsive, their reactions interesting. The only measure of success in a symphony concert is a close sympathy and understanding between orchestra and audience. I usually find there is an intimate contact, a close 'rapport.' The score I am leading possesses me—I feel its moods and its beauties most vividly. When the audience responds with me to the music, I can perceive this response, almost intuitively. To me this is the ultimate achievement—it is the one justification of the painstaking efforts of orchestra and conductor in preparation and in performance."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at 3 p. m. today at the Capitol Theater.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1929

Bostonians Play Honegger

His 'Rugby' Is Among Program Numbers in Carnegie Hall

The subscription matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky occupied Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, repeating, in the latter half of the program, the Bostonian leader's interesting version of Bloch's prize symphony "America" and Honegger's orchestral movement "Rugby."

The opening numbers of the list were played by this organization for the first time here this season: a rather inept and unsympathetic performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, and a delicate, skillful, almost dazzling presentation of two Satie "Gymnopedias" orchestrated by Debussy.

M.W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Under Serge Koussevitzky's baton, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, last night cloaked Bloch's epic rhapsody "America" with a new fluency and devoloped the finer beauty of the composition that has stirred so much controversy among critics. A fresh revelation of the composer's masterly workmanship came forth from passages that before had seemed uninspired, and again we admired Mr. Bloch's method of letting "Swanee River" and "Pop Goes the Weasel" weave themselves in their original form through the composition.

Bloch's national anthem, which climaxes the final movement of "America" was reverently sung by the Oratorio Society and the New York University Glee Club.

Prior to this musical treat, the orchestra had already played Handel's concerto grosso for string orchestra and Debussy's nocturnes.

Then in astounding Seven-League-Boot strides, Mr. Koussevitzky moved from the calm placid numbers to Honegger's "Rugby," which was recently presented in New Yrok under the composer's own direction. Again his realistic tone picture impressed us with the glamor and noise of the football contest.

Such programs as these make Boston Symphony night big nights in Brooklyn.

C. E. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

Golden Age In Tone

Boston Orchestra Evokes Scenes of Ancient Greece

SCENES out of ancient Greece were presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Carnegie Hall program yesterday afternoon. The pictures were introduced through "Gymnopedies" of Satie-Debussy.

This unique and potent work was inspired by the story of the celebrations held annually in old Athens. The athletes paraded before the statues of the gods and indulged in graceful and curious movements of adoration.

There was no doubt in the minds of all who listened that Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, had studied not only the score but the whole historical background of its narrative and had sought to evoke in the imagination the massed ensemble of the handsome naked bodies of the Greek youths. A veritable set of marble statuary rose in the pit as the music pursued its sonorous and exotic course.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

MUSIC

Mr. Koussevitzky repeated only two of the works which graced his program Thursday at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. These were the Bloch "America" and Arthur Honegger's "Rugby." As on Thursday, his orchestral foundation was reinforced by a chorus drawn jointly from the Oratorio Society and the University Glee Club.

In place of Prokofieff and an earlier Debussy, Mr. Koussevitzky substituted Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Debussy's orchestration of Erik Satie's first and third "Gymnopedies." Mr. Philip Hale's program notes inform all who care to read that "Satie wrote three 'Gymnopedies' for pianoforte in 1888. Debussy orchestrated the first and third, but in the score the third stands first." Be that as it may, Mr. Hale goes on to explain that the Gymnopaedia, the festival of "naked youths," was celebrated annually at Sparta in honor of Apollo Pythaeus, Artemis and Leto. Apparently this rite was an exhibition of boxing, wrestling and athletic games.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 3 - 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall differed in only two particulars from his New York program of the previous Thursday evening—in Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and, for a rare and welcome innovation, two of the "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie, composed as piano pieces as early as 1888 and orchestrated by Debussy.

There are three "Gymnopedies" for piano. Mr. Hale's program notes give us the derivation of the title. The Gymnopedia was the festival held annually at Sparta, when naked youths rendered homage in dancing and gymnastic exercises to Apollo, while songs and paens were sung by a chorus, the leader of which wore the chaplet of leaves that commemorated a Spartan victory. Satie, when he composed the "Gymnopedies," was experimenting in various ways, among them the employment of unresolved harmonies in a manner which interested Débussy. These experiments are discovered notably in Satie's early "Sarabandes." He composed in the same period his orchestral music for Rosicrucian ceremonies and for Jules Bois's Rosicrucian drama, "La Porte Heroique du Ciel." He touched the hem of Greek classicism, and under this inspiration wrote the three—in themselves—trifling but original and significant piano pieces which attracted Debussy's attention.

Thus the "Gmynopedies," as orchestrated by Debussy, offer an excellent example of the capacities of the man of talent, as compared with the man of genius, whose power sums up the ideas of lesser artists and signalizes an epoch. We know that Debussy derived his unique and wholly original art from many sources—from plainsong, from certain works of Moussorgsky, from Javanese music heard at the Paris Exposition of 1889. All were grist to his mill. And here Debussy examines, and modestly orchestrates, the simple and limited invention of Satie. He does so as a master jeweler would polish and set some precious stone. In so doing he makes clear to us the significance of an idea that Satie could entertain better than he could perfect and capture. This idea—for it is really one melodic idea, with slight variation, which serves as the basis of both the short pieces heard yesterday—is truly original and has a singular and indefinable classicism.

Nevertheless those who have played the "Gymnopedies" as piano pieces know how far they remain from the beauty that Debussy achieves with only a few instruments of the orchestra. We have suddenly, in place, a theme with a cool curve of phrase and a pleasingly archaic harmony, a theme of what might be considered Grecian contour, a little hymn to Pagan beauty. It is no longer of pillar or frieze or sculpture that we think, but of the sensuous beauty of a Pagan age. The music, in Debussy's hands, while retaining a certain purity of line, becomes tinted and perhaps a little decadent with the languor that penetrates the afternoon revery of the Faun, or the thought of the poet who watches the slow and solemn march of the clouds ("Nuages") as they pass above and fade into the distant gray sky. Partly because of Satie's obscurity at the time, but also because of the fragmentary nature of his talent, the "Gymnopedie" by themselves would have remained almost unknown and without special significance. But the eye of a genius discovered them, and we, the living, with Satie, the dead, have occasion to render thanks for Debussy's passing glance.

As for the performances of the afternoon, the "Gymnopedies" were accomplished with especial insight and beauty of tone. Beethoven's overture was the least convincing of the afternoon. It was nuanced and sentimentalized here and there—details, it is true, but details that took from the music a measure of its strength and nobility. The remaining performances, when Mr. Koussvitsky repeated "Rugby" and Bloch's "America," were hardly to be surpassed, from any technical or interpretive point of view.

The result, as furnishing a commentary upon the compositions themselves, was interesting. "Rugby" did not gain anything new. The Bloch symphony did. This symphony has been repeatedly discussed by the writer. The last reference to it was made not later than last Friday morning. There are all sorts of strong and valid criticisms of its conception and execution. It is program music with the artistic shortcomings that program music is so likely to have. It is an "American" symphony composed by an artist of foreign birth and youthful environment. The score is a mass of musical quotations of melodies afloat in our atmosphere, and most Americans feel that these melodies are not presented characteristically by the composer. And who is this composer, they ask, to venture to express for Americans the spirit of their land?

The last question can be answered first. We nee not consider "America" as representing native feeling or native reverence at all. Let us say that the symphony is America in the eyes of a naturalized citizen of foreign birth. It is what America means to him. Certainly, if he has the inspiration to express that he has every moral and artistic right to do so. The question of the creative employment and development of American themes has a relation to this issue. We may not hear themes well known to all Americans treated as we expect them to be. (Neither, they say, do the people of Spain accept or in a majority admire Bizet's "Carmen!") If Mr. Bloch employs American themes in an original and expressive manner of his own, and if America, he past, present and future, stir him t creative achievement that is important and moving to the listener, we have no ground for criticism on a racial or nationalistic basis. The sole question, when all extraneous issues have been swept aside, is whether the symphony great music.

Well, a surprisingly large part of the symphony is great music, which strikes fire, which thrills the listener. This music does not come, admittedly, from as deep a consciousness or such sustained strength or wisdom in the choice of melodic material as other great works by Bloch. But it is no symphony to be dismissed with its première, and it grows with repetition. It is a score full of feeling, of complete sincerity, of brilliant workmanship and instrumentation and dramatic exposition. When Mr. Koussevitzky performs it there is the effect of surprising unit and inspiration. The slow movement now seems the weakest part, unless we also include the much-abused anthem with the extremely naïve text of the composer. We know that he wished to produce a hymn that everybody in a great demoncracy could understand and sing. Most of us consider this aim ill-judged. Highly unfavorable criticism, for that matter, has been directed on somewhat similar grounds against the theme of the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

A certain percentage of the objections made to this rhapsody from the time of its first performances will probably hold true. It is none the less probable that the work will survive its criticism and find a long and warm welcome by the great public. It is, after all, and obviously, the expression of a man of genius, and a man of genius, even if he is mistaken, is difficult to dispose of. Think of the new works performed this season at orchestral concerts and compare with them this symphony. In such a light it looms gigantic. The work will come up again, and then again, for attention. The performance yesterday was received with immense enthusiasm. What percentage of this was due to the interpretation is uncertain, but there is no question that the music appealed strongly to the audience—admitting that the audience and Mr. Bloch were under material obligations to Mr. Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
FEB 5 - 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS AT CARNEGIE

Serge Koussevitzky, for his second programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visit to Carnegie Hall on Saturday played the Beethoven third "Lenore" overture, with peculiarly exaggerated emphasis, and two of the "Gymnopedies" of Erik Satie in the Debussy orchestration. Otherwise, he repeated from his previous programme Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" and Ernest Bloch's "America."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
FEB 5 - 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS AT CARNEGIE

Serge Koussevitzky, for his second programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visit to Carnegie Hall on Saturday played the Beethoven third "Lenore" overture, with peculiarly exaggerated emphasis, and two of the "Gymnopedies" of Erik Satie in the Debussy orchestration. Otherwise, he repeated from his previous programme Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" and Ernest Bloch's "America."

TURN TO PAGE 100 FOR FEB 10

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
FEB 4 - 1929

Albert Spalding Gives Recital

American Violinist Offers Program of Familiar Music at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Albert Spalding, the foremost American violinist and one of the leading players of the world, gave his only local recital yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program presented nothing new, but it was composed of works well suited to an exhibition of the art of the performer. The classic school of the violin contributed Corelli's A major sonata and the universal school of Bach the prelude and gavotte from the E major partita and a chorale from the Christmas cantata arranged by Mr. Spalding himself. The perennial Spanish symphony of Lalo led the way to pieces by Ravel, Brahms and Sarasate.

Mr. Spalding holds himself in accord with the classic style around which cling many traditions, but which nevertheless must be sought in the music itself. It is indisputable that no two men play classic compositions in precisely the same manner, nor is it desirable that they should. The great artist is he who interprets according to his own imagination and temperament without obviously misrepresenting the composer. Mr. Spalding is a violinist of intellectual penetration, of fastidious taste and of unfailing finish in execution. It is therefore to be expected that the elegance and repose of the classic music appeal strongly to him and that in its performance he is almost invariably happy.

Mr. Spalding's Spaniards were all grandees. Lalo's composition seems to be one that all fiddlers must play and most of them make a real idle feat out of it. But Mr. Spalding undoubtedly believes that if the themes of the work may have been born among the people, they went to Madrid to be cultivated. His performance of the music was charming in its clear and fluent style and in its elegance. There was no touch of sentimentalism nor any attempt to suggest the dangerous proximity of Carmens.

Many musicians must have heard the Bach gavotte treated as if its main purpose was to make the violin rival the sonorities of the piano arrangement; but here again the artist of yesterday afternoon preserved the dignity of the movement without sacrificing any of its piquancy. Mr. Benoist, faithful accompanist of many seasons, was admirable at the piano. The audience was very demonstrative and seemed hungry for encores.

The matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday was concerned in part with repetitions of music heard at the preceding Thursday night entertainment. The works offered for a second audience were Mr. Honegger's celebration of football and Mr. Bloch's epic rhapsody apostrophizing our country. Once upon a time there was a very tart and pungent gentleman named Hans von Buelow, who, besides being a pianist of tremendous pedagogic authority, was a conductor of the first rank. He did many remarkable things over and above being the first husband of Cosima Wagner and the first conductor of "Die Meistersinger" so that he inevitably became a sort of legendary figure. One of the most delightful fables attached to his career tell us that when he introduced a certain symphony of Brahms to the Berlin public it was received without a single hand of applause.

Thereupon, says the chronicle, he turned to the audience and said: "Oh, you don't understand it. Well, you'll hear it again." And he forthwith dispensed with the remainder of the program and repeated the symphony. Possibly Mr. Koussevitzky believes that some of the thick-headed scribes of this city need more hearings of the epic rhapsody in order to arrive at a comprehension of its mighty message. This one confesses that the composition makes upon him an impression which has become familiar to him in the course of many years of listening to works of tonal art. The more he hears it the less he finds to understand. Experience has taught him that this is not the way of masterpieces.

In addition to the repeated numbers Saturday's list included the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, of Beethoven, which has endured many repetitations without ceasing to proclaim its greatness, and Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," Nos. 1 and 3, orchestrated by Debussy. Perhaps these musical embodiments of the physical activities of the youths of Greece were chosen as a historical preface to Honegger's delineation of the rude sport of the modern collegian. M. Satie was haunted by a fear that he had failed as a composer because he was a dreamer, but after all he was the father of all such as seek inspiration in material action and exotic fancies and expression in strange idioms. His influence went even further, for he is responsible for much of Debussy and most of Ravel. To have been the spiritual father of these two was not failure.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 9 - 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"America," Bloch's epic rhapsody, the new prize-winning piece, which has been played all over the United States with great success, will be brought to Providence by Serge Koussevitzky when the Russian conductor comes with the Boston Symphony orchestra to give the third concert of the season in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 19. Ernest Bloch divides his rhapsody into three parts, the first depicting the America of the Indians and early Puritan settlers. The second movement portrays the old South with its gay romance and the tragedy and sorrow brought by the Civil war. The last movement, entitled "The Present—the Future," sets forth our own jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the composition, magnificently prepared, is a hymn to America. This culminating hymn will be sung by a mixed chorus of Providence, trained by John B. Archer.

Koussevitzky will open the programme with Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, appropriate to the 100th anniversary season of the death of this master, and also play Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
FEB 9 - 1929

Koussevitsky to Play Bloch Epic In Concert Here

"America," Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, the new prize winning piece which has been played all over the United States with great success, will be brought to Providence by Serge Koussevitzky when the Russian conductor comes here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give the third concert of the season, in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 19.

Koussevitzky will open the program with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, appropriate to the 100th anniversary season of the death of this master, and also play Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CANADA
MAIL & EMPIRE
FEB 9 - 1929

Mr. Koussevitzky gave two performances of the America Symphony of Bloch, which was awarded a prize in a contest and played here for the first time, recently, it will be remembered, by the Philharmonic under Walter Damrosch. With the better conductor at the baton, the music sounded better, parts of it, that is. Mr. Bloch has made what cannot fail to be looked at as an obvious bid to prove his complete Americanization. His "hymn" at the end, which "even a bootblack could understand", does not seem any great improvement on what Moody and Sankey did half a century ago. The work as a whole has virility when it is not syrupy and sensational. It may take its place in the regular repertoire of the major orchestras, also it may not. Nous verrons. Mr. Koussevitzky also played Honegger's Rugby, heard recently and reviewed at the time. As Lorelei Lee said, that sort of thing is entertaining if it entertains you. Debussy's Nocturnes were heard at both concerts, and Prokofieff's so-called "Classical" Symphony at the first, and Handel's Concerto Grosso in B Minor at the second. The gods are still with us!

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Mercury
NEW BEDFORD
MASSACHUSETTS
FEB 12 1929

99

ANOTHER NEW BEDFORD BOY PLAYS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Owing to the illness of a clarinet player in the Boston Symphony orchestra, a New Bedford boy, Manuel C. Valerio, of 105 Bates street, occupied for the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts a chair in the wood wind section of that famous body.

An article on Mr. Valerio by Jose da Costa of this city, his instructor in advanced solfeggio for three years, appeared in The Mercury last September. This clarinetist of promise and early attainment is in his 23rd year. He is an employe of the Skinner Organ company of Boston. He began instruction on his instrument with Antonio Raposo of this city who, after four years, sent him to Albert Sand, then first clarinetist in the Boston Symphony orchestra. When Sand left the orchestra, Valerio continued his studies with A. Arcieri, another member. Valerio is now under the instruction of Vanmini, a former member of the orchestra, who is well known as director of a small group of Symphony men called the Symphony ensemble. Valerio played with this ensemble last summer at the Newport Casino.

As the first two numbers on last week's program—the Bach Brandenburg Concerto and the Mozart Concerto—called for a diminished orchestra, Valerio appeared only in the last half of the program—pronounced by Philip Hale a "marvelous" performance of Richard Strauss's magnificent tone poem, Also Sprach Zarathustra. Besides interested favorable comments from fellow players, Valerio received a "very well" from Koussevitsky at the third rehearsal. The conductor repeated his praise after the concert.

It was a matter of pride and pleasure for several New Bedford people in the audiences to note the broad intelligent forehead and sensitive, refined personality of the young musician standing out clearly in the ranks of over a hundred players on the stage of Symphony hall.

A. C. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
Republican
FEB 14 1929

The Boston Symphony orchestra deficit for the season 1927-'28 was $87,000—a tidy sum, but not staggering. This year the deficit is expected to be about $134,000. The $32,000 radio broadcast item accounts for part of the difference. Increases in salaries to the amount of about $15,000 account for some more.

There can be no doubt that this increased deficit will be met. No institution in Boston is more characteristic of the city at its best than this orchestra. The trustees are far from discouraged. They point out that other cities have similar problems, with larger deficits; and they call attention to the fact that while in the first year after the orchestra passed from the support of "a single generous citizen," Maj Higginson, the number of subscribers to the deficit was 127, it rose in 10 years to 397. There should be more. In making their appeal for aid, the trustees say, quite properly, that they "would welcome most of all an appreciable increase in the number of individual subscribers."

This stirs a thought which may be fantastic, but we do not think so. How many thousands enjoyed the radio broadcasts of these great concerts a season ago—broadcasts made possible by the expenditure of an advertiser's money, and this money going to help reduce the deficit of the orchestra? Undoubtedly the number was large. What would happen if the Symphony orchestra next season should undertake of its own initiative and through its own expenditure to broadcast its series of concerts, and on that basis make appeal for subscriptions in support of the orchestra from a far wider field than is now contributing?

OVER

...radio has become a standard feature in the great majority of American homes. The instrument has been greatly improved. A few years ago large orchestras did not sound to advantage over the air waves. Today they sound well. "Loud speakers" (abominable term!) are much better than they were even a year ago. Reception is good even on inexpensive sets today. The big broadcasting companies are trying to improve their programs—and are doing it. Advertisers are presenting really great

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 3 -

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall differed in only two particulars from his New York program of the previous Thursday evening—in Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and, for a rare and welcome innovation, two of the "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie, composed as piano pieces as early as 1888 and orchestrated by Debussy.

There are three "Gymnopedies" for piano. Mr. Hale's program notes give us the derivation of the title. The Gymnopedia was the festival held annually at Sparta, when naked youths rendered homage in dancing and gymnastic exercises to Apollo, while songs and paens were sung by a chorus, the leader of which wore the chaplet of leaves that commemorated a Spartan victory. Satie, when he composed the "Gymnopedies," was experimenting in various ways, among them the employment of unresolved harmonies in a manner which interested Débussy. These experiments are discovered notably in Satie's early "Sarabandes." He composed in the same period his orchestral music for Rosicrucian ceremonies and for Jules-Bois's Rosicrucian drama, "La Porte Heroique du Ciel." He touched the hem of Greek classicism, and under this inspiration wrote the three—in themselves—trifling but original and significant piano pieces which attracted Debussy's attention.

Thus the "Gmynopedies," as orchestrated by Debussy, offer an excellent example of the capacities of the man of talent, as compared with the man of genius, whose power sums up the ideas of lesser artists and signalizes an epoch. We know that Debussy derived his unique and wholly original art from many sources—from plainsong, from certain works of Moussorgsky, from Javanese music heard at the Paris Exposition of 1889. All were grist to his mill. And here Debussy examines, and modestly orchestrates, the simple and limited invention of Satie. He does so as a master jeweler would polish and set some precious stone. In so doing he makes clear to us the significance of an idea that Satie could entertain better than he could perfect and capture. This idea—for it is really one melodic idea, with slight variation, which serves as the basis of both the short pieces heard yesterday—is truly original and has a singular and indefinable classicism.

Nevertheless those who have played the "Gymnopedies" as piano pieces know how far they remain from the beauty that Debussy achieves with only a few instruments of the orchestra. We have suddenly, in place, a theme with a cool curve of phrase and pleasingly archaic harmony, a theme of what might be considered Grecian contour, a little hymn to Pagan beauty. It is no longer of pillar or frieze or sculpture that we think, but of the sensuous beauty of a Pagan age. The music, in Debussy's hands, while retaining a certain purity of line, becomes tinted and perhaps a little decadent with the languor that penetrates the afternoon revery of the Faun, or the thought of the poet who watches the slow and solemn march of the clouds ("Nuages") as they pass above and fade into the distant gray sky. Partly because of Satie's obscurity at the time, but also because of the fragmentary nature of his talent, the "Gymnopedie" by themselves would have remained almost unknown and without special significance. But the eye of a genius discovered them, and we, the living, with Satie, the dead, have occasion to render thanks for Debussy's passing glance.

As for the performances of the afternoon, the "Gymnopedies" were accomplished with especial insight and beauty of tone. Beethoven's overture was the least convincing of the afternoon. It was nuanced and sentimentalized here and there—details, it is true, but details that took from the music a measure of its strength and nobility. The remaining performances, when Mr. Koussvitsky repeated "Rugby" and Bloch's "America," were hardly to be surpassed, from any technical or interpretive point of view.

The result, as furnishing a commentary upon the compositions themselves, was interesting. "Rugby" did not gain anything new. The Bloch symphony did. This symphony has been repeatedly discussed by the writer. The last reference to it was made not later than last Friday morning. There are all sorts of strong and valid criticisms of its conception and execution. It is program music with the artistic shortcomings that program music is so likely to have. It is an "American" symphony composed by an artist of foreign birth and youthful environment. The score is a mass of musical quotations of melodies afloat in our atmosphere, and most Americans feel that these melodies are not presented characteristically by the composer. And who is this composer, they ask, to venture to express for Americans the spirit of their land?

The last question can be answered first. We nee not consider "America" as representing native feeling or native reverence at all. Let us say that the symphony is America in the eyes of a naturalized citizen of foreign birth. It is what America means to him. Certainly, if he has the inspiration to express that he has every moral and artistic right to do so. The question of the creative employment and development of American themes has a relation to this issue. We may not hear themes well known to all Americans treated as we expect them to be. (Neither, they say, do the people of Spain accept or in a majority admire Bizet's "Carmen!") If Mr. Bloch employs American themes in an original and expressive manner of his own, and if America, her past, present and future, stir him to creative achievement that is important and moving to the listener, we have no ground for criticism on a racial or nationalistic basis. The sole question, when all extraneous issues have been swept aside, is whether the symphony great music.

Well, a surprisingly large part of the symphony is great music, which strikes fire, which thrills the listener. This music does not come, admittedly, from as deep a consciousness or such sustained strength or wisdom in the choice of melodic material as other great works by Bloch. But it is no symphony to be dismissed with its première, and it grows with repetition. It is a score full of feeling, of complete sincerity, of brilliant workmanship and instrumentation and dramatic exposition. When Mr. Koussevitzky performs it there is the effect of surprising unit and inspiration. The slow movement now seems the weakest part, unless we also include the much-abused anthem with the extremely naïve text of the composer. We know that he wished to produce a hymn that everybody in a great demoncracy could understand and sing. Most of us consider this aim ill-judged. Highly unfavorable criticism, for that matter, has been directed on somewhat similar grounds against the theme of the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

A certain percentage of the objections made to this rhapsody from the time of its first performances will probably hold true. It is none the less probable that the work will survive its criticism and find a long and warm welcome by the great public. It is, after all, and obviously, the expression of a man of genius, and a man of genius, even if he is mistaken, is difficult to dispose of. Think of the new works performed this season at orchestral concerts and compare with them this symphony. In such a light it looms gigantic. The work will come up again, and then again, for attention. The performance yesterday was received with immense enthusiasm. What percentage of this was due to the interpretation is uncertain, but there is no question that the music appealed strongly to the audience—admitting that the audience and Mr. Bloch were under material obligations to Mr. Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
FEB 3 -

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS AT CARNEGIE

Serge Koussevitzky, for his second programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visit to Carnegie Hall on Saturday played the Beethoven third "Lenore" overture, with peculiarly exaggerated emphasis, and two of the "Gymnopedies" of Erik Satie in the Debussy orchestration. Otherwise, he repeated from his previous programme Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" and Ernest Bloch's "America."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
FEB 5 -

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS AT CARNEGIE

Serge Koussevitzky, for his second programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visit to Carnegie Hall on Saturday played the Beethoven third "Lenore" overture, with peculiarly exaggerated emphasis, and two of the "Gymnopedies" of Erik Satie in the Debussy orchestration. Otherwise, he repeated from his previous programme Arthur Honegger's "Rugby" and Ernest Bloch's "America."

TURN TO PAGE 100 FOR FEB 10

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
FEB 4 - 1929

Albert Spalding Gives Recital

American Violinist Offers Program of Familiar Music at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Albert Spalding, the foremost American violinist and one of the leading players of the world, gave his only local recital yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program presented nothing new, but it was composed of works well suited to an exhibition of the art of the performer. The classic school of the violin contributed Corelli's A major sonata and the universal school of Bach the prelude and gavotte from the E major partita and a chorale from the Christmas cantata arranged by Mr. Spalding himself. The perennial Spanish symphony of Lalo led the way to pieces by Ravel, Brahms and Sarasate.

Mr. Spalding holds himself in accord with the classic style around which cling many traditions, but which nevertheless must be sought in the music itself. It is indisputable that no two men play classic compositions in precisely the same manner, nor is it desirable that they should. The great artist is he who interprets according to his own imagination and temperament without obviously misrepresenting the composer. Mr. Spalding is a violinist of intellectual penetration, of fastidious taste and of unfailing finish in execution. It is therefore to be expected that the elegance and repose of the classic music appeal strongly to him and that in its performance he is almost invariably happy.

Mr. Spalding and Spaniards were all grandees. Lalo's shopworn composition seems to be one that all fiddlers must play and most of them make a real fiddle feat out of it. But Mr. Spalding undoubtedly believes that if the themes of the work may have been born among the people, they went to Madrid to be cultivated. His performance of the music was charming in its clear and fluent style and in its elegance. There was no touch of sentimentalism nor any attempt to suggest the dangerous proximity of Carmens.

Many music lovers must have heard the Bach gavotte treated as if its main purpose were to make the violin rival the sonorities of the piano arrangement; but here again the artist of yesterday afternoon preserved the dignity of the movement without sacrificing any of its piquancy. Mr. Benoist, faithful accompanist of many seasons, was admirable at the piano. The audience was very demonstrative and seemed hungry for encores.

The matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday was concerned in part with repetitions of music heard at the preceding Thursday night entertainment. The works offered for a second audience were Mr. Honegger's celebration of football and Mr. Bloch's epic rhapsody apostrophizing our country. Once upon a time there was a very tart and pungent gentleman named Hans von Buelow, who, besides being a pianist of tremendous pedagogic authority, was a conductor of the first rank. He did many remarkable things over and above being the first husband of Cosima Wagner and the first conductor of "Die Meistersinger" so that he inevitably became a sort of legendary figure. One of the most delightful fables attached to his career tell us that when he introduced a certain symphony of Brahms to the Berlin public it was received without a single hand of applause.

Thereupon, says the chronicle, he turned to the audience and said: "Oh, you don't understand it. Well, you'll hear it again." And he forthwith dispensed with the remainder of the program and repeated the symphony. Possibly Mr. Koussevitzky believes that some of the thick-headed scribes of this city need more hearings of the epic rhapsody in order to arrive at a comprehension of its mighty message. This one confesses that the composition makes upon him an impression which has become familiar to him in the course of many years of listening to works of tonal art. The more he hears it the less he finds to understand. Experience has taught him that this is not the way of masterpieces.

In addition to the repeated numbers Saturday's list included the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, of Beethoven, which has endured many repetitations without ceasing to proclaim its greatness, and Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," Nos. 1 and 3, orchestrated by Debussy. Perhaps these musical embodiments of the physical activities of the youths of Greece were chosen as a historical preface to Honegger's delineation of the rude sport of the modern collegian. M. Satie was haunted by a fear that he had failed as a composer because he was a dreamer, but after all he was the father of all such as seek inspiration in material action and exotic fancies and expression in strange idioms. His influence went even further, for he is responsible for much of Debussy and most of Ravel. To have been the spiritual father of these two was not failure.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 9 - 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"America," Bloch's epic rhapsody, the new prize-winning piece, which has been played all over the United States with great success, will be brought to Providence by Serge Koussevitzky when the Russian conductor comes with the Boston Symphony orchestra to give the third concert of the season in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 19. Ernest Bloch divides his rhapsody into three parts, the first depicting the America of the Indians and early Puritan settlers. The second movement portrays the old South with its gay romance and the tragedy and sorrow brought by the Civil war. The last movement, entitled "The President—the Future," sets forth our own jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the composition, magnificently prepared, is a hymn to America. This culminating hymn will be sung by a mixed chorus of Providence, trained by John B. Archer.

Koussevitzky will open the programme with Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, appropriate to the 100th anniversary season of the death of this master, and also play Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
FEB 9 - 1929

Koussevitsky to Play Bloch Epic In Concert Here

"America," Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, the new prize winning piece which has been played all over the United States with great success, will be brought to Providence by Serge Koussevitzky when the Russian conductor comes here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give the third concert of the season, in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 19.

Koussevitzky will open the program with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, appropriate to the 100th anniversary season of the death of this master, and also play Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CANADA
MAIL & EMPIRE
FEB 5 - 1929

Mr. Koussevitzky gave two performances of the America Symphony of Bloch, which was awarded a prize in a contest and played here for the first time, recently, it will be remembered, by the Philharmonic under Walter Damrosch. With the better conductor at the baton, the music sounded better, parts of it, that is. Mr. Bloch has made what cannot fail to be looked at as an obvious bid to prove his complete Americanization. His "hymn" at the end, which "even a bootblack could understand", does not seem any great improvement on what Moody and Sankey did half a century ago. The work as a whole has virility when it is not syrupy and sensational. It may take its place in the regular repertoire of the major orchestras, also it may not. Nous verrons. Mr. Koussevitzky also played Honegger's Rugby, heard recently and reviewed at the time. As Lorelei Lee said, that sort of thing is entertaining if it entertains you. Debussy's Nocturnes were heard at both concerts, and Prokofieff's so-called "Classical" Symphony at the first, and Handel's Concerto Grosso in B Minor at the second. The gods are still with us!

99
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Mercury
NEW BEDFORD
MASSACHUSETTS
FEB 12 1929

ANOTHER NEW BEDFORD BOY PLAYS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Owing to the illness of a clarinet player in the Boston Symphony orchestra, a New Bedford boy, Manuel C. Valerio, of 105 Bates street, occupied for the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts a chair in the wood wind section of that famous body.

An article on Mr. Valerio by Jose da Costa of this city, his instructor in advanced solfeggio for three years, appeared in The Mercury last September.. This clarinetist of promise and early attainment is in his 23rd year. He is an employe of the Skinner Organ company of Boston. He began instruction on his instrument with Antonio Raposo of this city who, after four years, sent him to Albert Sand, then first clarinetist in the Boston Symphony orchestra. When Sand left the orchestra, Valerio continued his studies with A. Arcieri, another member. Valerio is now under the instruction of Vanmini, a former member of the orchestra, who is well known as director of a small group of Symphony men called the Symphony ensemble. Valerio played with this ensemble last summer at the Newport Casino.

As the first two numbers on last week's program—the Bach Brandenburg Concerto and the Mozart Concerto—called for a diminished orchestra, Valerio appeared only in the last half of the program—pronounced by Philip Hale a "marvelous" performance of Richard Strauss's magnificent tone poem, Also Sprach Zarathustra. Besides interested favorable comments from fellow players, Valerio received a "very well" from Koussevitsky at the third rehearsal. The conductor repeated his praise after the concert.

It was a matter of pride and pleasure for several New Bedford people in the audiences to note the broad intelligent forehead and sensitive, refined personality of the young musician standing out clearly in the ranks of over a hundred players on the stage of Symphony hall.

A. C. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 14 1929

The Boston Symphony orchestra deficit for the season 1927-'28 was $87,000—a tidy sum, but not staggering. This year the deficit is expected to be about $134,000. The $32,000 radio broadcast item accounts for part of the difference. Increases in salaries to the amount of about $15,000 account for some more.

There can be no doubt that this increased deficit will be met. No institution in Boston is more characteristic of the city at its best than this orchestra. The trustees are far from discouraged. They point out that other cities have similar problems, with larger deficits; and they call attention to the fact that while in the first year after the orchestra passed from the support of "a single generous citizen," Maj Higginson, the number of subscribers to the deficit was 127, it rose in 10 years to 397. There should be more. In making their appeal for aid, the trustees say, quite properly, that they "would welcome most of all an appreciable increase in the number of individual subscribers."

This stirs a thought which may be fantastic, but we do not think so. How many thousands enjoyed the radio broadcasts of these great concerts a season ago—broadcasts made possible by the expenditure of an advertiser's money, and this money going to help reduce the deficit of the orchestra? Undoubtedly the number was large. What would happen if the Symphony orchestra next season should undertake of its own initiative and through its own expenditure to broadcast its series of concerts, and on that basis make appeal for subscriptions in support of the orchestra from a far wider field than is now contributing?

OVER

100

is not large. It gives much for the money of those privileged to attend its concerts in person. It must be that were a general opportunity given to subscribe toward its support, even by small sums from a wide field, on the promise that thereby its complete series of concerts would be available over the air, there would be no lack of contributions.

Make the Boston Symphony the outstanding feature of the radio program for this part of the country.

Less a matter for local pride, though a factor in local enjoyment, is our opera season, which has just closed with the series of performances by the Chicago company. Here in this part of the country we like to place some emphasis on the gunman record of Chicago, but it seems we have to turn to her for fine opera. Some of us still remember the days when the Boston Opera house was new and we had in our city our own local company, which gave a gorgeous season, with good casts and admirable performances altogether. Memories of those days were called to mind by the presence here in this Chicago series of Roberto Moranzoni, who was of the staff of conductors in the "good old days" and is waving the baton for the Chicagoans now.

Alas! Boston could not maintain an opera company. Maybe to maintain the Symphony is better, if we cannot have both. Mr Jordan carried the load of the opera for as long as he could reasonably be asked to; and none volunteered to carry indefinitely forward what he so well began. We recall a "mot" of the late and well-beloved Louis C. Elson, when Mr Russell and others were carrying on our opera through Mr Jordan's generosity, which was to the effect that once again the Israelites had come to the banks of the Jordan. Mr Elson in those days had a happy faculty for witty sentences—as when he once observed that no gentleman ever would strike a lady, except in anger. Louis Elson is not forgotten by his friends; and they were legion.

Well, all that is past history, yet linked with the present by memory which binds all times and all things. We still miss the Boston Opera company. The Chicago company closed its local season with an aged opera and one more modern—Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor" and Puccini's "Madame Butterfly." It has been said that the world has known but two great sextets—"Lucia" and "Floradora." Of the two, the latter is the more convincing, and maybe it will live as long. Yet there is delight in the disconnected tunes of Donizetti, and great joy for the singers of them. We once saw a tender little tenor nearly burst a blood vessel in "Lucia," being cast with Tetrazzini, and determined to be heard despite the limitations of Nature. We have heard a reasonable share of operas, but we know of no musical effort in which singers can yell louder, or do, than in the "Lucia" sextet. We like to hear them yell. To our crude way of thinking, this sextet is not a success unless it is yelled. It is the supreme fortissimo of sound.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
FEB 10 1929

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra played "America" of Bloch, many persons said "How silly," "How unnecessary"—and when one of the American tunes came upon the ear, many a nose went up in a bit of a sneer. Thomas heard Henry Hadley say that he thought the work ought to be cut down considerably—almost half. On the other hand, many strong defenders were present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 10 1929

The rumored European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this [illegible] is reported as "well-founded" by The Telegraph. "It is now common knowledge in well-informed circles," it is said, "that the tour, under the direction of Koussevitzky, will begin in April and will [illegible] concerts in Paris, London, the English provinces, Amsterdam, Brussels, Berlin, Vienna, Budapest and Prague."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 10 1929

Jesús Maria Sanromá, the young Spanish-American pianist heard here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Toch's concerto at the beginning of January, will give a recital in Town Hall on Friday evening, Feb. 22. He has returned from a two-year tour in Europe, where he played with success in Germany, France and Spain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 10 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

The announcement that Serge Koussevitzky is to perform Bloch's "America" at the third visit of the Boston Symphony to Providence on the 19th of this month has aroused much interest among the orchestra's followers. The work, which is called an epic rhapsody, has a culminating hymn, for which the services of John B. Archer and members of the Providence Festival Chorus have been enlisted.

This novelty, which is in three parts, will take up the entire second half of the program. Schubert's Symphony in B-minor, the "Unfinished," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," will compose the first half. The three sections of "America" are described as follows: Poco lento, (...1620), "The Soil —The Indians—England—The Mayflower—The Landing of the Pilgrims," Allegretto (1861-1865), "Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow;" Allegro con spirito (1926...), "The Present—The Future."

In his first movement, Bloch depicts musically the beginnings of the nation with scenes that shift from America, in its aboriginal state, to England, and back again to the coming of the settlers. The second movement has the Civil War for its theme, first giving a romantic picture of the old South, in which old Southern melodies are introduced. The serenity is broken by the outbreak of the war.

In the third movement, the composer sets forth the present jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the rhapsody which, it is said, is gloriously led up to, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. He has dedicated his work to Walt Whitman and Abraham Lincoln.

"America" is one of the most played and most discussed new scores of the season. It is a prize composition, of which Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities, and then followed performances all over the country. Such was the impression which this score made that Koussevitzky repeated it at a later pair of concerts in Boston, and again played it when the orchestra last visited Carnegie Hall, New York, on Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. These were occasions of prolonged demonstrations and the highest critical tributes for the marvelous performances which Koussevitzky inspires in his orchestra.

◈ ◈ ◈

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 14 1929

What Price the Best in Music?

It is depressing to realize that such a splendid orchestra as the Boston Symphony plays itself into a deficit every year, and has to appeal to the generous for assistance. Last year the deficit was $87,000. This year the deficit is forecast as likely to be 50 per cent greater, that is to say, in the neighborhood of $134,000.

The depression is made darker when it is realized that the experience of the Boston Symphony orchestra is far from unique. Orchestras in other cities stagger under even bigger deficits. In America, it is plain, the best in music is commercially unprofitable.

Perhaps it would be nearer exact to say that beyond a certain point it is unprofitable. That seems to be the condition here in Worcester. We get very enthusiastic about our Music Festival—and rightly so; but the Boston Symphony orchestra, foremost among such organizations, has quit coming here because of the sparse patronage. The Steinert concerts, too, have left off; and the customary Christmastide rendition of the Messiah was omitted this winter. The three excellent recitals at Mechanics Hall with which Clark University supplemented its famed Fine Arts Course this year were not attended as they deserved to be attended.

The conclusion is inevitable that our American democracy is not yet avid for culture, is not yet appreciative of what are called the finer things in a cultural sense. But our hunger is sharpening and our appreciation is mounting. While the radio and the phonograph may completely satisfy the craving of many for music, yet they doubtless inspire many others to set about climbing the heights.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
FEB 15 1929

FINE CONCERT GIVEN.

Offering of Philharmonic Society Thoroughly Enjoyed

Combination of Violin, 'Cello and Harp Unusual and Compositions Not Often Heard Result

A good-sized audience thoroughly enjoyed an unusually fine concert in the Rogers High School auditorium Thursday evening, it being the Philharmonic Society's second of the thirty-third season and the seventy-eighth of the organization. It was announced as to be given by the Elcus-Zighera Trio, composed of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and playing the violin, 'cello, harp and piano. The artists were delayed by missing a connection, starting the concert a little late, and Mr. Elcus was prevented from coming by illness, However, a substitute violinist was on hand, and nobody would have suspected that he was not the regular violinist of the trio.

This carries unusual credit to Mr. Norbert Lauga, who was the substitute, for "ensemble" is something not attainable in one or more brief rehearsals, and the whole evening was a continuous pleasure because of the perfect ensemble. Here was a delightful sympathy and perfect understanding, all the time, and if the music called for a momentary prominence of the piano it had it, and the rest of the time it was more felt than heard. So each instrument had its proper place and effect.

There was no representation of the old classics on the program. On the other hand, there was a total, and blessed, absence of rampant "modern" stuff. It was music, all the time, quiet, and melodious, with each graceful bit, carefully presented, and the tone quality always fine. There was no noise. There was plenty of vigorous, lively, intricate, work, but it was done as artists would do it, intelligently, delicately, in a refined way. There was a good variety of styles, and each good. There was no straining for effect, or over-forcing of instruments. The violin had plenty of high notes, but more of lower soulful, ones. Every player has ample technique-enough to cause everybody not to notice it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
FEB 16 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Be Here on Tuesday

A concert of manifold beauty an interest is anticipated in the comin visit of the Boston Symphony Orches tra to Providence next Tuesday eve ning, in the Albee Theatre at 8:15 Serge Koussevitzky will then per form in addition to Bloch's epi rhapsody "America," Schubert's "un finished" Symphony, and Ravel's Cho regraphic Poem, "La Valse." I "America" the orchestra will be as sisted by a mixed chorus which ha been trained by John B. Archer.

Ernest Bloch has spent a long tim in the composition of his rhapsody It is a prize winning piece, and a such had simultaneous performances in five American cities last Decem ber. Koussevitzky then introduced to Boston with such success that h repeated the score in January, an also played it in New York. The fa mous Jewish composer, who ha made America his adopted land, ha delved far into our past for his ma terial. The first number is base upon Indian tribal melodies and ol Puritan hymns, and depicts the abo iginal life of the early white se tlers in America. The second move [illegible] the old time Sout It begins with the gay and carefre [illegible] Civil War.

There are old reels and hornpipe and a suggestion of "Swanee River This breaks into the gay measures o "Pop Goes the Weasel." The seren ity is broken by the tragic measure [illegible] eak of war, in whic "John Brown's Body" and "Th Battle Cry of Freedom" are base The third movement entitled "Th [illegible]ent—The Future," opens with depiction of our own age of riotou jazz and relentless pounding ma chinery. A long preparation leads the announcement in its full form the anthem, "America," which Bloch represents the ideal which li before our vast people. Thus, at th end of the piece, the chorus is intro duced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 16 1929

[illegible]dge economy."

SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE ON TUESDAY NIGHT

Mixed Chorus Will Assist in Presentation of Bloch's "America."—Orchestra Also Will Offer Compositions of Schubert and Ravel.

A concert of manifold beauty and interest is anticipated in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next Tuesday evening, in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform in addition to Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America;" Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse." In "America," the orchestra will be assisted by a mixed chorus which has been trained by John B. Archer.

Ernest Booth has spent a long time in the composition of his Rhapsody. It is a prize-winning piece, and as such had simultaneous performances in five American cities last December. Koussevitzky then introduced it to Boston with such success that he repeated the score in January, and also played it in New York. The famous Jewish composer, who has made America his adopted land, has delved far into our past for his material.

The first number is based upon Indian tribal melodies and old Puritan hymns, and depicts the aboriginal life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the old-time South. It begins with the gay and carefree days before the Civil War. There are old reels and hornpipes, and a suggestion of "Swanee River." This breaks into the gay measures of "Pop Goes the Weasel."

Serenity Broken.

The serenity is broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war, in which "John Brown's Body" and "The Battle Cry of Freedom" are heard. The third movement, entitled "The Present —The Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and relentless pounding machinery. A long preparation leads to the announcement in its full form of the anthem, "America," which to Bloch represents the ideal which lies before our vast people. Thus, at the end of the piece, the chorus is introduced.

The title-page bears this inscription from Walt Whitman: "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The composer has also inscribed: "This symphony has been written in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration."

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony has been played all over the world this season, in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured upon a special Shubert centenary program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Theme Described.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855."

Its first Paris performance led a critic to quote Prudhomme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano." He described it by saying: "There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the

PROV SUN JOURNAL
BOSTON SYMPHONY IN
BLOCH'S "AMERICA" FEB. 10 1929

The announcement that Serge Koussevitzky is to perform Bloch's "America" at the third visit of the Boston Symphony to Providence on the 19th of this month has aroused much interest among the orchestra's followers. The work, which is called an epic rhapsody, has a culminating hymn, for which the services of John B. Archer and members of the Providence Festival Chorus have been enlisted.

This novelty, which is in three parts, will take up the entire second half of the program. Schubert's Symphony in B-minor, the "Unfinished," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," will compose the first half. The three sections of "America" are described as follows: Poco lento, (...1620), "The Soil —The Indians—England—The Mayflower—The Landing of the Pilgrims," Allegretto (1861-1865), "Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow;" Allegro con spirito (1926...), "The Present—The Future."

In his first movement, Bloch depicts musically the beginnings of the nation with scenes that shift from America, in its aboriginal state, to England, and back again to the coming of the settlers. The second movement has the Civil War for its theme, first giving a romantic picture of the old South, in which old Southern melodies are introduced. The serenity is broken by the outbreak of the war.

In the third movement, the composer sets forth the present jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the rhapsody which, it is said, is gloriously led up to, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. He has dedicated his work to Walt Whitman and Abraham Lincoln.

"America" is one of the most played and most discussed new scores of the season. It is a prize composition, of which Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities, and then followed performances all over the country. Such was the impression which this score made that Koussevitzky repeated it at a later pair of concerts in Boston, and again played it when the orchestra last visited Carnegie Hall, New York, on Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. These were occasions of prolonged demonstrations and the highest critical tributes for the marvelous performances which Koussevitzky inspires in his orchestra.

◈ ◈ ◈

100

is not large. It gives much for the money of those privileged to attend its concerts in person. It must be that were a general opportunity given to subscribe toward its support, even by small sums from a wide field, on the promise that thereby its complete series of concerts would be available over the air, there would be no lack of contributions.

Make the Boston Symphony the outstanding feature of the radio program for this part of the country.

Less a matter for local pride, though a factor in local enjoyment, is our opera season, which has just closed with the series of performances by the Chicago company. Here in this part of the country we like to place some emphasis on the gunman record of Chicago, but it seems we have to turn to her for fine opera. Some of us still remember the days when the Boston Opera house was new and we had in our city our own local company, which gave a gorgeous season, with good casts and admirable performances altogether. Memories of those days were called to mind by the presence here in this Chicago series of Roberto Moranzoni, who was of the staff of conductors in the "good old days" and is waving the baton for the Chicagoans now.

Alas! Boston could not maintain an opera company. Maybe to maintain the Symphony is better, if we cannot have both. Mr Jordan carried the load of the opera for as long as he could reasonably be asked to; and none volunteered to carry indefinitely forward what he so well began. We recall a "mot" of the late and well-beloved Louis C. Elson, when Mr Russell and others were carrying on our opera through Mr Jordan's generosity, which was to the effect that once again the Israelites had come to the banks of the Jordan. Mr Elson in those days had a happy faculty for witty sentences—as when he once observed that no gentleman ever would strike a lady, except in anger. Louis Elson is not forgotten by his friends; and they were legion.

Well, all that is past history, yet linked with the present by memory which binds all times and all things. We still miss the Boston Opera company. The Chicago company closed its local season with an aged opera and one more modern—Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor" and Puccini's "Madame Butterfly." It has been said that the world has known but two great sextets—"Lucia" and "Floradora." Of the two, the latter is the more convincing, and maybe it will live as long. Yet there is delight in the disconnected tunes of Donizetti, and great joy for the singers of them. We once saw a tender little tenor nearly burst a blood vessel in "Lucia," being cast with Tetrazzini, and determined to be heard despite the limitations of Nature. We have heard a reasonable share of operas, but we know of no musical effort in which singers can yell louder, or do, than in the "Lucia" sextet. We like to hear them yell. To our crude way of thinking, this sextet is not a success unless it is yelled. It is the supreme fortissimo of sound.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

FEB 6 1929

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra played "American" of Bloch, many persons said "How silly," "How unnecessary"—and when one of the American tunes came upon the ear, many a nose went up in a bit of a sneer. Thomas heard Henry Hadley say that he thought the work ought to be cut down considerably—almost half. On the other hand, many strong defenders were present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 10 1929

The rumored European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Spring is reported as "well-founded" by The Telegraph. "It is now common knowledge in well-informed circles," it is said, "that the tour, under the direction of Koussevitzky, will begin in April and will embrace concerts in Paris, London, the English provinces, Amsterdam, Brussels, Berlin, Vienna, Budapest and Prague."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 10 1929

Jesús Maria Sanromá, the young Spanish-American pianist heard here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Toch's concerto at the beginning of January, will give a recital in Town Hall on Friday evening, Feb. 22. He has returned from a two-year tour in Europe, where he played with success in Germany, France and Spain.

208

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 10 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

The announcement that Serge Koussevitzky is to perform Bloch's "America" at the third visit of the Boston Symphony to Providence on the 19th of this month has aroused much interest among the orchestra's followers. The work, which is called an epic rhapsody, has a culminating hymn, for which the services of John B. Archer and members of the Providence Festival Chorus have been enlisted.

This novelty, which is in three parts, will take up the entire second half of the program. Schubert's Symphony in B-minor, the "Unfinished," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," will compose the first half. The three sections of "America" are described as follows: Poco lento, (...1620), "The Soil —The Indians—England—The Mayflower—The Landing of the Pilgrims," Allegretto (1861-1865), "Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow;" Allegro con spirito (1926...), "The Present—The Future."

In his first movement, Bloch depicts musically the beginnings of the nation with scenes that shift from America, in its aboriginal state, to England, and back again to the coming of the settlers. The second movement has the Civil War for its theme, first giving a romantic picture of the old South, in which old Southern melodies are introduced. The serenity is broken by the outbreak of the war.

In the third movement, the composer sets forth the present jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the rhapsody which, it is said, is gloriously led up to, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. He has dedicated his work to Walt Whitman and Abraham Lincoln.

"America" is one of the most played and most discussed new scores of the season. It is a prize composition, of which Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities, and then followed performances all over the country. Such was the impression which this score made that Koussevitzky repeated it at a later pair of concerts in Boston, and again played it when the orchestra last visited Carnegie Hall, New York, on Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. These were occasions of prolonged demonstrations and the highest critical tributes for the marvelous performances which Koussevitzky inspires in his orchestra.

◈ ◈ ◈

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

What Price the Best in Music?

It is depressing to realize that such a splendid orchestra as the Boston Symphony plays itself into a deficit every year, and has to appeal to the generous for assistance. Last year the deficit was $87,000. This year the deficit is forecast as likely to be 50 per cent greater, that is to say, in the neighborhood of $134,000.

The depression is made darker when it is realized that the experience of the Boston Symphony orchestra is far from unique. Orchestras in other cities stagger under even bigger deficits. In America, it is plain, the best in music is commercially unprofitable.

Perhaps it would be nearer exact to say that beyond a certain point it is unprofitable. That seems to be the condition here in Worcester. We get very enthusiastic about our Music Festival—and rightly so; but the Boston Symphony orchestra, foremost among such organizations, has quit coming here because of the sparse patronage. The Steinert concerts, too, have left off; and the customary Christmastide rendition of the Messiah was omitted this winter. The three excellent recitals at Mechanics Hall with which Clark University supplemented its famed Fine Arts Course this year were not attended as they deserved to be attended.

The conclusion is inevitable that our American democracy is not yet avid for culture, is not yet appreciative of what are called the finer things in a cultural sense. But our hunger is sharpening and our appreciation is mounting. While the radio and the phonograph may completely satisfy the craving of many for music, yet they doubtless inspire many others to set about climbing the heights.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

FEB 15 1929

FINE CONCERT GIVEN.

Offering of Philharmonic Society Thoroughly Enjoyed

Combination of Violin, 'Cello and Harp Unusual and Compositions Not Often Heard Result

A good-sized audience thoroughly enjoyed an unusually fine concert in the Rogers High School auditorium Thursday evening, it being the Philharmonic Society's second of the thirty-third season and the seventy-eighth of the organization. It was announced as to be given by the Elcus-Zighera Trio, composed of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and playing the violin, 'cello, harp and piano. The artists were delayed by missing a connection, starting the concert a little late, and Mr. Elcus was prevented from coming by illness, However, a substitute violinist was on hand, and nobody would have suspected that he was not the regular violinist of the trio.

This carries unusual credit to Mr. Norbert Lauga, who was the substitute, for "ensemble" is something not attainable in one or more brief rehearsals, and the whole evening was a continuous pleasure because of the perfect ensemble. Here was a delightful sympathy and perfect understanding, all the time, and if the music called for a momentary prominence of the piano it had it, and the rest of the time it was more felt than heard. So each instrument had its proper place and effect.

There was no representation of the old classics on the program. On the other hand, there was a total, and blessed, absence of rampant "modern" stuff. It was music, all the time, quiet, and melodious, with each graceful bit, carefully presented, and the tone quality always fine. There was no noise. There was plenty of vigorous, lively, intricate, work, but it was done as artists would do it, intelligently, delicately, in a refined way. There was a good variety of styles, and each good. There was no straining for effect, or over-forcing of instruments. The violin had plenty of high notes, but more of lower soulful, ones. Every player has ample technique-enough to cause everybody not to notice it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

FEB

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Be Here on Tuesday

A concert of manifold beauty and interest is anticipated in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next Tuesday evening, in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform in addition to Bloch's epic rhapsody "America," Schubert's "unfinished" Symphony, and Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse." In "America" the orchestra will be assisted by a mixed chorus which has been trained by John B. Archer.

Ernest Bloch has spent a long time in the composition of his rhapsody. It is a prize winning piece, and as such had simultaneous performances in five American cities last December. Koussevitzky then introduced it to Boston with such success that he repeated the score in January, and also played it in New York. The famous Jewish composer, who has made America his adopted land, has delved far into our past for his material. The first number is based upon Indian tribal melodies and old Puritan hymns, and depicts the aboriginal life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the old-time South. It begins with the gay and carefree days before the Civil War. There are old reels and hornpipes, and a suggestion of "Swanee River." This breaks into the gay measures of "Pop Goes the Weasel." The serenity is broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war, in which "John Brown's Body" and "The Battle Cry of Freedom" are based. The third movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and relentless pounding machinery. A long preparation leads to the announcement in its full form of the anthem, "America," which to Bloch represents the ideal which lies before our vast people. Thus, at the end of the piece, the chorus is introduced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 16 1929

idge economy."

SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE ON TUESDAY NIGHT

Mixed Chorus Will Assist in Presentation of Bloch's "America."—Orchestra Also Will Offer Compositions of Schubert and Ravel.

A concert of manifold beauty and interest is anticipated in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next Tuesday evening, in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform in addition to Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America;" Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse." In "America," the orchestra will be assisted by a mixed chorus which has been trained by John B. Archer.

Ernest Booth has spent a long time in the composition of his Rhapsody. It is a prize-winning piece, and as such had simultaneous performances in five American cities last December. Koussevitzky then introduced it to Boston with such success that he repeated the score in January, and also played it in New York. The famous Jewish composer, who has made America his adopted land, has delved far into our past for his material.

The first number is based upon Indian tribal melodies and old Puritan hymns, and depicts the aboriginal life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the old-time South. It begins with the gay and carefree days before the Civil War. There are old reels and hornpipes, and a suggestion of "Swanee River." This breaks into the gay measures of "Pop Goes the Weasel."

Serenity Broken.

The serenity is broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war, in which "John Brown's Body" and "The Battle Cry of Freedom" are heard. The third movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and relentless pounding machinery. A long preparation leads to the announcement in its full form of the anthem, "America," which to Bloch represents the ideal which lies before our vast people. Thus, at the end of the piece, the chorus is introduced.

The title-page bears this inscription from Walt Whitman: "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The composer has also inscribed: "This symphony has been written in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration."

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony has been played all over the world this season, in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured upon a special Shubert centenary program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Theme Described.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855."

Its first Paris performance led a critic to quote Prudhomme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano." He described it by saying: "There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the

PROV SUNDAY JOURNAL
BOSTON SYMPHONY IN
BLOCH'S "AMERICA" FEB. 10 1929

The announcement that Serge Koussevitzky is to perform Bloch's "America" at the third visit of the Boston Symphony to Providence on the 19th of this month has aroused much interest among the orchestra's followers. The work, which is called an epic rhapsody, has a culminating hymn, for which the services of John B. Archer and members of the Providence Festival Chorus have been enlisted.

This novelty, which is in three parts, will take up the entire second half of the program. Schubert's Symphony in B-minor, the "Unfinished," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," will compose the first half. The three sections of "America" are described as follows: Poco lento, (...1620), "The Soil —The Indians—England—The Mayflower—The Landing of the Pilgrims," Allegretto (1861-1865), "Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow;" Allegro con spirito (1926...), "The Present—The Future."

In his first movement, Bloch depicts musically the beginnings of the nation with scenes that shift from America, in its aboriginal state, to England, and back again to the coming of the settlers. The second movement has the Civil War for its theme, first giving a romantic picture of the old South, in which old Southern melodies are introduced. The serenity is broken by the outbreak of the war.

In the third movement, the composer sets forth the present jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the rhapsody which, it is said, is gloriously led up to, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. He has dedicated his work to Walt Whitman and Abraham Lincoln.

"America" is one of the most played and most discussed new scores of the season. It is a prize composition, of which Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities, and then followed performances all over the country. Such was the impression which this score made that Koussevitzky repeated it at a later pair of concerts in Boston, and again played it when the orchestra last visited Carnegie Hall, New York, on Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. These were occasions of prolonged demonstrations and the highest critical tributes for the marvelous performances which Koussevitzky inspires in his orchestra.

◈ ◈ ◈

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1929

Boston Symphony to Give Much Discussed Novelty

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening it will introduce to Providence the most discussed novelty of the current season, Ernest Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America."

This Rhapsody, to rehearse what is by now a matter of general knowledge, brought to its composer in June, 1928, the prize of $3000 which had been offered by the periodical, Musical America, for a symphony or other orchestral work of large dimensions. Five conductors of leading American orchestras, Messrs. Damrosch, Herz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski, were the jury that passed upon the 92 scores submitted, and when their decision had been reached they agreed that the winning manuscript should receive simultaneous first performances in the cities which they represented, namely New York, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, on Dec. 20 last. As it happened the performance by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, under Mr. Damrosch, came one day earlier.

Born in Geneva in 1880, where he lived until he was 16 years of age and whither he returned in 1904 after studying and practicing music in other European cities, Ernest Bloch came to America in 1916. Since that time he has made his home among us, and it is here that he plans to pass his remaining days.

Bloch's early life was a more or less continual struggle against poverty. In this land of opportunity, he has found not only wide recognition as composer and as teacher, but comparative material prosperiety. To America, then, Mr. Bloch is grateful, and few native-born citizens could equal him in his enthusiasm for American ideals, his reverence for this country's past achievements, his hopes for its future.

It was by these sentiments that his Rhapsody "America" was inspired. They are, indeed, expressed upon its title page, together with a dedication to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and of Walt Whitman, "whose vision has upheld its inspiration."

◈ ◈ ◈

As climax and conclusion to his Rhapsody Mr. Bloch created an "anthem," to use his own word, the music of which forms a thematic basis for the piece, appearing in its opening measures and gradually taking shape until at the end it bursts forth triumphantly and sonorously. "It is the hope of the composer," concludes the foreword, "that this anthem will become known and beloved, that the audience will rise to sing it, becoming thus an active and enthusiastic part of the work and its message of faith and hope."

The words of this anthem are the composer's own, and although they have been somewhat changed since the score was published and will be sung in their altered version, they appear thus upon the printed page:

America! America! Thy name is in my heart:—
My love for thee arouses me to nobler thoughts and deeds.
Our fathers builded a nation
To give us Justice and Peace—
Toward higher aims, toward brighter goals,
Toward Freedom of all mankind—
Our hearts we pledge, America,
To stand by thee, to give to thee

Our strength, our faith and our lives!

In most cities where the rhapsody has thus far been performed the composer's wish concerning the participation of the audience in the singing of this anthem has not been complied with; rather the vocal portion has been entrusted, as it will be in Providence, solely to an assisting chorus—a more practicable arrangement when an unfamiliar piece is in hand.

"America" runs in three parts. The first is headed ". . . . 1620. The Soil—The Indians—(England)—The Mayflower—The Landing of the Pilgrims;" the second, ". . . . 1861-1865. Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow;" the third, "1926. . . . The Present—The Future. . . ."

Prefacing the second and third sections and scattered here and there through the score are quotations from Walt Whitman. The score is also elaborately annotated, although these explanatory references, the composer states, are not intended for reproduction in the program. "They are not needed," he continues, "for the understanding of a work which does not attempt to describe or imitate. But, as its inspiration was sustained by a poetical idea, these notes may, in the same way, stimulate the performers and facilitate their task."

◈ ◈ ◈

Except for the anthem above described, very little of the thematic material in this rhapsody is Bloch's own. In the beginning, which portrays The Soil, are heard songs of the Pueblos and of other Indian tribes, while folksongs of England serve for reference to the country of the Pilgrims, a sailors' chanty suggests the Atlantic, and "Old Hundred" voices the aspirations and the religious faith of the Pilgrim Fathers.

An old Southern ballad begins the second section. Negro folksongs follow it, and ere long appears Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home," the melody entrusted to a solo 'cello, the harmonization contrapuntally elaborate. "Pop Goes the Weasel" serves to suggest the Virginia Reel, and this tune is soon combined with "Hail, Columbia." After the interlude of a Creole folksong comes the call to arms, and now fragments of "Dixie," "John Brown's Body," "The Battle Cry of Freedom" and "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," are tossed about in the orchestral hurly-burly. Solemn music concludes this second section, and the score makes reference to Whitman's "O Captain! My Captain."

To express the America of today Bloch uses negro folksongs and jazz rhythms, while two anvils, a steel plate struck with a heavy hammer and an automobile horn help in the depicting of the turmoil of industry. But our civilization, as Bloch sees it, is riding to a fall; hence an orchestral collapse. Salvation comes, however, in a return to nature, expressed by a recurrence of an Indian theme from the initial section of the piece. Gradually man masters the machines, the environment and himself; steadily the orchestra upbuilds the final climax, and the apotheosis comes with the aforementioned anthem.

◈ ◈ ◈

So diverse has been the reception of "America" that appraisal of it as music may well be omitted here, leaving each listener to form his own opinion of its merits. On one point, however, all and sundry have agreed, and that is on Bloch's technical mastery, the skill with which he has marshalled his material and has welded his themes and melodies into a coherent and logical whole. The instrumentation, too, has won unfailing commendation. Bloch long ago proved himself master of the orchestra.

◈ ◈ ◈

The remaining pieces upon Tuesday evening's program, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Ravel's "La Valse," call for less comment. Familiar to all are the two movements written by Schubert in 1822 for a symphony designed as compliment to the city of Graz, which in that year elected him an honorary member of its musical society, the symphony which for some reason unknown to anyone, the composer never completed, although six years of life were left to him. Hearing these movements, there comes ever the reflection that even Schubert might hardly have finished the symphony at the level upon which it was begun.

"La Valse," one of the most brilliant of modern orchestra pieces, would suggest a ball at an imperial court about the year 1855. In this score Ravel has proved that he can rival the Viennese composers themselves in the devising of entrancing waltz-tunes, although by him these melodies are treated symphonically, not strung together as in the waltzes of Johann Strauss and his compatriots.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY

Serge Koussevitzky Will Direct Noted Ensemble in Albee Theatre.

TO PLAY BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

Epic Rhapsody Arouses Much Interest.—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony Also on Program

A concert of manifold beauty and interest is anticipated in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next Tuesday evening, in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform in addition to Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America;" Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse." In "America," the orchestra will be assisted by a mixed chorus which has been trained by John B. Archer.

Ernest Block has spent a long time in the composition of his Rhapsody. It is a prize-winning piece, and as such had simultaneous performances in five American cities last December. Koussevitzky then introduced it to Boston with such success that he repeated the score in January, and also played it in New York. The famous Jewish composer, who has made America his adopted land, has delved far into our past for his material.

The first number is based upon Indian tribal melodies and old Puritan hymns, and depicts the aboriginal life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the old-time South. It begins with the gay and carefree days before the Civil War. There are old reels and hornpipes, and a suggestion of "Swanee River." This breaks into the gay measures of "Pop Goes the Weasel."

Civil War Next

The serenity is broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war, in which "John Brown's Body" and "The Battle Cry of Freedom" are heard. The third movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and relentless pounding machinery. A long preparation leads to the announcement in its full form of the anthem, "America," which to Bloch represents the ideal which lies before our vast people. Thus, at the end of the piece, the chorus is introduced.

The title-page bears this inscription from Walt Whitman: "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The composer has also inscribed: "This symphony has been written in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration."

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony has been played all over the world this season, in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured upon a special Schubert centenary program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Theme Described.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855."

Its first Paris performance led a critic to quote Prudhomme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano." He described it by saying: "There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1929

Boston Symphony, Assisted by Providence Singers, Gives Concert Tuesday Night; Koussevitzky to Conduct.—Harold Samuel, Pianist, in Pembroke Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns for its third concert of the season next Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Two works entirely new to Providence and an old friend comprise the program.

An interesting feature of the concert will be the share taken by local musicians, a special mixed chorus having been assembled by John B. Archer to sing the hymn, which is the closing episode in Ernest Bloch's rhapsody, "America." This piece, a prize work, was first performed on Dec. 21 last, when it was simultaneously produced in five American cities, including Boston. It was repeated there on Jan. 25 and 26. Koussevitzky played it in New York on Jan. 3[illegible] and Feb. 2. He plans to offer it again in Washington on March 6.

The Bloch composition will take up the second half of the program. The other work new to Providence is Ravel's "La Valse," a score by which, perhaps, he is better known than any other. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony will open the concert. It was last heard here under Pierre Monteux's direction on Jan. 23, 1923. This masterpiece has been played all over the world this season in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured in a special Schubert centenary program [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE
FEB 17 1929

EUROPEAN TOUR RUMORED.

The rumored European tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra this spring is reported as "well-founded" by The Telegraph. "It is now common knowledge in well informed circles," it is said, "that the tour, under the direction of Koussevitzky, will begin in April and will embrace concerts in Paris, London, the English provinces, Amsterdam, Brussels, Vienna, Budapest and Prague."

STAR
FEB 17 1929

MUSIC

BY HELEN FETTER.

THE indications are that this will be an unusually well supplied Spring so far as choral music goes. Not only is the big Massed Chorus Festival constantly hammering at our memories with warnings that it is to burst forth into song in Music week, in May, but even the orchestral programs are blossoming out with vocal moments. The latest news is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the initial presentation in Washington of Ernest Bloch's prize symphony, "America," which has the newest attempt at a national anthem in choral form for the finale. This choral portion will be sung by the National Capital Oratorio Association, Dr. Albert Harned, director. The fact that the invitation to participate in this program, March 6, was extended to the recently completely organized National Capital Oratorio Association would indicate the admirable general impression made by that chorus of 250 singers, both in the "Redemption" last Spring and in "The Messiah" in December. Like the crocuses and tulips, hope blossoms ever so often that, in time, a group worthy of the standards of the old, original Washington Choral Society, that in its balmiest days numbered Walter Damrosch among its conductors, will become firmly established again in Washington.

Dr. Harned further announces that the National Capital Oratorio Association will present the first performance in Washington of Haydn's Easter work, "The Passion," at a date near the celebration of that great religious festival. It is understood that this work, based upon the "Seven Last Words of Christ," has only been given three times previously anywhere in the United States.

Ganna Walska recently, mention, in addition to emphasizing the social character of most of the audience, that Mme. Emma Eames, Maria Jeritza, Marion Talley, Leonora Corona, Alice Nielsen, Marie Rappold, Hulda Lashanska and many others were present at this event. One of the leading papers was not quite kind in suggesting that:

"Most of the singers, including leading members of the Metropolitan Opera Co. were there, come to deprecate the triumph or enjoy the disaster of a famous and beautiful woman whose obsessing ambition it is to sing."

* * * *

AMERICA'S most distinguished prima donna, Rosa Ponselle, who, the middle of last November celebrated her tenth anniversary as prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Co., gives a song recital here the middle of this week, making her second appearance in Washington within the month.

It is a mark of the real appreciation that is the foundation for building American music history that the National Federation of Music Clubs has honored this daughter of Italian immigrants who was born in Meriden, Conn., with the first place in the current "Decade Honor Roll" in that organization's "Hall of Fame" for rising American artists who have demonstrated their right to be included in the ranks of the foremost artists of the world through a period of 10 years of achievement.

Miss Ponselle, who made her Metropolitan Opera debut in "La Forza del Destino" in 1918 with Enrico Caruso, will sing an air from that Verdi work here Tuesday.

* * * *

WORD from Geneva, Switzerland, states that Roger Sa[illegible]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 1929

Boston Symphony to Give Much Discussed Novelty

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening it will introduce to Providence the most discussed novelty of the current season, Ernest Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America."

This Rhapsody, to rehearse what is by now a matter of general knowledge, brought to its composer in June, 1928, the prize of $3000 which had been offered by the periodical, Musical America, for a symphony or other orchestral work of large dimensions. Five conductors of leading American orchestras, Messrs. Damrosch, Herz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski, were the jury that passed upon the 92 scores submitted, and when their decision had been reached they agreed that the winning manuscript should receive simultaneous first performances in the cities which they represented, namely New Yerk, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, on Dec. 20 last. As it happened the performance by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, under Mr. Damrosch, came one day earlier.

Born in Geneva in 1880, where he lived until he was 16 years of age and whither he returned in 1904 after studying and practicing music in other European cities, Ernest Bloch came to America in 1916. Since that time he has made his home among us, and it is here that he plans to pass his remaining days.

Bloch's early life was a more or less continual struggle against poverty. In this land of opportunity, he has found not only wide recognition as composer and as teacher, but comparative material prosperiety. To America, then, Mr. Bloch is grateful, and few native-born citizens could equal him in his enthusiasm for American ideals, his reverence for this country's past achievements, his hopes for its future.

It was by these sentiments that his Rhapsody "America" was inspired. They are, indeed, expressed upon its title page, together with a dedication to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and of Walt Whitman, "whose vision has upheld its inspiration."

◈ ◈ ◈

As climax and conclusion to his Rhapsody Mr. Bloch created an "anthem," to use his own word, the music of which forms a thematic basis for the piece, appearing in its opening measures and gradually taking shape until at the end it bursts forth triumphantly and sonorously. "It is the hope of the composer," concludes the foreword, "that this anthem will become known and beloved, that the audience will rise to sing it, becoming thus an active and enthusiastic part of the work and its message of faith and hope."

The words of this anthem are the composer's own, and although they have been somewhat changed since the score was published and will be sung in their altered version, they appear thus upon the printed page:

America! America! Thy name is in my heart:—
My love for thee arouses me to nobler thoughts and deeds.
Our fathers builded a nation
To give us Justice and Peace—
Toward higher aims, toward brighter goals,
Toward Freedom of all mankind—
Our hearts we pledge, America,
To stand by thee, to give to thee

Our strength, our faith and our lives!

In most cities where the rhapsody has thus far been performed the composer's wish concerning the participation of the audience in the singing of this anthem has not been complied with; rather the vocal portion has been entrusted, as it will be in Providence, solely to an assisting chorus—a more practicable arrangement when an unfamiliar piece is in hand.

"America" runs in three parts. The first is headed ". . . . . 1620. The Soil—The Indians—(England)—The Mayflower—The Landing of the Pilgrims;" the second, ". . . . 1861-1865. Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow;" the third, "1926. . . . The Present—The Future. . . ."

Prefacing the second and third sections and scattered here and there through the score are quotations from Walt Whitman. The score is also elaborately annotated, although these explanatory references, the composer states, are not intended for reproduction in the program. "They are not needed," he continues, "for the understanding of a work which does not attempt to describe or imitate. But, as its inspiration was sustained by a poetical idea, these notes may, in the same way, stimulate the performers and facilitate their task."

◈ ◈ ◈

Except for the anthem above described, very little of the thematic material in this rhapsody is Bloch's own. In the beginning, which portrays The Soil, are heard songs of the Pueblos and of other Indian tribes, while folksongs of England serve for reference to the country of the Pilgrims, a sailors' chanty suggests the Atlantic, and "Old Hundred" voices the aspirations and the religious faith of the Pilgrim Fathers.

An old Southern ballad begins the second section. Negro folksongs follow it, and ere long appears Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home," the melody entrusted to a solo 'cello, the harmonization contrapuntally elaborate. "Pop Goes the Weasel" serves to suggest the Virginia Reel, and this tune is soon combined with "Hail, Columbia." After the interlude of a Creole folksong comes the call to arms, and now fragments of "Dixie," "John Brown's Body," "The Battle Cry of Freedom" and "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," are tossed about in the orchestral hurly-burly. Solemn music concludes this second section, and the score makes reference to Whitman's "O Captain! My Captain."

To express the America of today Bloch uses negro folksongs and jazz rhythms, while two anvils, a steel plate struck with a heavy hammer and an automobile horn help in the depicting of the turmoil of industry. But our civilization, as Bloch sees it, is riding to a fall; hence an orchestral collapse. Salvation comes, however, in a return to nature, expressed by a recurrence of an Indian theme from the initial section of the piece. Gradually man masters the machines, the environment and himself; steadily the orchestra upbuilds the final climax, and the apotheosis comes with the aforementioned anthem.

◈ ◈ ◈

So diverse has been the reception of "America" that appraisal of it as music may well be omitted here, leaving each listener to form his own opinion of its merits. On one point, however, all and sundry have agreed, and that is on Bloch's technical mastery, the skill with which he has marshalled his material and has welded his themes and melodies into a coherent and logical whole. The instrumentation, too, has won unfailing commendation. Bloch long ago proved himself master of the orchestra.

◈ ◈ ◈

The remaining pieces upon Tuesday evening's program, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Ravel's "La Valse," call for less comment. Familiar to all are the two movements written by Schubert in 1822 for a symphony designed as compliment to the city of Graz, which in that year elected him an honorary member of its musical society, the symphony which for some reason unknown to anyone, the composer never completed, although six years of life were left to him. Hearing these movements, there comes ever the reflection that even Schubert might hardly have finished the symphony at the level upon which it was begun.

"La Valse," one of the most brilliant of modern orchestra pieces, would suggest a ball at an imperial court about the year 1855. In this score Ravel has proved that he can rival the Viennese composers themselves in the devising of entrancing waltz-tunes, although by him these melodies are treated symphonically, not strung together as in the waltzes of Johann Strauss and his compatriots.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony, Assisted by Providence Singers, Gives Concert Tuesday Night; Koussevitzky to Conduct.—Harold Samuel, Pianist, in Pembroke Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns for its third concert of the season next Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Two works entirely new to Providence and an old friend comprise the program.

An interesting feature of the concert will be the share taken by local musicians, a special mixed chorus having been assembled by John B. Archer to sing the hymn, which is the closing episode in Ernest Bloch's rhapsody, "America." This piece, a prize work, was first performed on Dec. 21 last, when it was simultaneously produced in five American cities, including Boston. It was repeated there on Jan. 25 and 26. Koussevitzky played it in New York on Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. He plans to offer it again in Washington on March 6.

The Bloch composition will take up the second half of the program. The other work new to Providence is Ravel's "La Valse," a score by which, perhaps, he is better known than any other. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony will open the concert. It was last heard here under Pierre Monteux's direction on Jan. 23, 1923. This masterpiece has been played all over the world this season in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured in a special Schubert centenary program by the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE
FEB 17 1929

EUROPEAN TOUR RUMORED.

The rumored European tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra this spring is reported as "well-founded" by The Telegraph. "It is now common knowledge in well informed circles," it is said, "that the tour, under the direction of Koussevitzky, will begin in April and will embrace concerts in Paris, London, the English provinces, Amsterdam, Brussels, Vienna, Budapest and Prague."

STAR
FEB 17

MUSIC

BY HELEN FETTER.

THE indications are that this will be an unusually well supplied Spring so far as choral music goes. Not only is the big Massed Chorus Festival constantly hammering at our memories with warnings that it is to burst forth into song in Music week, in May, but even the orchestral programs are blossoming out with vocal moments. The latest news is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the initial presentation in Washington of Ernest Bloch's prize symphony, "America," which has the newest attempt at a national anthem in choral form for the finale. This choral portion will be sung by the National Capital Oratorio Association, Dr. Albert Harned, director. The fact that the invitation to participate in this program, March 6, was extended to the recently completely organized National Capital Oratorio Association would indicate the admirable general impression made by that chorus of 250 singers, both in the "Redemption" last Spring and in "The Messiah" in December. Like the crocuses and tulips, hope blossoms ever so often that, in time, a group worthy of the standards of the old, original Washington Choral Society, that in its balmiest days numbered Walter Damrosch among its conductors, will become firmly established again in Washington.

Dr. Harned further announces that the National Capital Oratorio Association will present the first performance in Washington of Haydn's Easter work, "The Passion," at a date near the celebration of that great religious festival. It is understood that this work, based upon the "Seven Last Words of Christ," has only been given three times previously anywhere in the United States.

Ganna Walska recently, mention, in addition to emphasizing the social character of most of the audience, that Mme. Emma Eames, Maria Jeritza, Marion Talley, Leonora Corona, Alice Nielsen, Marie Rappold, Hulda Lashanska and many others were present at this event. One of the leading papers was not quite kind in suggesting that:

"Most of the singers, including leading members of the Metropolitan Opera Co. were there, come to deprecate the triumph or enjoy the disaster of a famous and beautiful woman whose obsessing ambition it is to sing."

* * * *

AMERICA'S most distinguished prima donna, Rosa Ponselle, who, the middle of last November celebrated her tenth anniversary as prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Co., gives a song recital here the middle of this week, making her second appearance in Washington within the month.

It is a mark of the real appreciation that is the foundation for building American music history that the National Federation of Music Clubs has honored this daughter of Italian immigrants who was born in Meriden, Conn., with the first place in the current "Decade Honor Roll" in that organization's "Hall of Fame" for rising American artists who have demonstrated their right to be included in the ranks of the foremost artists of the world through a period of 10 years of achievement.

Miss Ponselle, who made her Metropolitan Opera debut in "La Forza del Destino" in 1918 with Enrico Caruso, will sing an air from that Verdi work here Tuesday.

* * * *

WORD from Geneva, Switzerland, states that Roger Ses-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY

Serge Koussevitzky Will Direct Noted Ensemble in Albee Theatre.

TO PLAY BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

Epic Rhapsody Arouses Much Interest.—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony Also on Program

A concert of manifold beauty and interest is anticipated in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next Tuesday evening, in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform in addition to Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America;" Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse." In "America," the orchestra will be assisted by a mixed chorus which has been trained by John B. Archer.

Ernest Block has spent a long time in the composition of his Rhapsody. It is a prize-winning piece, and as such had simultaneous performances in five American cities last December. Koussevitzky then introduced it to Boston with such success that he repeated the score in January, and also played it in New York. The famous Jewish composer, who has made America his adopted land, has delved far into our past for his material.

The first number is based upon Indian tribal melodies and old Puritan hymns, and depicts the aboriginal life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the old-time South. It begins with the gay and carefree days before the Civil War. There are old reels and hornpipes, and a suggestion of "Swanee River." This breaks into the gay measures of "Pop Goes the Weasel."

Civil War Next

The serenity is broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war, in which "John Brown's Body" and "The Battle Cry of Freedom" are heard. The third movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and relentless pounding machinery. A long preparation leads to the announcement in its full form of the anthem, "America," which to Bloch represents the ideal which lies before our vast people. Thus, at the end of the piece, the chorus is introduced.

The title-page bears this inscription from Walt Whitman: "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The composer has also inscribed: "This symphony has been written in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration."

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony has been played all over the world this season, in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured upon a special Schubert centenary program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Theme Described.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855."

Its first Paris performance led a critic to quote Prudhomme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano." He described it by saying: "There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1929

Boston Symphony to Give Much Discussed Novelty

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening it will introduce to Providence the most discussed novelty of the current season, Ernest Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America."

This Rhapsody, to rehearse what is by now a matter of general knowledge, brought to its composer in June, 1928, the prize of $3000 which had been offered by the periodical, Musical America, for a symphony or other orchestral work of large dimensions. Five conductors of leading American orchestras, Messrs. Damrosch, Herz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski, were the jury that passed upon the 92 scores submitted, and when their decision had been reached they agreed that the winning manuscript should receive simultaneous first performances in the cities which they represented, namely New York, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, on Dec. 20 last. As it happened the performance by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, under Mr. Damrosch, came one day earlier.

Born in Geneva in 1880, where he lived until he was 16 years of age and whither he returned in 1904 after studying and practicing music in other European cities, Ernest Bloch came to America in 1916. Since that time he has made his home among us, and it is here that he plans to pass his remaining days.

Bloch's early life was a more or less continual struggle against poverty. In this land of opportunity he has found not only wide recognition as composer and as teacher, but comparative material prosperiety. To America, then, Mr. Bloch is grateful, and few native-born citizens could equal him in his enthusiasm for American ideals, his reverence for this country's past achievements, his hopes for its future.

It was by these sentiments that his Rhapsody "America" was inspired. They are, indeed, expressed upon its title page, together with a dedication to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and of Walt Whitman, "whose vision has upheld its inspiration."

◈ ◈ ◈

As climax and conclusion to his Rhapsody Mr. Bloch created an "anthem," to use his own word, the music of which forms a thematic basis for the piece, appearing in its opening measures and gradually taking shape until at the end it bursts forth triumphantly and sonorously. "It is the hope of the composer," concludes the foreword, "that this anthem will become known and beloved, that the audience will rise to sing it, becoming thus an active and enthusiastic part of the work and its message of faith and hope."

The words of this anthem are the composer's own, and although they have been somewhat changed since the score was published and will be sung in their altered version, they appear thus upon the printed page:

America! America! Thy name is in my heart:—
My love for thee arouses me to nobler thoughts and deeds.
Our fathers builded a nation
To give us Justice and Peace—
Toward higher aims, toward brighter goals,
Toward Freedom of all mankind—
Our hearts we pledge, America,
To stand by thee, to give to thee

Our strength, our faith and our lives!

In most cities where the rhapsody has thus far been performed the composer's wish concerning the participation of the audience in the singing of this anthem has not been complied with; rather the vocal portion has been entrusted, as it will be in Providence, solely to an assisting chorus—a more practicable arrangement when an unfamiliar piece is in hand.

"America" runs in three parts. The first is headed ". . . . 1620. The Soil—The Indians—(England)—The Mayflower—The Landing of the Pilgrims;" the second, ". . . . 1861-1865. Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow;" the third, "1926. . . . The Present—The Future. . . ."

Prefacing the second and third sections and scattered here and there through the score are quotations from Walt Whitman. The score is also elaborately annotated, although these explanatory references, the composer states, are not intended for reproduction in the program. "They are not needed," he continues, "for the understanding of a work which does not attempt to describe or imitate. But, as its inspiration was sustained by a poetical idea, these notes may, in the same way, stimulate the performers and facilitate their task."

◈ ◈ ◈

Except for the anthem above described, very little of the thematic material in this rhapsody is Bloch's own. In the beginning, which portrays The Soil, are heard songs of the Pueblos and of other Indian tribes, while folksongs of England serve for reference to the country of the Pilgrims, a sailors' chanty suggests the Atlantic, and "Old Hundred" voices the aspirations and the religious faith of the Pilgrim Fathers.

An old Southern ballad begins the second section. Negro folksongs follow it, and ere long appears Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home," the melody entrusted to a solo 'cello, the harmonization contrapuntally elaborate. "Pop Goes the Weasel" serves to suggest the Virginia Reel, and this tune is soon combined with "Hail, Columbia." After the interlude of a Creole folksong comes the call to arms, and now fragments of "Dixie," "John Brown's Body," "The Battle Cry of Freedom" and "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," are tossed about in the orchestral hurly-burly. Solemn music concludes this second section, and the score makes reference to Whitman's "O Captain! My Captain."

To express the America of today Bloch uses negro folksongs and jazz rhythms, while two anvils, a steel plate struck with a heavy hammer and an automobile horn help in the depicting of the turmoil of industry. But our civilization, as Bloch sees it, is riding to a fall; hence an orchestral collapse. Salvation comes, however, in a return to nature, expressed by a recurrence of an Indian theme from the initial section of the piece. Gradually man masters the machines, the environment and himself; steadily the orchestra upbuilds the final climax, and the apotheosis comes with the aforementioned anthem.

◈ ◈ ◈

So diverse has been the reception of "America" that appraisal of it as music may well be omitted here, leaving each listener to form his own opinion of its merits. On one point, however, all and sundry have agreed, and that is on Bloch's technical mastery, the skill with which he has marshalled his material and has welded his themes and melodies into a coherent and logical whole. The instrumentation, too, has won unfailing commendation. Bloch long ago proved himself master of the orchestra.

◈ ◈ ◈

The remaining pieces upon Tuesday evening's program, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Ravel's "La Valse," call for less comment. Familiar to all are the two movements written by Schubert in 1822 for a symphony designed as compliment to the city of Graz, which in that year elected him an honorary member of its musical society, the symphony which for some reason unknown to anyone, the composer never completed, although six years of life were left to him. Hearing these movements, there comes ever the reflection that even Schubert might hardly have finished the symphony at the level upon which it was begun.

"La Valse," one of the most brilliant of modern orchestra pieces, would suggest a ball at an imperial court about the year 1855. In this score Ravel has proved that he can rival the Viennese composers themselves in the devising of entrancing waltz-tunes, although by him these melodies are treated symphonically, not strung together as in the waltzes of Johann Strauss and his compatriots.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TUESDAY

Serge Koussevitzky Will Direct Noted Ensemble in Albee Theatre.

TO PLAY BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

Epic Rhapsody Arouses Much Interest.—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony Also on Program

A concert of manifold beauty and interest is anticipated in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next Tuesday evening, in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform in addition to Bloch's Epic Rhapsody, "America;" Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse." In "America," the orchestra will be assisted by a mixed chorus which has been trained by John B. Archer.

Ernest Block has spent a long time in the composition of his Rhapsody. It is a prize-winning piece, and as such had simultaneous performances in five American cities last December. Koussevitzky then introduced it to Boston with such success that he repeated the score in January, and also played it in New York. The famous Jewish composer, who has made America his adopted land, has delved far into our past for his material.

The first number is based upon Indian tribal melodies and old Puritan hymns, and depicts the aboriginal life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the old-time South. It begins with the gay and carefree days before the Civil War. There are old reels and hornpipes, and a suggestion of "Swanee River." This breaks into the gay measures of "Pop Goes the Weasel."

Civil War Next

The serenity is broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war, in which "John Brown's Body" and "The Battle Cry of Freedom" are heard. The third movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and relentless pounding machinery. A long preparation leads to the announcement in its full form of the anthem, "America," which to Bloch represents the ideal which lies before our vast people. Thus, at the end of the piece, the chorus is introduced.

The title-page bears this inscription from Walt Whitman: "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The composer has also inscribed: "This symphony has been written in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration."

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony has been played all over the world this season, in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured upon a special Schubert centenary program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Theme Described.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855."

Its first Paris performance led a critic to quote Prudhomme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano." He described it by saying: "There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1929

Boston Symphony, Assisted by Providence Singers, Gives Concert Tuesday Night; Koussevitzky to Conduct.—Harold Samuel, Pianist, in Pembroke Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns for its third concert of the season next Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Two works entirely new to Providence and an old friend comprise the program.

An interesting feature of the concert will be the share taken by local musicians, a special mixed chorus having been assembled by John B. Archer to sing the hymn, which is the closing episode in Ernest Bloch's rhapsody, "America." This piece, a prize work, was first performed on Dec. 21 last, when it was simultaneously produced in five American cities, including Boston. It was repeated there on Jan. 25 and 26. Koussevitzky played it in New York on Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. He plans to offer it again in Washington on March 6.

The Bloch composition will take up the second half of the program. The other work new to Providence is Ravel's "La Valse," a score by which, perhaps, he is better known than any other. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony will open the concert. It was last heard here under Pierre Monteux's direction on Jan. 23, 1923. This masterpiece has been played all over the world this season in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured in a special Schubert centenary program by the Boston Symphony in Boston last November.

◈ ◈ ◈

The rumored tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra this spring is reported as "well-founded" by The Telegraph. "It is now common knowledge in well informed circles," it is said, "that the tour, under the direction of Koussevitzky, will begin in April and will embrace concerts in Paris, London, the English provinces, Amsterdam, Brussels, Vienna, Budapest and Prague."

STAR
FEB 17 1929

MUSIC

BY HELEN FETTER.

THE indications are that this will be an unusually well supplied Spring so far as choral music goes. Not only is the big Massed Chorus Festival constantly hammering at our memories with warnings that it is to burst forth into song in Music week, in May, but even the orchestral programs are blossoming out with vocal moments. The latest news is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the initial presentation in Washington of Ernest Bloch's prize symphony, "America," which has the newest attempt at a national anthem in choral form for the finale. This choral portion will be sung by the National Capital Oratorio Association, Dr. Albert Harned, director. The fact that the invitation to participate in this program, March 6, was extended to the recently completely organized National Capital Oratorio Association would indicate the admirable general impression made by that chorus of 250 singers, both in the "Redemption" last Spring and in "The Messiah" in December. Like the crocuses and tulips, hope blossoms ever so often that, in time, a group worthy of the standards of the old, original Washington Choral Society, that in its balmiest days numbered Walter Damrosch among its conductors, will become firmly established again in Washington.

Dr. Harned further announces that the National Capital Oratorio Association will present the first performance in Washington of Haydn's Easter work, "The Passion," at a date near the celebration of that great religious festival. It is understood that this work, based upon the "Seven Last Words of Christ," has only been given three times previously anywhere in the United States.

Ganna Walska recently, mention, in addition to emphasizing the social character of most of the audience, that Mme. Emma Eames, Maria Jeritza, Marion Talley, Leonora Corona, Alice Nielsen, Marie Rappold, Hulda Lashanska and many others were present at this event. One of the leading papers was not quite kind in suggesting that:

"Most of the singers, including leading members of the Metropolitan Opera Co. were there, come to deprecate the triumph or enjoy the disaster of a famous and beautiful woman whose obsessing ambition it is to sing."

* * * *

AMERICA'S most distinguished prima donna, Rosa Ponselle, who, the middle of last November celebrated her tenth anniversary as prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Co., gives a song recital here the middle of this week, making her second appearance in Washington within the month.

It is a mark of the real appreciation that is the foundation for building American music history that the National Federation of Music Clubs has honored this daughter of Italian immigrants who was born in Meriden, Conn., with the first place in the current "Decade Honor Roll" in that organization's "Hall of Fame" for rising American artists who have demonstrated their right to be included in the ranks of the foremost artists of the world through a period of 10 years of achievement.

Miss Ponselle, who made her Metropolitan Opera debut in "La Forza del Destino" in 1918 with Enrico Caruso, will sing an air from that Verdi work here Tuesday.

* * * *

WORD from Geneva, Switzerland, states that Roger Ses-

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

102

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 17 1929

TOSCANINI'S RETURN

Problems of the Philharmonic-Symphony—A Biography of the Conductor

By OLIN DOWNES.

SEVERAL weeks ago it was remarked in these columns that the conductor rather than the players constituted the decisive factor in the quality and character of an orchestral performance. It seems to the writer that this contention has been impressively supported by the evidence of history, and notably by recent orchestral history in New York City, that there is hardly room for argument on the point. But there are those who disagree. We shall soon have opportunity of considering the performances of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Toscanini with the performances which this orchestra has given during the first two-thirds of its present season under various other conductors, beginning with Mr. Mengelberg, continuing with Walter Damrosch, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Fritz Reiner, Arthur Hoffegger, Hans Lange and Bernardino Molinari, announced to conduct the concert this afternoon in addition to that of yesterday evening in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Toscanini faces a considerable test of his powers. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra is not better than it was last season, before it had amalgamated, as the New York Philharmonic Society, with the organization of the New York Symphony. In fact, it is not as good. The necessity of grafting onto the body of the Philharmonic some timber from the New York Symphony did not produce a fine and harmonious result. Nothing was a more striking proof of the individualities of different orchestras than the effect of this infusion of blood from the one body into the other. In spite of the fact that the new elements of the freshly created Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra made a fraction of the instrumental body, and that the newcomers were excellent instrumentalists, the orchestral tone lacked fusion and homogeneity. The industrious and devoted drilling of Mr. Mengelberg, in the time he had at his disposal did not suffice to fully harmonize the foreign elements before the orchestra passed into the hands of many guest conductors. These conductors were not of equal ability, nor had any of them nearly as much opportunity as Mr. Mengelberg to secure exactly what they wished from the band. As a result, the technical quality of the concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this season, despite certain exceptional performances, has been prevailingly inferior to the standards of last year, while the interpretive side has conspicuously suffered.

***

Has the elimination of competition, in turn, affected the vitality of these Philharmonic-Symphony performances? They have often been soporific—duller, on the average, than any other half-season of Philharmonic concerts in the four years preceding.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra has been somewhat in the position of a patient after a minor operation, attended in turn by various physicians of greater or less experience and reputation. Sometimes the treatment has been beneficial. In other instances it has had precisely the effect which too many doctors might exert upon a patient originally in good health, but neurotic, hypochondriac and restlessly experimental with his supposed ailments. Aside, for the moment, from the question of the relative importance of the capacities of the conductor and the capacities of the players in orchestral interpretation, it has been proved beyond a doubt or peradventure—proved by the Philharmonic-Symphony this season, and by the New York Symphony last—that a rapid succession of different conductors, whoever they are and however gifted, is bad medicine for an orchestra. Under the guest system of conductors, from which this and other cities have suffered so grievously in recent years, results of great and permanent value cannot come. Under such conditions the local standards of orchestral playing in New York have declined rather than advanced. The decline has been made the more glaringly obvious by the brilliancy of the concerts of the visiting Boston Symphony under its permanent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and those of the Philadelphia Orchestra when it performed under its brilliant leader and organizer of many years, Leopold Stokowski.

It is possible to argue that with virtuoso leaders of such exceptional abilities as these any orchestra would have given stirring performances. The facts remain that the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras, as they now stand, are the virtual creations, in the musical sense, of two men who have been their official leaders for many seasons. The same thing holds true of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, fashioned by Theodore Thomas and maintained in its artistic estate by Frederick Stock. Sooner or later, if the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, having eliminated competition in its own city, intends to attain a rank equal to that of the two other orchestras we have mentioned, it will have to find a permanent conductor, relieve him, if need be, for brief periods by the occasional appearance of a guest conductor, and give him complete power and undivided responsibility in all that pertains to musical performance. At present this conception of the musical affairs of the Philharmonic-Symphony is but a hope. There are many conditions that fight against its realization; it is not easy to meet or change. But we do not believe there is any other way for this orchestra to reach an artistic height commensurable with its objectives and its long and honorable reputation. It can be seen from the foregoing that a task of special difficulty confronts Mr. Toscanini, who returns next Thursday night to the podium at Carnegie Hall to bring the performances, after a period of change and confusion, to his wonted uncompromising standards, and to inaugurate as a symphonic interpreter his fourth New York season.

***

A book of biography and criticism of a eulogistic sort, "Arturo Toscanini," the Italian text by Tobia Nicotra, the English translation by Irma Brandeis and H. D. Kahn, appears from the publishing house of Alfred Knopf, to greet upon his arrival the distinguished leader. The book is disappointing in that it leaves out much as for instance the circumstances of the historic break between Mr. Toscanini and the Metropolitan Opera House in 1915—a matter upon which both Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Gatti-Casazza have doubtless refused information. But this is perhaps a matter for the future, or perhaps as Mr. Philip Hale once remarked of the chequered history of the one time Boston Opera Company, a story that will never be written. In the book before us there is not very much that is new to those who have followed Mr. Toscanini's career through press clippings of recent seasons. But as a compendium of facts already printed in various places, a few biographical details not generally known, lists of Toscanini's orchestral and operatic programs and public engagements, and fragmentary gossip of the Opera House and the rehearsal room, it is of use and interest.

The circumstances of his dramatic début as conductor in 1886 in Rio de Janeiro are recapitulated. There are numerous instances of Toscanini's quick temper in defense of his interpretative ideals, and his frequently unforgivable rage when his artistic purposes were obstructed.

There is quotation of the opinion of the Italian psychologist, Annibale Pastore, accepted in an Italian court as authoritative evidence and palliation of Toscanini's outbursts when, during a rehearsal of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in Turin, he fell upon a restless and inattentive musician with such fury that the player's bow snapped and a splinter of wood wounded him in the forehead. An ugly situation developed. In the court room Pastore said: "The Dionysiac mood—essential to musical life—might be described as orgiastic transfiguration, during which every inhibitive force is suppressed and the impulsive power exaggerated to the point of paroxysm. Normal persons find it hard to understand the involuntary praxis of the artist, who moves in the grip of non-individual will and is compelled to destroy every obstacle in his way and even, like Dionysus, to destroy himself.

"The faculty of distinguishing good and bad and acting in accordance with the distinction is replaced by the faculty (acting and reacting with extreme violence) of response to beauty and ugliness. The esthetic single-track process attains such violence in Toscanini that any one judging acts committed by him during the esthetic excitation ought automatically to rule out any idea of responsibility—that is to say, all except the artistic responsibility itself. Toscanini in this instance is absolutely guiltless. His unlawful act was not immoral and intentional; it was purely involuntary and unmoral. From a practical point of view, the blow of the baton was aimed, not at the man, but at his bow, and it was the wholly unforeseeable rebound of the blow that struck the violinist's face. . . . In his almost indescribable emotional state at that rehearsal Toscanini's act was typical of the unconsciousness of genius breaking with all the surface conventions of normal life."

This book has some minor inaccuracies. "To paraphrase THE NEW YORK TIMES—which had declared, the year before, that only Toscanini should play Beethoven—there is only one Beethoven, and Toscanini is his prophet." This refers to Toscanini's American appearances of 1926. THE TIMES has had frequent occasion to give warm praise to Mr. Toscanini, interpreter of Beethoven as well as other composers; but the "paraphrase" here quoted is, to say the least, free and wide. Certainly Mr. Toscanini is not the only conductor who should play Beethoven; neither is he a lonely prophet of that composer; nor has such a statement appeared in THE TIMES.

It will be seen that this biography of Toscanini has been brought to date. It concludes with a citation of the announcement last Spring of the amalgamation of the Philharmonic and Symphony societies of New York and comment thereon.

"And so Toscanini is to divide his activity between La Scala, the centre of operatic music in Italy, and the new Philharmonic-Symphony Society in New York, the centre of concert music in America." This is to be seen. Mr. Toscanini is not always predictable. He is extremely independent, temperamental and uncompromising in his exactions as an artist. He is averse to signing contracts. His orchestral repertory has been enlarged for the present season. His New York public is assured him. He has reason to feel gratified with his reception by the press and public of this city. Long may he be with us. The rest is on the laps of the gods.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
FEB 17 [illegible]

"America" by Boston Symphony Orchestra

A concert of manifold beauty and interest is anticipated in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next Tuesday evening, in the Albee Theater at 3:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform in addition to Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse." In "America" the orchestra will be assisted by a mixed chorus which has been trained by John B. Archer.

Ernest Bloch has spent a long time in the composition of his rhapsody. It is a prize winning piece, and as such had simultaneous performances in five American cities last December. Koussevitzky then introduced it to Boston with such success that he repeated the score in January, and also played it in New York. The famous Jewish composer, who has made America his adopted land, has delved far into our past for his material. The first number is based upon Indian tribal melodies and old Puritan hymns, and depicts the aboriginal life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the old time South. It begins with the gay and carefree days before the Civil War. There are old reels and hornpipes, and a suggestion of "Swanee River." This breaks into the gay measures of "Pop Goes the Weasel." The serenity is broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war, in which "John Brown's Body" and "The Battle Cry of Freedom" are heard. The third movement entitled "The Present—The Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and relentless pounding machinery. A long preparation leads to the announcement in its full form of the anthem, "America," which to Bloch represents the ideal which lies before our vast people. Thus, at the end of the piece, the chorus is introduced.

The title-page bears this inscription from Walt Whitman: "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The composer has also inscribed: "This symphony has been written in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration."

Schubert's "Unfinished" spmphony has been played all over the world this season, in observance of the hundredth anniversary of the great composer's death. It figured upon a special Shubert centennary program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouts scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers burst forth fortissimo. An imperial court about 1855." Its first Paris performance led a critic to quote Prudhomme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano." He described it by saying: "There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 20 1929

Boston Symphony

The season's third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in the Albee Theatre consisted of Bloch's "America," an Epic Rhapsody; for the music of the "Unfinished" Symphony and the Terpsichorean travesty of Ravel served merely to arouse expectations and stimulate interest—to warm up the ear for the reception of newer and more significant guests. The program:

Schubert .....
Symphony in B-minor ("Unfinished")
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
Ravel .....
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem

Bloch .....
"America," an Epic Rhapsody in Three parts
I. Poco lento (....-1620)
The Soil—The Indians—(England)—The Mayflower
The Landing of the Pilgrims
II. Allegretto (1861-1865)
Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow
III. Allegro con spirito (1926-....)
The Present—The Future

The greatest rhapsody the world ever saw, Homer wrote on a theme as narrow as "The Wrath of Achilles;" and this narrow theme furnished material enough for 24 books. Ernest Bloch's "America," in three movements, discovers a new world, peoples it, develops it, tears it with civil war and internal discord, shreds it with the sharp cacophony of a sound-mad age, synthetizes it with a hymn, and then turns it over to Faith and Hope, who are to be the guardians of its future.

The composer dedicated his composition to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, which may account in a measure for its inequality. If it suggests in places quite strongly the sentiment, the poise and the logic of the great liberator, all too often it wallows in the reek of a frothy, flamboyant Whitmania at its very worst—which is bad enough. There is, to be sure, a nexus, a sort of unity—the "Anthem Theme," that serves its purpose well. It is the golden cord on which the composer suspends quite carefully his garlands of various hues and sometimes dubious perfumes, the various "calls" being on occasion surprisingly pungent.

The Musical Reminiscences

The various musical reminiscences—folk songs, old tunes, hymn tunes, national airs, etc., are clearly overdone; or else, if it was the purpose to make that sort of music really significant, a greater variety should have been introduced, to give the whole country a chance, calling for the services of a sort of rustic Polyhymnia, or maid of all kinds and conditions of song.

More of the old dance tunes might have been utilized —"Money Musk," "Arkansas Traveller," "Turkey in the Straw," "Billy in the Low Grounds," "The Ring-Tailed Roarer," or any of what the old timer under the inspiration of Apple Jack would have called "hell benders." Such music added to the merriment and hilarity that had a week-end vogue in the old days over wide and extensive territory; and even today it sometimes makes itself heard from under the cryptic foliage of the jazz flower, poison ivy, that is steadily choking to death the true ivy as well as the bay and the laurel and the myrtle and other weeds of the muses.

Some philosopher has said that if he could make a nation's songs he cared little who made the laws. America's songs were not written by such a philosopher; they are a hap-hazard, hit and miss lot, deserving little place in a great symphony such as Mr. Bloch has shown by his best passages that he can write. The Marseillaise and the Russian hymn come face to face in Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812," and fight until the French song is exterminated; and Brahms interpolated student songs into his "Festival Overture;" but the composers of these two numbers did not claim for them the profound national significance that Mr. Bloch claims for "America."

He outlines the nation's birth, growth, struggles, aims and ideals, and then himself writes a national song of songs to be its inspiration and its support. It may be that some time a national anthem may be written under such conditions, in the heat of the composition of a more extensive work; but it is not very probable.

Outdoing the Conception.

Mr. Bloch's music is far superior to the fabric of his dream of the future. It is rich in texture, its fibre is well knit and strong, its sheen is as multi-colored as the rainbow, and its movement is often as sinuous as a serpent. But while chanting the demagogue optimism of Whitman he is often so carried away by the torrents of his verbiage that he cannot, for all his knowledge of music and

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

103

his skill in composition, save himself from the insignificant and the ridiculous ideas that often seem to exude from the pages of that "magnificent Idler."

Dr. Koussevitzky played the composition with true loving kindness, and doubtless his interpretation added much to its intrinsic worth. If the composer had called the first movement the voyage of the Mayflower, he would have hit close to the mark. The ground swell, the big clouds, the sea gulls, fair weather, the dolphins, were all there, followed by lovely viola effects, suggesting music. Perhaps one of the most striking passages in the composition was the "Old Hundred" phrase followed immediately by the challenge of the Indian pipe.

Disaster and desolation seemed to be the significance of the English horn at the opening of the second movement. The rapid succession of song after song was interesting principally because of the instrumentation. "Pop goes the weasel" was tame because Dr. Koussevitzky evidently had never heard it played with its pristine "pop" by a country fiddler at a cross-road store. But the discord of preparations for war was magnificently done—one of the finest passages in the whole composition. The spirit of interminable desolation following the quartet was also extremely realistic.

Superlative Jazz

The jazz playing in the third movement would have made Mr. Whiteman green with envy. Such stuff seems fated to be the end of every orchestra's desire. Mr. Bloch did more than make a parody, he made innovations and improvements, from which jazz will doubtless profit. The Boston Symphony showed itself past master at playing the stuff; but then it has played a lot of dance music of late.

"The anthem, pure and simple, was sounded proudly, the people singing with deep fervor and enthusiasm." The chorus, after its long wait in the aisles filled the hall with its volume, all the more easily because it was between the audience and the orchestra, somewhat unusual position.

Ravel's "Waltz" was particularly interesting as a piece of ultra-sophistication. We have been told that it suggested whirling clouds through which the dancers at a court ball could be seen; but the unsophisticated might readily hear in it the sound of mill wheels, frogs, early morning noises from the canebrake and animals waiting for their breakfast. The composer gives rein to a cynical satisfaction at being able to outdo the emotionalists with his strange sounds and joyous rhythms, all struggling to be born. The close was suggestive of the ignobile vulgus, senselessly shouting and sweating and pushing itself along.

The Schubert Symphony was remarkable for the finish of its performance. Perhaps the extreme pianissimo of the introduction robbed it of its vigor, as it did the song of the 'cellos later; and in the second movement there was some angular and seemingly unnecessary bowing in the violin section, but the passionless beauty of the performance as a whole was quite unusual.

Dr. Koussevitzky's work was extremely gratifying to the audience, which overflowed the seating areas; he was recalled again and again at the close of each number.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 20 1929

Rhapsody 'America' Symphony Feature

Bloch's Epic Played by Boston Orchestra at Albee Theatre.

Chorus Sings Finale.

A symphony concert in which the symphony is first on the programme and second in importance is not a usual thing, but it is symptomatic and illustrative. It may well be indicative of new trends, a change from the accepted order of things and an illustration of the restlessness of an age not yet settled down. The symphony has been first all through the years: let it make way for a newer expression of musical desire. That, at any rate, was what was done last evening in the Albee Theatre, when the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its third Providence concert of the season. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

The principal number was Bloch's "America," an epic rhapsody. Schubert's unfinished symphony was also on the programme, but all the interest of the evening was centred on Bloch's remarkable piece, unquestionably one of the most important contributions of the present century to the realm of music. It is an idealized musical conception of the history of America, touching upon only three periods, however. Bloch has described the first of the three movements as "The Soil — The Indians — England — The Mayflower—Landing of the Pilgrims." The second is "Hours of Joy and Sorrow," and is interpretative of the Civil war period. The third is "1926—The Present—The Future."

One who did not hear last night's concert may from this brief summary provided by the composer gain an impression of his ideas and what he sought to interpret through the medium of a great orchestra. Historic themes run through the composition —the throb of the Indian drum in the distance, the strains of "Old Hundred," songs of the South and jazz at its wildest. It all culminates in a noble, swinging hymn played with thrilling power by the orchestra and sung by a mixed chorus organized by John B. Archer.

One may easily criticise this as well as any other musical work, but there is a compelling power to it all, an intensity that moves one profoundly. The nobility of the finale in its fervent, passionate appeal to the America of the future is more than thrilling. It is soul-stirring. The whole work was read by Mr. Koussevitzky as by one who loved it.

Schubert's symphony was, of course, beautifully played, and Ravel's "Waltz," another present-day number, was an effective introduction to the Bloch work. But "America" was a programme in itself. A first hearing inspires an urgent desire to hear it again.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 23 1929

MUSIC
By OLIN DOWNES.

Jesus M. Sanroma's Recital.

Following his very brilliant appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a few weeks ago in this city, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, gave his first New York recital last night in Town Hall. The program was unconventional in its material, presenting for the first time here three sonatas by Padre Antonio Soler, the Spanish composer of the eighteenth century, a "Danse" by Lopatnikoff, Arthur Honegger's "Cahier Romand" and Ernest Toch's "Der Jongleur." The other compositions were Beethoven's Sonata op. 27 in E flat and Schumann's "Davidsbundlertanze," which followed pieces of Albeniz "El Corpus Christi en Sevilla" and "Triana" at the end of the program.

Mr. Sanroma's musicianship, taste and command of tone-color were quickly in evidence. He played the agreeable, sparkling little sonatas of Soler, sonatas which show clearly the influence of Scarlatti and the Italian school, with a crisp, rippling technic, a piquant manner, and fine tone-values. The Beethoven sonata was admirably presented as regarded the articulation of the phrases, the powerful and sudden dynamic contrasts and the admirable comprehension of the master's form.

The pieces by Lopatnikoff and Honegger are not important. The first is a rather smart series of modern pianistic figures, entertaining in the domain of what is essentially parlor music. The Honegger set of five pieces is dry as a bone, cerebral as a multiplication table and without originality. We expected better of Honegger. Nor is it easy to enthuse over the "Jongleur" of Mr. Toch, recognizing its humorous and satirical vein—Mr. Toch and his glissandos!

These pieces, again, were excellently played from the standpoint of technic and tonal adjustment. Mr. Sanroma may fairly be called a modern pianist in his style and his sense of values. He is not an exponent of the romantic school. He does not delight in soft and rich colors, or swashbuckling chords and octaves, so much as he courts clearness of line, justness of proportion, accuracy of rhythm.

With the exception of the Albeniz pieces, in which, surprisingly enough, he dropped some notes on the floor, he showed an excellent technic, which was not surprising, in view of his electrical performance of the extremely difficult piano part of the Toch concerto with Mr. Koussevitzky and his players. Not only this: Mr. Sanroma absolutely refused to abuse the resources of his instrument. But the Albeniz pieces lacked juice and exotic fragrance, nor was there the sensation of the easy grace, the spontaneous caprice and impulse which woke this music. Well conceived effects were calculated. There was self-consciousness in their planning and carrying out. Yet Mr. Sanroma has Spanish blood in him, which we expected to flare up when he discoursed the fantasies of Albeniz.

There were certain parallels between his course with this music, the comparative dryness of his sentiment, even when it was faithful to the composer's intention—as in the Beethoven sonata—and the music of Toch and the playing of Arthur Schnabel, with whom Mr. Sanroma has worked in Germany. All of this was playing of the head rather than the heart. It commanded respect and esteem, but we expect more from Mr. Sanroma as he fights free outside musical influences and consults more and more his own thinking, temperament, impulses as an interpreter.

Last night his praiseworthy performances were almost too intelligent, too proportionate, too finicky in their careful arrangement. From a young man in his twenties a warmer if a more immoderate tendency would be preferable. What does it avail if an art, no matter how finished or esthetically correct, is sparse at the roots? For the reason that we personally know Mr. Sanroma's talent and his development as a musician we expect something more and something different from him in the future.

He earned the hearty applause of his audience last night. The day will come when he will stir his listeners more. In response to the applause the pianist repeated Toch's piece, and later he further extended the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
POST
FEB 24 1929

NEW SYMPHONY TO BE PLAYED HERE IN MARCH

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has definitely confirmed reports that the Boston Symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will offer Washington its first rendition of Ernest Bloch's renowned new symphony, "America," when the orchestra makes its final Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, March 6, at 4:30 o'clock.

The Washington Oratorio Society, Dr. Albert Harned conductor, will be heard at the same time in the vocal anthem which constitutes an important feature of Bloch's orchestral work, it was also stated, and during the past week Dr. Harned has been conducting rehearsals with 150 members of the Oratorio Society who will appear on the stage of Poli's with the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the singers as well as the orchestra, it is understood, and the occasion promises to be of the first importance from a Washington musical angle.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was said, has already given Bloch's "America" on several occasions in both Boston and New York before enthusiastic audiences, and Mr. Koussevitzky is thought to be desirous of presenting a symphonic work of patriotic texture on the occasion of the March concert in Washington, when the city will still be playing host to thousands of inaugural visitors and sightseers.

The symphony itself is said to require about 40 minutes, though less than 5 minutes is required for the anthem which the oratorio singers will sing. This anthem is said to offer a theme of praise and gratitude for the United States.

The March concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be its final visit to Washington this season and will bring to a close Mrs. Wilson-Greene's philharmonic course of afternoon concerts at Poli's.

The last concert of the Wilson-Greene season will be that of Serge Rachmaninoff on Wednesday afternoon, March 20. This will close the artists' course.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
FEB 24 1929

Next Friday evening, March 1, Noah Swayne will give a lecture-recital for the Brooklyn Institute on "The Negro and His Music."

* * *

The fourth concert in the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given at the Academy Friday evening, March 8. Mr. Koussevitzky has not as yet announced his program for that evening.

* * *

A program of unusual interest is announced for the fourth Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 8. Mr. Koussevitzky will begin with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, which has lately been discovered in Berlin. Frederick composed this symphony in 1743 and, although he wrote others, too, this score was not corrected by his music and flute master, Quantz, but left exactly as the King wrote it. Frederick, whose proficiency as flute virtuoso is historical, uses two flutes in this score.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
FEB 2 01929

Boston Programs.

For the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week Friday and Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky has set Bruckner's Symphony in C minor as the chief item on the program. The composer's works, although retaining popularity abroad, are not often heard here nowadays. The only other item on the program will be the composition of a well known Boston musician and composer, Arthur Foote, whose Suite in E major for strings will be played.

The People's Symphony orchestra at its concert in the Statler Hotel last Sunday afternoon included George W. Chadwick's tone poem "Tam O'Shanter" in its program. It is still one of the most colorful of Mr. Chadwick's orchestral compositions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 24 1929

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, pays its fourth New York visit of the season next week. On Thursday night, March 7, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky is to offer Bach's fourth Brandenburg Concerto, Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Frederick the Great (Frederick II of Prussia, who reigned from 1740 to 1786) will be represented as a composer on the program for Saturday afternoon, March 9, by his third symphony, in D major. Mr. Koussevitzky will also give the third symphony of Sibelius, which has not been heard here for some time, and repeat the Moussorgsky-Ravel work. The program for Brooklyn on Friday evening, March 8, consists of the symphony of Frederick the Great, the Sibelius D minor violin concerto, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 24 1929

Serge Koussevitzky, at the next Boston Symphony visits here, will include Strauss's "Zarathustra" in his evening program for March 7, while on March 8 in Brooklyn and March 9 in Carnegie Hall he will present a symphony by Frederick the Great and the Third symphony of Sibelius.

SEE PAGE 120 FOR PROV. BULLETIN CRITICISM.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
FEB 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY—March 6.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will make its final appearance in Washington this season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, March 6, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The program will be peculiarly appropriate to inauguration week. The principal number will be Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," the first Washington presentation, with a chorus of 125 Washington singers giving the anthem which constitutes so important a part of this work.

Mr. Koussevitzky also will present Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," especially arranged by Maurice Ravel.

Seats are on sale at the concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

METROPOLITAN—"Weary River."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
POST
FEB 28 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will make its final appearance in Washington this season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, March 6, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in a program peculiarly appropriate to inauguration week. The principal number of the program will be the first Washington presentation of Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," with a chorus of 125 Washington singers, giving the anthem which constitutes so important a part of this work. Mr. Koussevitzky will also play Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," especially arranged by Maurice Ravel.

Boston Symphony at Poli's Next Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will make its final appearance in Washington this season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, March 6, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in a program peculiarly appropriate to inauguration week. The principal number of the program will be the first Washington presentation of Ernest's Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," with a chorus of 125 Washington singers giving the anthem which constitutes so important a part of this work. Mr. Koussevitzky will also play Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition," especially arranged by Maurice Ravel. Seats for this concert are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Green's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
TIMES
FEB 28 1929

103

his skill in composition, save himself from the insignificant and the ridiculous ideas that often seem to exude from the pages of that "magnificent Idler."

Dr. Koussevitzky played the composition with true loving kindness, and doubtless his interpretation added much to its intrinsic worth. If the composer had called the first movement the voyage of the Mayflower, he would have hit close to the mark. The ground swell, the big clouds, the sea gulls, fair weather, the dolphins, were all there, followed by lovely viola effects, suggesting music. Perhaps one of the most striking passages in the composition was the "Old Hundred" phrase followed immediately by the challenge of the Indian pipe.

Disaster and desolation seemed to be the significance of the English horn at the opening of the second movement. The rapid succession of song after song was interesting principally because of the instrumentation. "Pop goes the weasel" was tame because Dr. Koussevitzky evidently had never heard it played with its pristine "pop" by a country fiddler at a cross-road store. But the discord of preparations for war was magnificently done—one of the finest passages in the whole composition. The spirit of interminable desolation following the quartet was also extremely realistic.

Superlative Jazz

The jazz playing in the third movement would have made Mr. Whiteman green with envy. Such stuff seems fated to be the end of every orchestra's desire. Mr. Bloch did more than make a parody, he made innovations and improvements, from which jazz will doubtless profit. The Boston Symphony showed itself past master at playing the stuff; but then it has played a lot of dance music of late.

"The anthem, pure and simple, was sounded proudly, the people singing with deep fervor and enthusiasm." The chorus, after its long wait in the aisles filled the hall with its volume, all the more easily because it was between the audience and the orchestra, somewhat unusual position.

Ravel's "Waltz" was particularly interesting as a piece of ultra-sophistication. We have been told that it suggested whirling clouds through which the dancers at a court ball could be seen; but the unsophisticated might readily hear in it the sound of mill wheels, frogs, early morning noises from the canebrake and animals waiting for their breakfast. The composer gives rein to a cynical satisfaction at being able to outdo the emotionalists with his strange sounds and joyous rhythms, all struggling to be born. The close was suggestive of the ignobile vulgus, senselessly shouting and sweating and pushing itself along.

The Schubert Symphony was remarkable for the finish of its performance. Perhaps the extreme pianissimo of the introduction robbed it of its vigor, as it did the song of the 'cellos later; and in the second movement there was some angular and seemingly unnecessary bowing in the violin section, but the passionless beauty of the performance as a whole was quite unusual.

Dr. Koussevitzky's work was extremely gratifying to the audience, which overflowed the seating areas; he was recalled again and again at the close of each number.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 20 1929

Rhapsody 'America' Symphony Feature

Bloch's Epic Played by Boston Orchestra at Albee Theatre.

Chorus Sings Finale.

A symphony concert in which the symphony is first on the programme and second in importance is not a usual thing, but it is symptomatic and illustrative. It may well be indicative of new trends, a change from the accepted order of things and an illustration of the restlessness of an age not yet settled down. The symphony has been first all through the years: let it make way for a newer expression of musical desire. That, any rate, was what was done last evening in the Albee Theatre, when the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its third Providence concert of the season. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

The principal number was Bloch's "America," an epic rhapsody. Schubert's unfinished symphony was also on the programme, but all the interest of the evening was centred on Bloch's remarkable piece, unquestionably one of the most important contributions of the present century to the realm of music. It is an idealized musical conception of the history of America, touching upon only three periods, however. Bloch has described the first of the three movements as "The Soil — The Indians — England — The Mayflower—Landing of the Pilgrims." The second is "Hours of Joy and Sorrow," and is interpretative of the Civil war period. The third is "1926—The Present—The Future."

One who did not hear last night's concert may from this brief summary provided by the composer gain an impression of his ideas and what he sought to interpret through the medium of a great orchestra. Historic themes run through the composition —the throb of the Indian drum in the distance, the strains of "Old Hundred," songs of the South and jazz at its wildest. It all culminates in a noble, swinging hymn played with thrilling power by the orchestra and sung by a mixed chorus organized by John B. Archer.

One may easily criticise this as well as any other musical work, but there is a compelling power to it all, an intensity that moves one profoundly. The nobility of the finale in its fervent, passionate appeal to the America of the future is more than thrilling. It is soul-stirring. The whole work was read by Mr. Koussevitzky as by one who loved it.

Schubert's symphony was, of course, beautifully played, and Ravel's "Waltz," another present-day number, was an effective introduction to the Bloch work. But "America" was a programme in itself. A first hearing inspires an urgent desire to hear it again.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 23 1929

MUSIC
By OLIN DOWNES.

Jesus M. Sanroma's Recital.

Following his very brilliant appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a few weeks ago in this city, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, gave his first New York recital last night in Town Hall. The program was unconventional in its material, presenting for the first time here three sonatas by Padre Antonio Soler, the Spanish composer of the eighteenth century, a "Danse" by Lopatnikoff, Arthur Honegger's "Cahier Romand" and Ernest Toch's "Der Jongleur." The other compositions were Beethoven's Sonata op. 27 in E flat and Schumann's "Davidsbundlertanze," which followed pieces of Albeniz "El Corpus Christi en Sevilla" and "Triana" at the end of the program.

Mr. Sanroma's musicianship, taste and command of tone-color were quickly in evidence. He played the agreeable, sparkling little sonatas of Soler, sonatas which show clearly the influence of Scarlatti and the Italian school, with a crisp, rippling technic, a piquant manner, and fine tone-values. The Beethoven sonata was admirably presented as regarded the articulation of the phrases, the powerful and sudden dynamic contrasts and the admirable comprehension of the master's form.

The pieces by Lopatnikoff and Honegger are not important. The first is a rather smart series of modern pianistic figures, entertaining in the domain of what is essentially parlor music. The Honegger set of five pieces is dry as a bone, cerebral as a multiplication table and without originality. We expected better of Honegger. Nor is it easy to enthuse over the "Jongleur" of Mr. Toch, recognizing its humorous and satirical vein—Mr. Toch and his glissandos!

These pieces, again, were excellently played from the standpoint of technic and tonal adjustment. Mr. Sanroma may fairly be called a modern pianist in his style and his sense of values. He is not an exponent of the romantic school. He does not delight in soft and rich colors, or swashbuckling chords and octaves, so much as he courts clearness of line, justness of proportion, accuracy of rhythm.

With the exception of the Albeniz pieces, in which, surprisingly enough, he dropped some notes on the floor, he showed an excellent technic, which was not surprising, in view of his electrical performance of the extremely difficult piano part of the Toch concerto with Mr. Koussevitzky and his players. Not only this: Mr. Sanroma absolutely refused to abuse the resources of his instrument. But the Albeniz pieces lacked juice and exotic fragrance, nor was there the sensation of the easy grace, the spontaneous caprice and impulse which woke this music. Well conceived effects were calculated. There was self-consciousness in their planning and carrying out. Yet Mr. Sanroma has Spanish blood in him, which we expected to flare up when he discoursed the fantasies of Albeniz.

There were certain parallels between his course with this music, the comparative dryness of his sentiment, even when it was faithful to the composer's intention—as in the Beethoven sonata—and the music of Toch and the playing of Arthur Schnabel, with whom Mr. Sanroma has worked in Germany. All of this was playing of the head rather than the heart. It commanded respect and esteem, but we expect more from Mr. Sanroma as he fights free outside musical influences and consults more and more his own thinking, temperament, impulses as an interpreter.

Last night his praiseworthy performances were almost too intelligent, too proportionate, too finicky in their careful arrangement. From a young man in his twenties a warmer if a more immoderate tendency would be preferable. What does it avail if an art, no matter how finished or esthetically correct, is sparse at the roots? For the reason that we personally know Mr. Sanroma's talent and his development as a musician we expect something more and something different from him in the future.

He earned the hearty applause of his audience last night. The day will come when he will stir his listeners more. In response to the applause the pianist repeated Toch's piece, and later he further extended the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
POST
FEB 24 1929

NEW SYMPHONY TO BE PLAYED HERE IN MARCH

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has definitely confirmed reports that the Boston Symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will offer Washington its first rendition of Ernest Bloch's renowned new symphony, "America," when the orchestra makes its final Washington appearance of the season at Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, March 6, at 4:30 o'clock.

The Washington Oratorio Society, Dr. Albert Harned conductor, will be heard at the same time in the vocal anthem which constitutes an important feature of Bloch's orchestral work, it was also stated, and during the past week Dr. Harned has been conducting rehearsals with 150 members of the Oratorio Society who will appear on the stage of Poli's with the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the singers as well as the orchestra, it is understood, and the occasion promises to be of the first importance from a Washington musical angle.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was said, has already given Bloch's "America" on several occasions in both Boston and New York before enthusiastic audiences, and Mr. Koussevitzky is thought to be desirous of presenting a symphonic work of patriotic texture on the occasion of the March concert in Washington, when the city will still be playing host to thousands of inaugural visitors and sightseers.

The symphony itself is said to require about 40 minutes, though less than 5 minutes is required for the anthem which the oratorio singers will sing. This anthem is said to offer a theme of praise and gratitude for the United States.

The March concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be its final visit to Washington this season and will bring to a close Mrs. Wilson-Greene's philharmonic course of afternoon concerts at Poli's.

The last concert of the Wilson-Greene season will be that of Serge Rachmaninoff on Wednesday afternoon, March 20. This will close the artists' course.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
FEB 24 1929

Next Friday evening, March 1, Noah Swayne will give a lecture-recital for the Brooklyn Institute on "The Negro and His Music."

* * *

The fourth concert in the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given at the Academy Friday evening, March 8. Mr. Koussevitzky has not as yet announced his program for that evening.

* * *

A program of unusual interest is announced for the fourth Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 8. Mr. Koussevitzky will begin with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, which has lately been discovered in Berlin. Frederick composed this symphony in 1743 and, although he wrote others, too, this score was not corrected by his music and flute master, Quantz, but left exactly as the King wrote it. Frederick, whose proficiency as flute virtuoso is historical, uses two flutes in this score.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
FEB 2 01929

Boston Programs.

For the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week Friday and Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky has set Bruckner's Symphony in C minor as the chief item on the program. The composer's works, although retaining popularity abroad, are not often heard here nowadays. The only other item on the program will be the composition of a well known Boston musician and composer, Arthur Foote, whose Suite in E major for strings will be played.

The People's Symphony orchestra at its concert in the Statler Hotel last Sunday afternoon included George W. Chadwick's tone poem "Tam O'Shanter" in its program. It is still one of the most colorful of Mr. Chadwick's orchestral compositions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
FEB 28 1929

Boston Symphony at Poli's Next Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will make its final appearance in Washington this season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, March 6, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in a program peculiarly appropriate to inauguration week. The principal number of the program will be the first Washington presentation of Ernest's Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," with a chorus of 125 Washington singers giving the anthem which constitutes so important a part of this work. Mr. Koussevitzky will also play Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition," especially arranged by Maurice Ravel. Seats for this concert are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Green's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 24 1929

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, pays its fourth New York visit of the season next week. On Thursday night, March 7, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky is to offer Bach's fourth Brandenburg Concerto, Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Frederick the Great (Frederick II of Prussia, who reigned from 1740 to 1786) will be represented as a composer on the program for Saturday afternoon, March 9, by his third symphony, in D major. Mr. Koussevitzky will also give the third symphony of Sibelius, which has not been heard here for some time, and repeat the Moussorgsky-Ravel work. The program for Brooklyn on Friday evening, March 8, consists of the symphony of Frederick the Great, the Sibelius D minor violin concerto, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

Serge Koussevitzky, at the next Boston Symphony visits here, will include Strauss's "Zarathustra" in his evening program for March 7, while on March 8 in Brooklyn and March 9 in Carnegie Hall he will present a symphony by Frederick the Great and the Third symphony of Sibelius.

SEE PAGE 120 FOR PROV. BULLETIN CRITICISM.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR

BOSTON SYMPHONY—March 6.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will make its final appearance in Washington this season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, March 6, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The program will be peculiarly appropriate to inauguration week. The principal number will be Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," the first Washington presentation, with a chorus of 125 Washington singers giving the anthem which constitutes so important a part of this work.

Mr. Koussevitzky also will present Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," especially arranged by Maurice Ravel.

Seats are on sale at the concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

METROPOLITAN—"Weary River"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
POST
FEB 10 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will make its final appearance in Washington this season at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, March 6, at 4:30 o'clock, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in a program peculiarly appropriate to inauguration week. The principal number of the program will be the first Washington presentation of Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," with a chorus of 125 Washington singers, giving the anthem which constitutes so important a part of this work. Mr. Koussevitzky will also play Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," especially arranged by Maurice Ravel.

104

Symphony

The Day of Music from Living Hands

'28

TRANS. — DEC. 29

Sibelius, Toch and Carpenter, Set in Contrast Through A Brave Afternoon

EVERY ONE that sits before the arts—listener, spectator, reader—knows those occasions when all things join together for full accomplishment and deep pleasure. Consciously, no one concerned works the harder or heeds the more intently. Yet a kindling spirit fills the air, infusing itself into all who breathe it. Chance rules the world, and none may say when or where it will light these fires. Yesterday, being kind, it bestowed them upon the Symphony Concert and the event beggars the descriptive word. True, there were incitements to these favors of fate. Sibelius's Third Symphony, repeated from the first performances last month; Toch's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, played for the first time hereabouts; the concert-version of Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," filled the program. There is no reason to disparage Mr. Koussevitzky when from Bach to Brahms, he ranges through the classics of symphonic music; usually, indeed, there is reason to praise; but, being as he should be, man and musician of his own time, he most excels with the work of living composers. Sibelius, Toch and Carpenter are all three such.

Sibelius's Symphony is barely seven weeks old at Symphony Hall; Mr. Carpenter's ballet entered the repertory last year. With both, orchestra and conductor were familiar; had only to intensify and polish the grounding performances of an immediate past. Mr. Koussevitzky has re-made the band in his own image. Therefore it responds alertly, sympathetically, to modernist music. As such Toch's Concerto was piece to put both to their mettle. Nor was conductor, orchestra or audience indifferent to the fortunes of Mr. Sanromá as pianist. He has ripened his young abilities before their eyes and ears. Yesterday he renewed and amplified the proof. An earned applause rewarded him. Even so, it was the divine spark—for it is nothing less—that made the afternoon what it indubitably was. That fire descends where and when it listeth; but it is tempting to believe that such virtue as dwells in Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra—the three composers aiding—may now and then attract it.

The commentators and the learned Doctors of Music who compile program-books, take their own course with Sibelius. They draw word-pictures of the Finnish landscape; recount old tales out of Finnish sagas; set forth the minds and the hearts of the folk; survey their handiwork as who should say: "Behold Sibelius as racial and nationalistic composer." Yet what listener, hearing the Symphony of yesterday, thought twice of these antecedents and settings? It prevailed as music, as universal music, as nothing else. It prevailed, likewise, as music from which every veil was stripped. It is the custom of these same wise men to say that composers "expose" their themes. Sibelius lays his as bare as the nerves that surgeons uncover with their knives. They quiver with musical life; vibrate upon the ear; pierce through to the imagination; hold it fast. The venerable Doctors of Music call these themes "musical thoughts." They are also born of a musical emotion, which becomes occasion of a like emotion in others. Sibelius, again as the analysts say, "works" these themes, generating the strangely spoken, strangely lighted music in the first division of this Third Symphony—the whirr of the darkling strings; the wood-winds singing in uncanny tones, the vistas of chords up and down the orchestra.

The themes and "the working" generate no less the simple beauty, now misty, now sun-pierced, of the slow movement. Men of imagination in all the arts reach out for it. There is a passage in "Twelfth Night"—about the knitters in the sun—in which Shakspeare, as unconsciously as Sibelius, gains it. For the composer the finale of his Symphony ensues. The rhythms swirl; upon them the themes are tossed like leaves; the gale abates; falls still, as though silence had clo'ven sound. Again the impression has been wholly musical, deepened by the incisiveness of the orchestral voices; intensified by their range over Sibelius's gray-hued palette. A few conductors scanned the surfaces of this Third Symphony; played it to none effect. Mr. Koussevitzky searched out and opened its secrets; now bids hearers share them. In all his five years in Boston, he and his orchestra have done no finer deed than this release of a sealed music.

Were Mr. Koussevitzky the ironist that Dr. Muck was, he might of purpose have set over against Mr. Bloch's visionary, vertiginous "America," Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," firm-set in an American substance, clear-spoken with an American spirit strange to that European dreamer about human destiny and universal brotherhood, that unfolder in tones of anecdotical-historical panoramas. The conductor is gentler and kindlier. Though he debated long with himself, his musical intuition—usually his truest guide—finally fastened upon "Skyscrapers"; while from Boston to Paris and back again the response of audiences justified his faith. For the while, Mr. Carpenter's ballet has receded from the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House (where the dance is a weak sister), only to gain new prestige in the concert-room. More listeners, wider spread, would hear it as symphonic poem, in free and realistic speech, of that urban America where music and the other arts have their traffic.

Upon the American escutcheon is inscribed work, the harder the better. It hammers up skyscrapers—and Mr. Carpenter's rhythms pound; while his musical matter rises, sonority upon sonority. Heedless we pass underneath, and he can write measures in deliberately dry routine. The dissolving hour strikes, when the toil of the day melts into the pleasure-seeking of the night. Who has not felt it as he watches the streams flowing in and out of subways; or upon no more than a strap and a foothold, himself breasts them? For this mood and motion, Mr. Carpenter finds graphic musical symbols. To play, then, in restless crowds, whipping now this way, now that, as some new curiosity prompts them; returning always to the dance that is release both to the relaxed mood and the tense underlying temperament. Clip it with syncopation, streak it with sentiment, and a jazzed music sounds. The sentimental vein deepens; at small provocation, anywhere, everywhere, amongst us, it may come uppermost; and Mr. Carpenter's negro chorus—yesterday personified in Mme. Sundelius and Mr. Lautner—is singing its moon-struck melancholy tune; then snapping away into the tapping rhythms. Tap and tap, sing sweet and wistful; hammer and hammer hard; for the music is building skyscrapers again.

Mr. Carpenter has rhythmed the American temperament; into tones transmuted its contrasting energies. Both emerge in the terms of a music self-contained and self-generating. Of a music that does as well its idealizing office. It dances—to a jazz of imagination, not of the night clubs. It pounds and snaps—through measures that are the voice of devoted, concentrated energy, not the imitated sound of hammers upon rivets. (Conductor and players yesterday did feats with it. A symphony orchestra touched in jazzed rhythms, outspread jazzed song, as though Mr. Whiteman himself were there to hear and applaud. The massed sonorities of the beginning and the end seemed the muscle and sinew of musical sound, in stretch, and beating.) Yet nobody except a few reviewers, one and another fellow-composer, the opera house in Munich, a Parisian audience, this one conductor foreign-born and bred and practised, have heard in "Skyscrapers" a music of our urban America at last achieved. There are none so deaf as those who will not hear their own voices. Can it be that America à la Bloch more touches ingrained vanities?

Toch's Concerto excels by two qualities in which modernistic music is often deficient—individuality and imagination. Too many such pieces, especially from minor hands, are written according to prevalent formula. As many more proceed by much taking of thought, by willed process, more appropriate to the solution of a mathematical problem than to creation in tones. Toch escapes both pitfalls; is wary of a third, also besetting his brethren. Throughout his Concerto, heard last winter, Mr. Tansman used the piano as instrument of percussion. Outside a few measures in the slow movement, he declined it as voice of song. Toch is no such doctrinaire. If it serves his purpose, he can be relentlessly staccato with the piano-part. If he would beguile it for the moment into songful measures, as here and there in his slow division, he does not hesitate to ply the means.

Similarly with other courses, dictated by a single criterion—the full attainment of the desired end. Toch can be unsparingly dissonant, "atonal" or "polytonal," as the technical terms go. Little music written nowadays avoids dissonance; as a conservative elsewhere in this newspaper admits, there is no turning back to the old concords. Whatever the future of "atonality" and "polytonality"—and no one, though he be seventy-five years old, can foresee that—they are current and available musical idioms. On the other hand, the pursuers of musical resemblances, may trace to Debussy or Ravel more than one page in Toch's Adagio; while the stark declamation for the piano, with which the Concerto begins, might hark back to Beethoven himself. In the course of the final "Rondo Disturbato," Toch makes play with a bit of musical humor—"The Disturbance." It is more discoverable, and amusing to read than to hear. Intrinsically it is "paper-music, like remembered measures of Strauss when he would be jocular. Obviously Toch is an eclectic, as every composer, with the accumulated stores of music open, before him, is likely nowadays to be. He is also possessed of the notion, repulsive to every theorist but pleasing to the casual listener, that a composer chooses the expressive means best adapted to his design and purpose.

These, however, are pedantic foot-notes to a music that lays hold first upon interest, then upon imagination, finally upon emotion. The beginning is tense, incisive, imperious. Toch whips the listener to attention; then swirls away into the idioms aforesaid. The intensive rhythms, the sense of free, firm, procedure, the darts of suggestion, the flashes of power, the pauses of serenity, are irresistible. As with Hindemith, outpouring, unflinching vitality conquers every other sensation. Proclamation upon proclamation, the climax mounts, swells, rounds. . . . The slow movement shuns obvious sentiment; projects a more wayward mood, works more subtly upon the imagination by shifting harmonies and timbres, by contrasts of the piano and the divided and subdivided orchestra; by evasive melody, winding fancy-free. Into fantasy and rhapsody Toch pursues it with the means of a modernist used in a new temper to an insinuating end. . . . "The Disturbance" aside, the finale springs to nervous rhythms, hits, runs; in sheer exuberance is checked only to fling out again. Another German than Hindemith can goad us all before him.

Mr. Sanromá might have played a hallowed Concerto; reaped the rewards of young and fine abilities so exercised. He preferred to play the music of this immediate day with unfailing technical resource, with the tense dynamic energy, the proud proclamation, the adventuring fantasy, the swift subleties that Toch variously asks. Under his hand and Mr. Koussevitzky's, full, brave and free went the Concerto. His unselfishness was his praise.

H. T. P.

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Also Offers a Novelty in "Pictures at an Exhibition"

A distinguished feature of yesterday's symphony program was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." It comprises a set of pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Interpreted in inimitable fashion by Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday, it proved to be a charming and delightful variation. Inspired by an exhibition of drawings and water colors by Victor Hartmann, who had been an intimate friend, Moussorgsky paid him the tribute of attempting to translate these sketches into music.

The sketches are varied and interesting and amazingly significant. There is the picture of a gnome; a troubador singing a melancholy song; children disputing after their play; a Polish wagon with enormous wheels; drawn by oxen; ballet of chickens in their shells; two Polish Jews in argument; market women in dispute; impression of the catacombs, and others. Seldom is one given the pleasant thrill of such an unusual number so beautifully performed.

The D minor concerto of Sibelius was another treat afforded the large audience yesterday, and it was received with great enthusiasm. Richard Burgin was soloist and gave a brilliant performance. His standing as an artist of merit is secure, and he is constantly making greater achievements in his field. It is obvious that he has a large following and one that is vastly appreciative.

The symphony in D major, by Frederick the Great, was given a splendid reading. Likewise the Symphonie Spirituelle, by Jacques Janin.

The concert will be repeated this evening.

American

NOVEL WORKS ABOUND AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

The current symphony concert program is a curious hodge-podge. It begins with the first American performance of Frederick the Great's Symphony in D major, wherein a great soldier proves that he can write music, too. But, as was to be expected, the music consists largely of discreet nothings, not offensive, not precisely boring, but scarcely worth the excellent performance Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra lavish on it.

Then there is a Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia," by one Janin, of whom even the learned program editor knows little. The first performance of this work anywhere disclosed the religious dualism of heaven and earth treated in up-to-the-minute discordant jargon. This manner of treatment becomes wearisome, for it is usually little more than a disguise for very paltry musical ideas. In the present instance I think the composer has substance of a sort, but he seems ashamed to couch it in the simple language in which it was conceived.

The third piece, Sibelius' Violin Concerto, was a semi-novelty, for it has not been heard here since Maud Powell's day. With the orchestra's concert master, Richard Burgin, to play the solo part up to the hilt, at the very summit of musicianship, his task seemed singularly ungrateful. For the music was disappointing, at least to this admirer of Sibelius. It is very much diluted Tchaikovsky and—could I believe my ears?—there were strains that Godard might have written. Mr. Burgin's admirable performance was supplemented by Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent reading of the accompanying score, which is superbly orchestrated. The violinist was at least thanked for his pains, the audience giving him a tremendous ovation.

Finally, the one grateful piece, or set of pieces, on the program—Moussorssky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," masterly rescored for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The Russian is an arch-realist, but he is not content with realism alone. The music, absolutely considered, is of a high order.

AMERICAN MAR 2 '29

NOVEL WORKS ABOUND AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

The current symphony concert program is a curious hodge-podge. It begins with the first American performance of Frederick the Great's Symphony in D major, wherein a great soldier proves that he can write music, too. But, as was to be expected, the music consists largely of discreet nothings, not offensive, not precisely boring, but scarcely worth the excellent performance Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra lavish on it.

Then there is a Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia," by one Janin, of whom even the learned program editor knows little. The first performance of this work anywhere disclosed the religious dualism of heaven and earth treated in up-to-the-minute discordant jargon. This manner of treatment becomes wearisome, for it is usually little more than a disguise for very paltry musical ideas. In the present instance I think the composer has substance of a sort, but he seems ashamed to couch it in the simple language in which it was conceived.

The third piece, Sibelius' Violin Concerto, was a semi-novelty, for it has not been heard here since Maud Powell's day. With the orchestra's concert master, Richard Burgin, to play the solo part up to the hilt, at the very summit of musicianship, his task seemed singularly ungrateful. For the music was disappointing, at least to this admirer of Sibelius. It is very much diluted Tchaikovsky and—could I believe my ears?—there were strains that Godard might have written. Mr. Burgin's admirable performance was supplemented by Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent reading of the accompanying score, which is superbly orchestrated. The violinist was at least thanked for his pains, the audience giving him a tremendous ovation.

Finally, the one grateful piece, or set of pieces, on the program—Moussorssky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," masterly rescored for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The Russian is an arch-realist; but he is not content with realism alone. The music, absolutely considered, is of a high order.

104

Symphony

The Day of Music from Living Hands

'28

TRANS. — DEC. 29

Sibelius, Toch and Carpenter, Set in Contrast Through A Brave Afternoon

EVERY ONE that sits before the arts—listener, spectator, reader—knows those occasions when all things join together for full accomplishment and deep pleasure. Consciously, no one concerned works the harder or heeds the more intently. Yet a kindling spirit fills the air, infusing itself into all who breathe it. Chance rules the world, and none may say when or where it will light these fires. Yesterday, being kind, it bestowed them upon the Symphony Concert and the event beggars the descriptive word. True, there were incitements to these favors of fate. Sibelius's Third Symphony, repeated from the first performances last month; Toch's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, played for the first time hereabouts; the concert-version of Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," filled the program. There is no reason to disparage Mr. Koussevitzky when from Bach to Brahms, he ranges through the classics of symphonic music; usually, indeed, there is reason to praise; but, being as he should be, man and musician of his own time, he most excels with the work of living composers. Sibelius, Toch and Carpenter are all three such.

Sibelius's Symphony is barely seven weeks old at Symphony Hall; Mr. Carpenter's ballet entered the repertory last year. With both, orchestra and conductor were familiar; had only to intensify and polish the grounding performances of an immediate past. Mr. Koussevitzky has re-made the band in his own image. Therefore it responds alertly, sympathetically, to modernist music. As such Toch's Concerto was piece to put both to their mettle. Nor was conductor, orchestra or audience indifferent to the fortunes of Mr. Sanromá as pianist. He has ripened his young abilities before their eyes and ears. Yesterday he renewed and amplified the proof. An earned applause rewarded him. Even so, it was the divine spark—for it is nothing less—that made the afternoon what it indubitably was. That fire descends where and when it listeth; but it is tempting to believe that such virtue as dwells in Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra—the three composers aiding—may now and then attract it.

The commentators and the learned Doctors of Music who compile program-books, take their own course with Sibelius. They draw word-pictures of the Finnish landscape; recount old tales out of Finnish sagas; set forth the minds and the hearts of the folk; survey their handiwork as who should say: "Behold Sibelius as racial and nationalistic composer." Yet what listener, hearing the Symphony of yesterday, thought twice of these antecedents and settings? It prevailed as music, as universal music, as nothing else. It prevailed, likewise, as music from which every veil was stripped. It is the custom of these same wise men to say that composers "expose" their themes. Sibelius lays his as bare as the nerves that surgeons uncover with their knives. They quiver with musical life; vibrate upon the ear; pierce through to the imagination; hold it fast. The venerable Doctors of Music call these themes "musical thoughts." They are also born of a musical emotion, which becomes occasion of a like emotion in others. Sibelius, again as the analysts say, "works" these themes, generating the strangely spoken, strangely lighted music in the first division of this Third Symphony—the whirr of the darkling strings; the wood-winds singing in uncanny tones, the vistas of chords up and down the orchestra.

The themes and "the working" generate no less the simple beauty, now misty, now sun-pierced, of the slow movement. Men of imagination in all the arts reach out for it. There is a passage in "Twelfth Night"—about the knitters in the sun—in which Shakspeare, as unconsciously as Sibelius, gains it. For the composer the finale of his Symphony ensues. The rhythms swirl; upon them the themes are tossed like leaves; the gale abates; falls still, as though silence had driven sound. Again the impression has been wholly musical, deepened by the incisiveness of the orchestral voices; intensified by their range over Sibelius's gray-hued palette. A few conductors scanned the surfaces of this Third Symphony; played it to none effect. Mr. Koussevitzky searched out and opened its secrets; now bids hearers share them. In all his five years in Boston, he and his orchestra have done no finer deed than this release of a sealed music.

Were Mr. Koussevitzky the ironist that Dr. Muck was, he might of purpose have set over against Mr. Bloch's visionary, vertiginous "America," Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," firm-set in an American substance, clear-spoken with an American spirit strange to that European dreamer about human destiny and universal brotherhood, that unfolder in tones of anecdotical-historical panoramas. The conductor is gentler and kindlier. Though he debated long with himself, his musical intuition—usually his truest guide—finally fastened upon "Skyscrapers"; while from Boston to Paris and back again the response of audiences justified his faith. For the while, Mr. Carpenter's ballet has receded from the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House (where the dance is a weak sister), only to gain new prestige in the concert-room. More listeners, wider spread, would hear it as symphonic poem, in free and realistic speech, of that urban America where music and the other arts have their traffic.

Upon the American escutcheon is inscribed work, the harder the better. It hammers up skyscrapers—and Mr. Carpenter's rhythms pound; while his musical matter rises, sonority upon sonority. Heedless we pass underneath, and he can write measures in deliberately dry routine. The dissolving hour strikes, when the toil of the day melts into the pleasure-seeking of the night. Who has not felt it as he watches the streams flowing in and out of subways; or upon no more than a strap and a foothold, himself breasts them? For this mood and motion, Mr. Carpenter finds graphic musical symbols. To play, then, in restless crowds, whipping now this way, now that, as some new curiosity prompts them; returning always to the dance that is release both to the relaxed mood and the tense underlying temperament. Clip it with syncopation, streak it with sentiment, and a jazzed music sounds. The sentimental vein deepens; at small provocation, anywhere, everywhere, amongst us, it may come uppermost; and Mr. Carpenter's negro chorus—yesterday personified in Mme. Sundelius and Mr. Lautner—is singing its moon-struck melancholy tune; then snapping away into the tapping rhythms. Tap and tap, sing sweet and wistful; hammer and hammer hard; for the music is building skyscrapers again.

Mr. Carpenter has rhythmed the American temperament; into tones transmuted its contrasting energies. Both emerge in the terms of a music self-contained and self-generating. Of a music that does as well its idealizing office. It dances—to a jazz of imagination, not of the night-clubs. It pounds and snaps—through measures that are the voice of devoted, concentrated energy, not the imitated sound of hammers upon rivets. (Conductor and players yesterday did feats with it. A symphony orchestra touched in jazzed rhythms, outspread jazzed song, as though Mr. Whiteman himself were there to hear and applaud. The massed sonorities of the beginning and the end seemed the muscle and sinew of musical sound, in stretch, and beating.) Yet nobody except a few reviewers, one and another fellow-composer, the opera house in Munich, a Parisian audience, this one conductor foreign-born and bred and practised, have heard in "Skyscrapers" a music of our urban America at last achieved. There are none so deaf as those who will not hear their own voices. Can it be that America à la Bloch more touches ingrained vanities?

Toch's Concerto excels by two qualities in which modernistic music is often deficient—individuality and imagination. Too many such pieces, especially from minor hands, are written according to prevalent formula. As many more proceed by much taking of thought, by willed process, more appropriate to the solution of a mathematical problem than to creation in tones. Toch escapes both pitfalls; is wary of a third, also besetting his brethren. Throughout his Concerto, heard last winter, Mr. Tansman used the piano as instrument of percussion. Outside a few measures in the slow movement, he declined it as voice of song. Toch is no such doctrinaire. If it serves his purpose, he can be relentlessly staccato with the piano-part. If he would beguile it for the moment into songful measures, as here and there in his slow division, he does not hesitate to ply the means.

Similarly with other courses, dictated by a single criterion—the full attainment of the desired end. Toch can be unsparingly dissonant, "atonal" or "polytonal," as the technical terms go. Little music written nowadays avoids dissonance; as a conservative elsewhere in this newspaper admits, there is no turning back to the old concords. Whatever the future of "atonality" and "polytonality"—and no one, though he be seventy-five years old, can foresee that—they are current and available musical idioms. On the other hand, the pursuers of musical resemblances, may trace to Debussy or Ravel more than one page in Toch's Adagio; while the stark declamation for the piano, with which the Concerto begins, might hark back to Beethoven himself. In the course of the final "Rondo Disturbato," Toch makes play with a bit of musical humor—"The Disturbance." It is more discoverable, and amusing to read than to hear. Intrinsically it is "paper-music, like remembered measures of Strauss when he would be jocular. Obviously Toch is an eclectic, as every composer, with the accumulated stores of music open before him, is likely nowadays to be. He is also possessed of the notion, repulsive to every theorist but pleasing to the casual listener, that a composer chooses the expressive means best adapted to his design and purpose.

These, however, are pedantic foot-notes to a music that lays hold first upon interest, then upon imagination, finally upon emotion. The beginning is tense, incisive, imperious. Toch whips the listener to attention; then swirls away into the idioms aforesaid. The intensive rhythms, the sense of free, firm, procedure, the darts of suggestion, the flashes of power, the pauses of serenity, are irresistible. As with Hindemith, outpouring, unflinching vitality conquers every other sensation. Proclamation upon proclamation, the climax mounts, swells, rounds. . . . The slow movement shuns obvious sentiment; projects a more wayward mood, works more subtly upon the imagination by shifting harmonies and timbres, by contrasts of the piano and the divided and subdivided orchestra; by evasive melody, winding fancy-free. Into fantasy and rhapsody Toch pursues it with the means of a modernist used in a new temper to an insinuating end. . . . "The Disturbance" aside, the finale springs to nervous rhythms, hits, runs; in sheer exuberance is checked only to fling out again. Another German than Hindemith can goad us all before him.

Mr. Sanromá might have played a hallowed Concerto; reaped the rewards of young and fine abilities so exercised. He preferred to play the music of this immediate day with unfailing technical resource, with the tense dynamic energy, the proud proclamation, the adventuring fantasy, the swift subleties that Toch variously asks. Under his hand and Mr. Koussevitzky's, full, brave and free went the Concerto. His unselfishness was his praise.

H. T. P.

Boston Herald

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Also Offers a Novelty in "Pictures at an Exhibition"

A distinguished feature of yesterday's symphony program was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." It comprises a set of pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Interpreted in inimitable fashion by Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday, it proved to be a charming and delightful variation. Inspired by an exhibition of drawings and water colors by Victor Hartmann, who had been an intimate friend, Moussorgsky paid him the tribute of attempting to translate these sketches into music.

The sketches are varied and interesting and amazingly significant. There is the picture of a gnome; a troubador singing a melancholy song; children disputing after their play; a Polish wagon with enormous wheels, drawn by oxen; ballet of chickens in their shells; two Polish Jews in argument; market women in dispute; impression of the catacombs, and others. Seldom is one given the pleasant thrill of such an unusual number so beautifully performed.

The D minor concerto of Sibelius was another treat afforded the large audience yesterday, and it was received with great enthusiasm. Richard Burgin was soloist and gave a brilliant performance. His standing as an artist of merit is secure, and he is constantly making greater achievements in his field. It is obvious that he has a large following and one that is vastly appreciative.

The symphony in D major, by Frederick the Great, was given a splendid reading. Likewise the Symphonie Spirituelle, by Jacques Janin.

The concert will be repeated this evening.

American Mar

NOVEL WORKS ABOUND AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

The current symphony concert program is a curious hodge-podge. It begins with the first American performance of Frederick the Great's Symphony in D major, wherein a great soldier proves that he can write music, too. But, as was to be expected, the music consists largely of discreet nothings, not offensive, not precisely boring, but scarcely worth the excellent performance Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra lavish on it.

Then there is a Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia," by one Janin, of whom even the learned program editor knows little. The first performance of this work anywhere disclosed the religious dualism of heaven and earth treated in up-to-the-minute discordant jargon. This manner of treatment becomes wearisome, for it is usually little more than a disguise for very paltry musical ideas. In the present instance I think the composer has substance of a sort, but he seems ashamed to couch it in the simple language in which it was conceived.

The third piece, Sibelius' Violin Concerto, was a semi-novelty, for it has not been heard here since Maud Powell's day. With the orchestra's concert master, Richard Burgin, to play the solo part up to the hilt, at the very summit of musicianship, his task seemed singularly ungrateful. For the music was disappointing, at least to this admirer of Sibelius. It is very much diluted Tchaikovsky and—could I believe my ears?—there were strains that Godard might have written. Mr. Burgin's admirable performance was supplemented by Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent reading of the accompanying score, which is superbly orchestrated. The violinist was at least thanked for his pains, the audience giving him a tremendous ovation.

Finally, the one grateful piece, or set of pieces, on the program—Moussorssky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," masterly rescored for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The Russian is an arch-realist, but he is not content with realism alone. The music, absolutely considered, is of a high order.

AMERICAN MAR 2 '29

NOVEL WORKS ABOUND AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

The current symphony concert program is a curious hodge-podge. It begins with the first American performance of Frederick the Great's Symphony in D major, wherein a great soldier proves that he can write music, too. But, as was to be expected, the music consists largely of discreet nothings, not offensive, not precisely boring, but scarcely worth the excellent performance Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra lavish on it.

Then there is a Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia," by one Janin, of whom even the learned program editor knows little. The first performance of this work anywhere disclosed the religious dualism of heaven and earth treated in up-to-the-minute discordant jargon. This manner of treatment becomes wearisome, for it is usually little more than a disguise for very paltry musical ideas. In the present instance I think the composer has substance of a sort, but he seems ashamed to couch it in the simple language in which it was conceived.

The third piece, Sibelius' Violin Concerto, was a semi-novelty, for it has not been heard here since Maud Powell's day. With the orchestra's concert master, Richard Burgin, to play the solo part up to the hilt, at the very summit of musicianship, his task seemed singularly ungrateful. For the music was disappointing, at least to this admirer of Sibelius. It is very much diluted Tchaikovsky and—could I believe my ears?—there were strains that Godard might have written. Mr. Burgin's admirable performance was supplemented by Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent reading of the accompanying score, which is superbly orchestrated. The violinist was at least thanked for his pains, the audience giving him a tremendous ovation.

Finally, the one grateful piece, or set of pieces, on the program—Moussorssky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," masterly rescored for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The Russian is an arch-realist, but he is not content with realism alone. The music, absolutely considered, is of a high order.

TRANS- MART-1929

Frederick the Great Comes to Cambridge

THE Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though coming at less frequent intervals, are no less subject to Mr. Koussevitzky's catholic and exploring taste than the concerts at Symphony Hall. Already this season they have brought to Sanders Theater the classic and pseudo-classic music of Mozart and Prokofiev, the mystical and scintillant music of Debussy and Ravel and the brittle music of the present time. Usually they have not overlooked the enthusiasms, the sonorities and subjective profundities that may be had of Schumann, Wagner, Chaikovsky, Brahms or Beethoven, as the case may be. Last evening, however, was an exception. Though the name of Chaikovsky appeared on the program, the concert was one in which the objective, descriptive and, mayhap, virtuoso attitude took precedent over subjective expression. In the preceding concert of the series, Mr. Koussevitzky produced a Concerto of Bach such as Frederick the Great might have enjoyed in the elegance and formality of an eighteenth century drawing room. Last evening the conductor revived a symphony (in D-major, No. 3) that Frederick the Great himself wrote. Companion pieces were Chaikovsky's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in B-flat minor, with Mr. Ignace Hilsberg to play the piano part, and Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel. Incidentally, two of these compositions, the Symphony of Frederick the Great and Ravel's orchesrtal translation from Musorgsky, are also on the program at Symphony Hall today and Saturday.

Seemingly Mr. Koussevitzky has revived the ancient Symphony of the Prussian king in the spirit of adventure. Though it is cut pattern-like out of the fashion of the day and pleads no personal cause as do the symphonies of Chaikovsky, it does have a prevailing and definable mood. This mood is one of well-being and good humor. Conductor and musicians discovered it in the amiable and steadily trotting figures of the Allegro, in which the violins kept up their cheerful progress while the double basses and wind instruments emitted the same two or three notes over and over again. They expressed it again in the second movement, in which two flutes played their decorative melodies against the accompaniment of four violins. And of the last movement they made nothing less than a jolly instrumental "hallelujah." The extreme simplicity of this music, its limited harmony and the brevity of the episodes served only to heighten the whimsical character which Mr. Koussevitzky so enjoyed revealing. Not knowing quite what to make of this symphony at first, the Cambridge audience paused a moment before bestowing its amused applause.

The Chaikovsky of the Piano Concerto is not the intensely passionate and coherent composer of the Fifth Symphony, heard at Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday. "I make slow progress with the work, and without real success [quoted the program-book]; but I still stick fast to my principles and cudgle my brain to subtilize pianoforte passages—." So the composer was here more interested in themes and their development and in effective figures for the solo instrument than in the torment and triumphs of his soul and the travail of a nation. Yet for this reason the Concerto contains much brilliant music for the piano, of which Mr. Hilsberg took full advantage. The pianist seated himself before his instrument with a serious and preoccupied air and bent absorbedly to his task. His great chords and extensive runs sturdily kept pace with the orchestra and were never overwhelmed by it. His fingering was admirably crisp and, if occasion demanded, he gracefully rounded a phrase or softened a melody. That the audience considered he had performed with brilliance was evident in the applause which twice recalled him to the stage. Mr. Koussevitzky, for his part, attended the score (which was a small one) more closely than is his usual wont.

Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel were introduced in the Cambridge series last season. The audience of yesterday took pleasure in the amazing variety of instrumental effects made available first by Ravel's orchestration of these frankly descriptive and fantastic impressions, and secondly by the high state of virtuosity obtaining in the modern symphony orchestra.

N. M. J.

Incidents and Prospects

For the matinée of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, March 12, in Symphony Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky proposes Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Schumann's Symphony of the Spring, Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival." At the concert of the orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, March 14, Mr. Burgin will repeat Sibelius's Concerto for Violin. The orchestra will be heard in Brahms's Second Symphony and in a Concerto by Philip-Emanuel-Bach. On both these programs are "classics." complaining souls will say in their haste, that should 'all" be heard at Symphony Hall in the subscription series. Without exception they have been, and this very season.

Two of Mr. Koussevitzky's kinsfolk gave a joint concert in Philadelphia last Monday. His nephew, who calls himself Fabien Sevitzky, played upon the double-bass—among other pieces three by his uncle. Mme. Maria Koussevitzky sang various songs.

ATURDAY, MARCH 2, 192

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 18th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follow: Frederick the Great, symphony in D major, No. 3 (first time in this country). Janin, Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia," for orchestra and organ (first performance). Sibelius, violin concerto (Richard Burgin, violinist). Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures at an Exhibition.

We all knew that Frederick the Great was passionately addicted to the flute. Louisa Muehlbach in novels of Prussian court and city life that once were popular would write, "The King was playing on his flute" and would supply a footnote: "This is a historical fact." Few of us knew that he composed overtures, operatic arias and four symphonies, of which only the one performed yesterday has a few wind instruments in addition to the strings. Was the loyal composer assisted by Quantz, his teacher for the flute? Quantz says "no" and declares that Frederick needed no help in writing the symphonies; and Quantz, although he had a handsome salary and received 100 ducats for a flute concerto —he composed 300 of them—was an honest fellow and surely would not lie about a small matter.

It was natural that Frederick for the slow movement of this symphony should think of his loved instrument. The andante is practically a pretty duet for flute, which were admirably played by Messrs. Laurent and Bladet. Hearing them, no one would have dared to describe the flute as a waterlogged instrument. There was more than vain tootle-tootling. There was pure, full tone, musical phrasing; pleasing, not envious rivalry. The other lively movements, lively after the manner of the 18th century, were creditable to Frederick's invention and skill. The symphony was refreshingly simple and agreeable. It would have been better for the world if Frederick had spent his days at Sans Souci, practising the flute, composing, tinkering librettos and giving an enlightened patronage to ladies of the ballet. As a soldier he slaughtered thousands. Biographers do not record that any one suffered severely from hearing him play the flute.

Jacques Janin, writing his Symphonie Spirituelle, had the ambition to sound a great "Alleluia" on earth and in the sky. At first those brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord are represented as tumultuously joyful. Unfortunately in their shouting songs of praise they are aggressively discordant. And so in country churches when the congregation was requested to rise and sing the 457th hymn, cracked voices, nasal voices, terrifying voices, voices which by their untunefulness could not have delighted the saints in heaven, rent the affrighted air. Dissonances are like word: of which Hobbes said they are "wise men's counters, they do but reckon by them: but they are the money of fools." Not that M. Janin is musically a fool; he has studied; he is not wholly without facility, but he uses it aimlessly. He abuses dissonances: they serve for him no aesthetic, impressive, sensuous purpose. There is a "ritualistic lament, the grief of angels at man's impiety." So runs the composer's argument. No wonder the angels were grieved at what they heard. Musical impiety is neither for gods nor men. Nor is the angelic lament what one might reasonably expect from the celestial choir. Nor can one in this instance employ the cautious phrase when a composition has little or no emotional value, "Yes, but it's well made."

When the Amazonian violinist, Maud Powell first brought into notice the concerto by Sibelius, the music was recognized as difficult for any player; it was also thought by many an ungrateful composition without force or beauty, but that was 22 years ago. The musical idiom of Sibelius is no longer strange and foreign; the great talent—at times genius of the composer is now fully recognized—his strength, his individuality; even the sombreness of certain pages is to many more than the cackling light-heartedness of men that set traps for immediate favor.

Whether this concerto is to be reckoned among his chief works is open to discussion. The brilliant performance by Mr. Burgin certainly brought out all that is in the concerto; a performance characterized by warmth—when the music allowed it—by deep emotion, as well as by technical proficiency; by the wild rhapsodic spirit with which certain pages are charged. All will admit the beauty of the middle movement, a beauty that is more than sensuous, a beauty of pure emotion without a trace of earthliness. There is beauty in the measures for the horns, as a background for the solo violin; as in the first movement there are arresting passages for wind instruments and the lower strings; "ancestral voices prophesying war." Nor can any one deny the exciting, rhythmic savagery of the Finale. Mr. Burgin richly deserved the enthusiastic applause at the end of the concerto. He was fortunate, also, in the masterly accompaniment by the orchestra led by a conductor in artistic and emotional sympathy. Yet one might say that the second movement is for our audience; the other movements chiefly constructed for the glory of a virtuoso violinist and for those admiring first of all the triumphant surmounting of difficulties.

Ravel's ingenious and delightful instrumentation of Moussorgsky's piano suite is familiar. Yesterday it not only again gave pleasure; it showed the amazing elasticity and euphony of the orchestra which has been brought to its present state of perfection by Mr. Koussevitzky.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of March 15, 16 will be as follows: C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg, Concerto in D major. Dukelsky, Symphony in F major (first time in this country). Brahms, Violin concerto (Mr. Heifetz, violinist). Belioz, Overture "The Roman Carnival."

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Frederick the Great, King of Prussia's Symphony

"Symphonie Spirituelle 'Alleluia,'" by Janin, Has First Performance

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1920, was warmly applauded as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert for his brilliant playing in Sibelius' violin concerto. A symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, was played for the first time in the United States. A work entitled "Symphonie Spirituelle 'Alleluia,'" by Jacques Janin, was performed for the first time anywhere. Ravel's orchestration of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" was the other number on a curiously assorted program.

Mr Burgin, an excellent violinist, played Sibelius' concerto in masterly style, conquering its many difficulties with a[p]parent ease. This concerto is one of t[h]e most interesting in the entire repertory. The music has the originality that distinguishes all Sibelius' work. By giving to the first allegro the character of an improvisation and alloting to the solo violin many unaccompanied passages, he manages to lend an appearance of spontaneity to the showy cadenzas. The themes have character, the treatment of them is imaginative. Mr Burgin played with complete understand[i]ng of the music. He is no mere technician, no mere gymnast of the violin.

Janin, described in the advance notice from Symphony Hall as a "Russian composer," is, according to yesterday's program book, a Frenchman who studied at the Paris Conservatoire from 1909 to 1914 and has since developed "a lively interest in music for the cinema, which he thinks capable of becoming an original art of grand dimentions."

The subtitle of the work heard yesterday is "Alleluia on Earth and in Heaven." It contains passages intended to depict the "tumultuous joy of souls on earth who live in God"; a "cantique of a more reflective religiosity"; and a lament representing "the grief of angels at man's impiety." It is scored for organ and full orchestra. The phrases just quoted, needless to remark, are not written by Mr Hale, but quoted by him from an unnamed source.

French composers have in the past century not seldom been struck by the theatrical possibilities inherent in grand religious subjects. It would be easy to cite examples from Berlioz and Gounod, not to mention lesser men. Janin's piece has one merit essentially French, its brevity. It seemed yesterday a naive and pointless juggling of insignificant musical material, curiously old-fashioned despite its annoying successions of unresolved dissonances. Mr Koussevitzky labored valiantly but vainly to lend it breadth and vigor of style.

Frederick the Great, certainly the most interesting monarch of modern times, loved music from boyhood and learned to play the flute passably. Taught by Karl Graun, he composed many pieces for flute, also marches, arias and symphonies. None of these were published with his permission. He prided himself rather on his skill in writing French verses, and on the cultivated intellect and refined taste that enabled him to converse on equal terms with the great Voltaire. His fame rests, however, on his amazing military successes.

Unkind court gossip would have it that Quantz, the King's master in flute playing, wrote or helped to write the royal compositions. But Quantz said of the symphony played yesterday that he had done nothing except correct "a few notes which were wrong in the notation." First published in the 1740s by the King's sister, this symphony has been edited and reissued within the past few years by Gustav Lenzewski, who has added to the instrumentation.

Frederick's music is fluent and lively in two allegros, between which comes a graceful andante with prominent solo parts for two flutes. The themes show no gift of melodic invention. One of them, in fact, was borrowed from Graun. The symphony was played with marked virtuosity by a small orchestra that included, rightly, a harpsichordized piano.

Ravel's marvelously effective arrangement of Muoorgsky's familiar set of piano pieces, shortened yesterday by the omission of the second number in the set, again delighted the audience. Mr Koussevitzky was at his best in the sonorous finale, the "Great Gate of Kiev," played with thrilling dramatic intensity, brasses sounding loud and clear. There were tumults of applause.

Next week the orchestra goes on tour. The program now announced for March 15 and 16 includes Brahms' violin concerto, with Heifetz as soloist, a new symphony by Dukelsky, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," and a concerto for orchestra by Philip Emanuel Bach.

P. R.

FREDERICK THE GREAT'S SYMPHONY

P. ST MAR. 2

First Performance of Monarch's Work in America

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A Symphony by Frederick the Great never before heard in America, a Symphonie Spirituelle, in its initial performance, by the Parisian Jacques Janin, a composer hitherto unknown here, and the Violin Concerto of Sibelius with Richard Burgin as soloist, unplayed here since 1912, lent freshness if not always interest to the first part of yesterday's Symphony Concert. Moussorgsky's graphic and imaginative "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the felicitous orchestration of Ravel, completed the afternoon.

A GOOD SYMPHONY

Not until yesterday had an orchestral composition or perhaps any piece at all by the flute-playing king of Prussia been performed in Boston. In all Frederick wrote four symphonies, three for strings alone although that of yesterday has parts for flutes, oboes, horns and bassoon to which the present editor, Gustav Lenzewski, has added a pianoforte.

The original score, it is said, was the king's alone; his flute master, Quantz, merely corrected errors in notation. And this music, written in the conventional idiom of its time, 1743, is quite good enough to have been made by one who did not also bear the burdens of royalty. Were it offered to a modern audience as the work of any secondary composer of the earlier 18th Century there would be no questioning or demur. Since the flute was Frederick's instrument the Andante, a movement of dignified beauty, takes the form of flute duet with light string accompaniment.

Indifferent in Janin

As a subtitle the Symphonie of Janin bear the quotation "Allelulia upon earth and in the heavens." A programme-note specifies that this terrestrial and celestial rejoicing is contrasted in the music with a ritualistic lament, the grief of angels at man's impiety.

Strange subject-matter, this, for a contemporary composer, and Janin has returned to the earlier masters of it, to the energetic counterpoint of Bach and the pomps of the Gounod of the oratorios, translated into modern every-man-for-himself polyphony, with plain-song for the lamenting angels. There are effective passages in this Symphonie, but as a whole the piece seemed scarcely worthy the very considerable effort necessarily expended in the preparation of it, for rhythmically this score is of exceeding complexity. It might, indeed, serve as a study in unusual time-signatures. Yesterday's audience received it with marked indifference.

Sibelius' Concerto

Not altogether advisedly did Sibelius take upon himself the task of writing a violin concerto. In the first movement the engrossing pages are those in which the solo instrument is silent. More grateful for the performer is the Adagio, with its long and beautiful cantilena accompanied chiefly by the four horns. And the finale comes nearer than does the first movement to being a satisfactory piece of concerted music, yet even here the solo instrument seems now and then intrusive and impertinent.

By Mr. Burgin and the orchestra the Concerto was admirably played, the violinist triumphing easily over the technical difficulties and bringing to the performance of the Adagio a notable display of feeling. At the end he was several times recalled.

105

MONITER

Boston Hears Symphony by Frederick the Great

MAR 24, 29

Frederick II of Prussia was called "the Great" for political rather than musical reasons. That at least is the general supposition, which we think will not be overturned by the performance at the eighteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Frederick's Symphony in D major No. 3. This is not to say that Frederick was necessarily a bad musician. It is recorded that he played the flute and the clavier, and was responsible for a number of compositions. The Symphony in D major is the only one of his four symphonies which is scored for wind instruments as well as strings; it calls for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon. According to the program book, this symphny was performed at the Friday afternoon concert for the first time in the United States. Have any other of Frederick's compositions been played in America?

Among Frederick's teachers were Johann Joachim Quantz, the flutist; Karl Heinrich Graun, and C. P. E. Bach. A hearing of this symphony leaves the impression that the royal pupil was faithful to the precepts of his masters. Indeed one would say he had paid them the compliment of adding nothing of his own to what they transmitted to him. The first of his three movements is an Allegro with recognizable themes, handled in the usual manner of eighteenth century minor composers. The Andante is novel in that it consists of a dialogue between two flutes, with string accompaniment; but the content is less striking than the form. The finale is a sprightly Allegro Scherzando. No doubt voices will be raised in protest against the inclusion of this unimpressive work in a symphony program. Yet there is no harm in it; and it serves, too, to reveal again the dexterity of the orchestra—or of the nucleus of it which was required for this composition.

An even more unusual invention was Jacques Janin's Symphonie Spirituelle "Alleluia," which had its first public performance yesterday. Its author is a mysterious fellow who apparently has yet to learn from some of his contemporaries the advantages of publicity. For no account of his career so far has been discovered. It is known only that he is a French composer who studied at the Paris Conservatory from 1909 to 1914, composed "La Légende de France" for propaganda purposes during the war, has had a few works played in Paris and takes an interest in music for the cinema.

It seems possible that this so-called symphony of his was written with an eye on the motion pictures, for the devotional purport indicated by the title proved to be of a kind that would hardly be in place elsewhere. If the work were to be performed in a church, that edifice should be designed by Messrs. Joseph Urban and Robert Edmond Jones. A note quoted in the program book, the source of which was not indicated, told us that "Alleluia on earth and in heaven denotes the nature of this symphony." But its composer evidently believes that worship nowadays is singularly devoid of peacefulness. His music is what one would expect from Honegger or Prokofieff attempting to write in the style of César Franck. The devotions it presumably represents must have been derived from the Scythians. It was brilliantly played and calmly received by the audience.

More satisfying was the performance by Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra, of the Violin Concerto of Sibelius. This, like other of the Finnish master's works, offers little that is ingratiating but much that is musically admirable. The solo part, which is of extraordinary difficulty, was executed with consummate mastery by Mr. Burgin. The plaudits of his hearers must have rewarded him for a not too grateful task. The concert closed with a nitid performance of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the orchestral arrangement made by Maurice Ravel for Mr. Koussevitzky.

L. A. S.

106

Blending the Pleasures of The Afternoon

TRANS. MAR 2 '29

Mr. Burgin and A Concerto, Mursorgsky Plus Ravel, Fredericus Magnus

THE EVENTS of the day began when the Symphony Concert was well in progress. The prelude to them was the appearance of Mr. Burgin, hitherto absent from the stage, to play the solo-part in Sibelius's Concerto for Violin. Modestly enough, with Mr. Koussevitzky behind him, he came from the ante-room. No sooner had they gained the edge of the platform than clapping crackled from every quarter of the hall. The conductor gave the concert-master the friendly shove that is his habit with soloists; smote his own hands together. The orchestra, for its part, swelled the tumult. More than one illustrissimo of music, come oversea, might have envied such hearty, honest greeting. Not for nothing is Mr. Burgin sitting for a ninth year in the first chair of the Symphony Orchestra. When he joined it in 1920, his mettle was unmistakable. Season after season he has bettered and enlarged it until he is now not only concert-master but, at need, assistant-conductor. The public has followed this progress with every sign of interest and good will. For full cause it renewed the plaudits at each pause in the Concerto; at the end redoubled them.

At every turn, moreover, orchestra and conductor added their own—and there is no reward to be cherished above the sympathy and approval of the fellow-craftsmen who, year in and year out, have been companions in the day's work. They know their comrade's shortcomings; yet they praise him. They suspect his pains, however reticently he may hide them, and now would tell him as much. Mr. Burgin's cup was, indeed, full and running over. Under his usual self-possession he was "visibly affected." The cynics were quick to say that after such emotional disturbance, the Concerto was sure to go badly. On the contrary, rarely has Mr. Burgin, as soloist, played so well. He is in his thirty-seventh year. There is reason to believe that his is a musical nature and a musical talent ripening late.

The Concerto of Sibelius, unheard through seventeen years at these concerts, does not spare exaction. The purists in such things affirm it a "genuine" Concerto, not a symphonic piece with a conspicuous violin-part. The solo-instrument does prodigious feats of virtuosity, as in the unaccompanied measures of the first movement; or else subtilizes them, as in the figuration of the second. More than once Sibelius bids it develop a motiv, by the orchestra unassisted. Repeatedly it sharpens the rhythm that is life to the finale. Throughout, it is distinctive and penetrating voice. Time and again, however, the Concerto as symphonic music—and symphonic music by Sibelius—prevails. There recurs the darkling underbody through or above which the solo instrument and its melody thread and gleam. Or the wind instruments are speaking from the composer's lips, and coloring with his imagination. Or he whips about in the restless seeking, the rhapsodic ardors, of the first division; releases in the second a melody never quite certain whether it is to be middle-gray or sunlit; hammers and drives through the insistent rhythms of the finale. The spare workmanship etches in the violin-part. The harmonic and instrumental colors pierce rather than warm.

The Concerto is a quarter of a century old. It antedates by two years the Third Symphony which at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands was event of four months back. Here is Sibelius already individualized, but still feverish in the play of those qualities that in recent years have sounded from him as proud possession. (Recall the Sixth Symphony which surely the conductor should play again). Firmly Sibelius is asking the violinist to take him at his word, assuming his voice, assimilating and intensifying his moods. Mr. Burgin met his every exaction with the expected resource, with an unexpected range and force of imagination. At least two thousand Bostonian heads shook doubtfully when Dr. Muck and Mme. Powell introduced Sibelius's Concerto. Twenty years later, such a performance as Mr. Burgin's and Mr. Koussevitzky's makes it an occasion.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is the sole repository of Mr. Stokowski's transcriptions from Bach. Ravel's orchestral version of Musorgsky's piano-pieces, "Pictures at An Exhibition," may be heard only at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra or at the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris. Mr. Stokowski set himself the task; Mr. Koussevitzky readily persuaded Ravel. As such things go, all are celebrated transcriptions. Yet to each conductor his rights and privileges, especially when, as with "The Pictures," he exercises them in steadily ripening performance. In every alternate season, so far, Mr. Koussevitzky has played Ravel's arrangement, each time with more adroit or eloquent adjustment of sonorities, more graphic color and characterizing rhythm. A veritable tonal panorama passes before the casual ear—the Introduction ("Promenade") sounding with memories as well as with the uncertain steps of the wanderer from sketch to sketch; the hippity-hop of the rhythmed Gnome; the heavy rolling rhythm of "Bydlo" under the mellow folk-song; the fawning and the domineering Jew each in tones characterized, then set in high and comic relief; the grave periods of "The Catacombs" as though Musorgsky were writing a memorial music to his dead friend; the flying Witch for weirdness; the upswelling clangors in the finale of the Great Gate and of old and holy Russia. (Ravel, orchestrating, has outdone even the climax of his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë.") For pleasure received and imagination kindled, an audience, as it did yesterday, may well clap hands.

Each repetition, indeed, suggests the notion—which may or may not prove valid—that Ravel's version of Musorgsky's pieces is a milestone on the course of music. The listener need not forget Strauss's Eulenspiegel or Don Quixote or this and that figure in the Wagnerian gallery to wonder whether graphic characterization in tones may farther go. And the two Richards' stores, out of their subject-matter and out of the musical matter within themselves, seem vast beside the slender pages from which Ravel worked. He gives the Introduction and, possibly, the episode of "The Catacombs" the deeper suggestion of a memorial music to the dead artist. It is only hint in Musorgsky. Elsewhere the Russian seeks graphic characterization in the gesture (as it were) of his rhythms, in the psysiognomy of his melodies. He is vivid indeed, vivid above most composers; but seldom in the piano-pieces does he pass beyond black and white. Out of inexhaustible resource, long-practised skill, sympathetic imagination, Ravel adds the indispensable color; enriches and enforces the Russian's sonorities.

The intent of the "Picture" is to characterize a personage—and the contrast of the two Jews is keen upon our ears and our comic sense. Similarly with The Gnome. Again, an action is to be denoted. After Ravel has plied his hand, the illusion is unescapable of the children at play or of the chickens' ballet, pitty-patting in their shells. Again it is a scene to be charactered as, in "Bydlo," the heavy Polish cart of singing folk rumbles across the plain; or a picture to be evoked and defined as when the gate of Kiev, and old Russia passing through it, rise from our ears to our eyes. Eliminate the suggestion of the dead artist who was Musorgsky's friend—and that suggestion may be no more than listener's chance impression—and there remains a music that would be graphic characterization and nothing else. Now that Ravel has added color and sonority, altogether it fulfills that end. It is within reason to wonder whether such music can be more vivid, illusory and complete.

The first number of the afternoon may pass for the hors d'œuvres that becomingly begin any feast. In this democratic land, which of us would not hear with curiosity the Symphony of a great king who was also schooled and practised musician; after his manner connoisseur and critic withal? The news of the world without does sometimes penetrate this self centered town and is welcome. Surely, one item is this rediscovered Symphony of Frederick the Great. The Symphony Concerts, moreover, as distributors of music, have many functions to discharge. One, for certain, is, at discreet intervals, to be amusing—the French have the more meaningful word, which is "amusant" And amusing this Symphony of Fredericus Magnus unmistakably was. Not for a moment is there reason to believe that his music-master revised it. Far too many are the amateurish jointures and transitions.

Yet the piece shows merit. There are quick movements from "the masters," and especially the semi-masters, of Frederick's time, that have less of the pleasant liveliness surviving to this day in his Allegros. The first, at least, is more diversified than stencilled; is almost "composed through," as the connoisseurs of Sans Souci doubtless remarked. True, the middle duet for two flutes against a faint background of violins, is melodically repetitious. But which of us again, being prince or subject, does not hear gladly the sound of his own voice, discoursing about a pet avocation? Besides, Mr. Laurent was one of the flutists, and it is permissible to believe that he is as rare a virtuoso as was even the monarch's Quantz. "Altesse, votre serviteur," we were all saying to ourselves as we clapped hands for a sovereign.

It is the fate of every conductor—in honor bound to seek out new composers and their work—sometimes to over-persuade himself and to discover in the end that he has drawn a blank. Mr. Koussevitzky, being more diligent than most in such questing, is usually more fortunate. As it proved yesterday, the "Spiritual Symphony," the "Alleluia" Symphony, of Monsieur Jacques Janin is not one of the happier discoveries. The musical ideas hardly lay hold upon the listener; the treatment and progress scarcely absorb him; the imaginative and emotional scheme provokes no response, being too vast for his or the composer's limited imagination. Agree, as good father Boniface urges in Massenet's "Jongleur," that we are each entitled to praise God in his own way. Yet the best that can be said of Monsieur Janin and his Symphony is that he lauds his Maker with a liveliness of heart all at odds with Anglo-Saxon sanctimoniousness; that he is eclectic in the choice of his means; that he uses the organ abundantly, at which instrument Mr. Snow did him much good service. Seldom has Mr. Koussevitzky conducted more strenuously, as one who would conjure into tonal being that which is non-existent upon the manuscript page. Possibly, he too had doubts.

H. T. P.

Reporting Progress

The Guarantee Fund of the Symphony Orchestra Rises by $10,000

WITHIN a week the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra, to meet the operating expenses of the current year, has risen by $10,000 and the middle leaves of the program-book swarmed yesterday with the list of new subscribers. Evidently the public of the concerts—and outside them—is bestirring itself; while the response is as widespread as the Trustees desired. But this happy issue is only a beginning. Though the fund now nears $84,600, another $50,000 must be added if the Orchestra is to be secure, unhampered by the community sustained.

Mar 5

SEVERAL HAVE HEARD OF HIM

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Were that estimable figure of the eldest musical generation, Mr. Clayton Johns, more familiar with the youngest and were his interests less bounded by the Bostonian horizon, he would hardly have provoked a half-smile by his inquiry in your columns: "Who has ever heard of Dukelsky"? A few years ago as a Russian emigré by way of Siberia and America, Mr. Dukelsky was not quite unnoticed in New York. In London he went to and fro amongst what Mr. Johns's time called "musical people," working also—since we all must live—for the theater.

In Paris, where he settled, Mr. Dukelsky is best known as one of the younger composers who contribute to Diaghiley's Russian Ballet, while his symphonic and his chamber-music has been played at Mr. Koussevitzky's and other concerts. There he also profits by the mysterious renown of a certain Concerto for piano. Indeed, in the "musical society" of that capital he is a frequent and established figure. Nor in Florence, a residence that he happens to prefer for work, is he altogether unknown. If I am not mistaken, he is now revisiting New York where old and new acquaintances welcome him. Nor did his impending Symphony pass unheeded in Paris last spring. He may even alight in Boston to hear it.

Boston, March 4. H. T. P.

GLOBE

Returning from their fourth visit to New York, which will occupy next week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony Hall on March 12th, and the 19th regular pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 15 and 16. The orchestra's Spring pension fund concert will take place Sunday afternoon, March 24, when Serge Koussevitsky will present an all Wagner program.

A pair of Young People's Concerts will be given on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, March 19 and 20, when Serge Koussevitsky and Richard Burgin will conduct. A group of floor seats will be reserved for general public sale, and the remainder will be distributed through the schools.

At the 19th regular pair of concerts (March 15 and 16) the soloist will be Jascha Heifetz, who has not appeared with this orchestra for some years. He will play Brahms' Concerto in D minor. Serge Koussevitsky will introduce to America a symphony by Dukelsky, the young Russian composer, and will also present Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto in D, as arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; also Berlioz' "Roman Carnival Overture."

The program for the Tuesday afternoon series (March 12) will consist of the following masterpieces of the romantic era: Berlioz' "Roman Carnival Overture," Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," and the first Symphony of Schumann.

MAR 8 '29

TRANS. MAR. 4 Mus

Concerts of A Week-End Many-Voiced

Conductors and Concertos, Miss Hess New-Framed, The Perfect Haydn

THERE ARE conductors who entrust to assistants the orchestral part of Concertos; others who lead in them as so much routine, or at most obligation, to be got through in the easiest way; a few more who, whatever the composer's intent, let the soloist swim as best he may through the running tides of "their" symphonic piece. Mr. Koussevitzky falls into none of these categories; nor, as Dr. Muck used to do, does he reserve his pains for an eminent soloist—say Mr. Kreisler in Beethoven's Concerto—and let lesser talents and lesser pieces fare as chance may send. The first and the second movement of Sibelius's Violin-Concerto contains many consecutive pages on which the solo-instrument is silent. The music becomes altogether symphonic, and as such on Saturday evening Mr. Koussevitzky played it with his usual insight into Sibelius, his habitual ability to make him sound in characteristic voice. When, however, Mr. Burgin's solo-violin entered, he relaxed his care not a whit. With assiduous ear and hand, he smoothed euphonies or sharpened contrasts; adjusted the symphonic background to the predominant solo-instrument; blended his own and the soloist's conception of the Concerto until they sounded as from one mind and one temperament. Mr. Koussevitzky is a conductor loyal to his players. Upon Mr. Heifetz in Brahms's Concerto a fortnight hence, he will spend no more, and no less, pains, than he did upon Mr. Burgin and Sibelius. All of which is his rule and custom. Through his five seasons in Boston, as now they nearly are, with no Concerto and with no virtuoso has he been indifferent. Rather, out of the reciprocal zeal of conductor and virtuoso the music has sounded in renewed life and being.

The audience of Saturday took its pleasure much as had the audience of Friday. It found the little Symphony of Frederick the Great an agreeable bonne bouche; was warm to Mr. Burgin as present soloist and long-established Concert-master; sat possessed before a performance of "Pictures at An Exhibition," in which there was equal reason to applaud the manifold resource of Ravel as orchestrator, the manifold eloquence of the conductor as interpreter, the manifold range of the orchestra as instrument. Through the corridors went the news that next autumn this celebrated transcription will be published. Mr. Stokowski and other eminent conductors, it appears, crave it. As for the "Symphonie Spirituelle" of Monsieur Janin, once more it passed. While the superior reproached the conductor with the choice of such a piece, the few whose daily work it is to deal with contributed articles, in words or tones, knew how easy it is to over-persuade one's self as to their merit.

Incidents and Prospects

Unlike some musicians, Mr. Koussevitzky lives in no world apart. On Wednesday next, two days after the inauguration of President Hoover, the Symphony Orchestra will play in Washington, the capital city of these United States. The chief item upon the conductor's program is Mr. Bloch's "America." . . . For Baltimore, he has listed three Symphonies—Frederick the Great's; Sibelius's Third; Chaikovsky's Fifth. For New York, the programs assemble Mr. Foote's Suite for Strings—deserved compliment to piece and composer; Sibelius's Third Symphony; Frederick the Great's Symphony; Strauss's "Zarathustra" and, at both concerts, Ravel's orchestral version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at An Exhibition."

TRANS N. Y. J.
MAR 11

Incidents and Prospects

Having heard Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in Mr. Foote's Suite for Strings, Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Ravel's version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the reviewers in New York wrote warmly of its present quality. Said The Sun: "The Bostonians gave a mighty performance of 'Zarathustra.' This was the Boston Symphony of old, splendid in tone and confident in technic. Mr. Koussevitzky was not betrayed into incontinence in his reading. It had all the sensuous quality of the music, but it lost no jot of breadth or weight." Said The Evening Post: "Ravel's 'Pictures' were most adroitly played, and seldom has the brass of the Boston band sounded so rich and buoyant, so completely a match for the singing splendor of the strings." "Magnificent" was The Tribune's adjective for the performance of "Zarathustra."

106

Blending the Pleasures of The Afternoon

TRANS. MAR 2 '29

Mr. Burgin and A Concerto, Mursorgsky Plus Ravel, Fredericus Magnus

THE EVENTS of the day began when the Symphony Concert was well in progress. The prelude to them was the appearance of Mr. Burgin, hitherto absent from the stage, to play the solo-part in Sibelius's Concerto for Violin. Modestly enough, with Mr. Koussevitzky behind him, he came from the ante-room. No sooner had they gained the edge of the platform than clapping crackled from every quarter of the hall. The conductor gave the concert-master the friendly shove that is his habit with soloists; smote his own hands together. The orchestra, for its part, swelled the tumult. More than one illustrissimo of music, come oversea, might have envied such hearty, honest greeting. Not for nothing is Mr. Burgin sitting for a ninth year in the first chair of the Symphony Orchestra. When he joined it in 1920, his mettle was unmistakable. Season after season he has bettered and enlarged it until he is now not only concert-master but, at need, assistant-conductor. The public has followed this progress with every sign of interest and good will. For full cause it renewed the plaudits at each pause in the Concerto; at the end redoubled them.

At every turn, moreover, orchestra and conductor added their own—and there is no reward to be cherished above the sympathy and approval of the fellow-craftsmen who, year in and year out, have been companions in the day's work. They know their comrade's shortcomings; yet they praise him. They suspect his pains, however reticently he may hide them, and now would tell him as much. Mr. Burgin's cup was, indeed, full and running over. Under his usual self-possession he was "visibly affected." The cynics were quick to say that after such emotional disturbance, the Concerto was sure to go badly. On the contrary, rarely has Mr. Burgin, as soloist, played so well. He is in his thirty-seventh year. There is reason to believe that his is a musical nature and a musical talent ripening late.

The Concerto of Sibelius, unheard through seventeen years at these concerts, does not spare exaction. The purists in such things affirm it a "genuine" Concerto, not a symphonic piece with a conspicuous violin-part. The solo-instrument does prodigious feats of virtuosity, as in the unaccompanied measures of the first movement; or else subtilizes them, as in the figuration of the second. More than once Sibelius bids it develop a motiv, by the orchestra unassisted. Repeatedly it sharpens the rhythm that is life to the finale. Throughout, it is distinctive and penetrating voice. Time and again, however, the Concerto as symphonic music—and symphonic music by Sibelius—prevails. There recurs the darkling underbody through or above which the solo instrument and its melody thread and gleam. Or the wind instruments are speaking from the composer's lips, and coloring with his imagination. Or he whips about in the restless seeking, the rhapsodic ardors, of the first division; releases in the second a melody never quite certain whether it is to be middle-gray or sunlit; hammers and drives through the insistent rhythms of the finale. The spare workmanship etches in the violin-part. The harmonic and instrumental colors pierce rather than warm.

The Concerto is a quarter of a century old. It antedates by two years the Third Symphony which at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands was event of four months back. Here is Sibelius already individualized, but still feverish in the play of those qualities that in recent years have sounded from him as proud possession. (Recall the Sixth Symphony which surely the conductor should play again). Firmly Sibelius is asking the violinist to take him at his word, assuming his voice, assimilating and intensifying his moods. Mr. Burgin met his every exaction with the expected resource, with an unexpected range and force of imagination. At least two thousand Bostonian heads shook doubtfully when Dr. Muck and Mme. Powell introduced Sibelius's Concerto. Twenty years later, such a performance as Mr. Burgin's and Mr. Koussevitzky's makes it an occasion.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is the sole repository of Mr. Stokowski's transcriptions from Bach. Ravel's orchestral version of Musorgsky's piano-pieces, "Pictures at An Exhibition," may be heard only at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra or at the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris. Mr. Stokowski set himself the task; Mr. Koussevitzky readily persuaded Ravel. As such things go, all are celebrated transcriptions. Yet to each conductor his rights and privileges, especially when, as with "The Pictures," he exercises them in steadily ripening performance. In every alternate season, so far, Mr. Koussevitzky has played Ravel's arrangement, each time with more adroit or eloquent adjustment of sonorities, more graphic color and characterizing rhythm. A veritable tonal panorama passes before the casual ear—the Introduction ("Promenade") sounding with memories as well as with the uncertain steps of the wanderer from sketch to sketch; the hippity-hop of the rhythmed Gnome; the heavy rolling rhythm of "Bydlo" under the mellow folk-song; the fawning and the domineering Jew each in tones characteered, then set in rich and comic relief; the grave periods of "The Catacombs" as though Musorgsky were writing a memorial music to his dead friend; the flying Witch for weirdness; the upswelling clangors in the finale of the Great Gate and of old and holy Russia. (Ravel, orchestrating, has outdone even the climax of his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloé.") For pleasure received and imagination kindled, an audience, as it did yesterday, may well clap hands.

Each repetition, indeed, suggests the notion—which may or may not prove valid—that Ravel's version of Musorgsky's pieces is a milestone on the course of music. The listener need not forget Strauss's Eulenspiegel or Don Quixote or this and that figure in the Wagnerian gallery to wonder whether graphic characterization in tones may farther go. And the two Richards' stores, out of their subject-matter and out of the musical matter within themselves, seem vast beside the slender pages from which Ravel worked. He gives the Introduction and, possibly, the episode of "The Catacombs" the deeper suggestion of a memorial music to the dead artist. It is only hint in Musorgsky. Elsewhere the Russian seeks graphic characterization in the gesture (as it were) of his rhythms, in the psysiognomy of his melodies. He is vivid indeed, vivid above most composers; but seldom in the piano-pieces does he pass beyond black and white. Out of inexhaustible resource, long-practised skill, sympathetic imagination, Ravel adds the indispensable color; enriches and enforces the Russian's sonorities.

The intent of the "Picture" is to characterize a personage—and the contrast of the two Jews is keen upon our ears and our comic sense. Similarly with The Gnome. Again, an action is to be denoted. After Ravel has plied his hand, the illusion is unescapable of the children at play or of the chickens' ballet, pitty-patting in their shells. Again it is a scene to be charactered as, in "Bydlo," the heavy Polish cart of singing folk rumbles across the plain; or a picture to be evoked and defined as when the gate of Kiev, and old Russia passing through it, rise from our ears to our eyes. Eliminate the suggestion of the dead artist who was Musorgsky's friend—and that suggestion may be no more than listener's chance impression—and there remains a music that would be graphic characterization and nothing else. Now that Ravel has added color and sonority, altogether it fulfills that end. It is within reason to wonder whether such music can be more vivid, illusory and complete.

The first number of the afternoon may pass for the hors d'œuvres that becomingly begin any feast. In this democratic land, which of us would not hear with curiosity the Symphony of a great king who was also schooled and practised musician; after his manner connoisseur and critic withal? The news of the world without does sometimes penetrate this self centered town and is welcome. Surely, one item is this rediscovered Symphony of Frederick the Great. The Symphony Concerts, moreover, as distributors of music, have many functions to discharge. One, for certain, is, at discreet intervals, to be amusing—the French have the more meaningful word, which is "amusant" And amusing this Symphony of Fredericus Magnus unmistakably was. Not for a moment is there reason to believe that his music-master revised it. Far too many are the amateurish jointures and transitions.

Yet the piece shows merit. There are quick movements from "the masters," and especially the semi-masters, of Frederick's time, that have less of the pleasant liveliness surviving to this day in his Allegros. The first, at least, is more diversified than stencilled; is almost "composed through," as the connoisseurs of Sans Souci doubtless remarked. True, the middle duet for two flutes against a faint background of violins, is melodically repetitious. But which of us again, being prince or subject, does not hear gladly the sound of his own voice, discoursing about a pet avocation? Besides, Mr. Laurent was one of the flutists, and it is permissible to believe that he is as rare a virtuoso as was even the monarch's Quantz. "Altesse, votre serviteur," we were all saying to ourselves as we clapped hands for a sovereign.

It is the fate of every conductor—in honor bound to seek out new composers and their work—sometimes to over-persuade himself and to discover in the end that he has drawn a blank. Mr. Koussevitzky, being more diligent than most in such questing, is usually more fortunate. As it proved yesterday, the "Spiritual Symphony," the "Alleluia" Symphony, of Monsieur Jacques Janin is not one of the happier discoveries. The musical ideas hardly lay hold upon the listener; the treatment and progress scarcely absorb him; the imaginative and emotional scheme provokes no response, being too vast for his or the composer's limited imagination. Agree, as good father Boniface urges in Massenet's "Jongleur," that we are each entitled to praise God in his own way. Yet the best that can be said of Monsieur Janin and his Symphony is that he lauds his Maker with a liveliness of heart all at odds with Anglo-Saxon sanctimoniousness; that he is eclectic in the choice of his means; that he uses the organ abundantly, at which instrument Mr. Snow did him much good service. Seldom has Mr. Koussevitzky conducted more strenuously, as one who would conjure into tonal being that which is non-existent upon the manuscript page. Possibly, he too had doubts.

H. T. P.

Reporting Progress

The Guarantee Fund of the Symphony Orchestra Rises by $10,000

WITHIN a week the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra, to meet the operating expenses of the current year, has risen by $10,000 and the middle leaves of the program-book swarmed yesterday with the list of new subscribers. Evidently the public of the concerts—and outside them—is bestirring itself; while the response is as widespread as the Trustees desired. But this happy issue is only a beginning. Though the fund now nears $84,600, another $50,000 must be added if the Orchestra is to be secure, unhampered by the community sustained.

Mar 5

SEVERAL HAVE HEARD OF HIM

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Were that estimable figure of the eldest musical generation, Mr. Clayton Johns, more familiar with the youngest and were his interests less bounded by the Bostonian horizon, he would hardly have provoked a half-smile by his inquiry in your columns: "Who has ever heard of Dukelsky"? A few years ago as a Russian emigré by way of Siberia and America, Mr. Dukelsky was not quite unnoticed in New York. In London he went to and fro amongst what Mr. Johns's time called "musical people," working also—since we all must live—for the theater.

In Paris, where he settled, Mr. Dukelsky is best known as one of the younger composers who contribute to Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, while his symphonic and his chamber-music has been played at Mr. Koussevitzky's and other concerts. There he also profits by the mysterious renown of a certain Concerto for piano. Indeed, in the "musical society" of that capital he is a frequent and established figure. Nor in Florence, a residence that he happens to prefer for work, is he altogether unknown. If I am not mistaken, he is now revisiting New York where old and new acquaintances welcome him. Nor did his impending Symphony pass unheeded in Paris last spring. He may even alight in Boston to hear it.

Boston, March 4. H. T. P.

GLOBE

Returning from their fourth visit to New York, which will occupy next week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony Hall on March 12th, and the 19th regular pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 15 and 16. The orchestra's Spring pension fund concert will take place Sunday afternoon, March 24, when Serge Koussevitsky will present an all Wagner program.

A pair of Young People's Concerts will be given on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, March 19 and 20, when Serge Koussevitsky and Richard Burgin will conduct. A group of floor seats will be reserved for general public sale, and the remainder will be distributed through the schools.

At the 19th regular pair of concerts (March 15 and 16) the soloist will be Jascha Heifetz, who has not appeared with this orchestra for some years. He will play Brahms' Concerto in D minor. Serge Koussevitsky will introduce to America a symphony by Dukelsky, the young Russian composer, and will also present Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto in D, as arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; also Berlioz' "Roman Carnival Overture."

The program for the Tuesday afternoon series (March 12) will consist of the following masterpieces of the romantic era: Berlioz' "Roman Carnival Overture," Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," and the first Symphony of Schumann.

MAR 3 '29

TRANS. MAR. 4 Mus

Concerts of A Week-End Many-Voiced

Conductors and Concertos, Miss Hess New-Framed, The Perfect Haydn

THERE ARE conductors who entrust to assistants the orchestral part of Concertos; others who lead in them as so much routine, or at most obligation, to be got through in the easiest way; a few more who, whatever the composer's intent, let the soloist swim as best he may through the running tides of "their" symphonic piece. Mr. Koussevitzky falls into none of these categories; nor, as Dr. Muck used to do, does he reserve his pains for an eminent soloist—say Mr. Kreisler in Beethoven's Concerto—and let lesser talents and lesser pieces fare as chance may send. The first and the second movement of Sibelius's Violin-Concerto contains many consecutive pages on which the solo-instrument is silent. The music becomes altogether symphonic, and as such on Saturday evening Mr. Koussevitzky played it with his usual insight into Sibelius, his habitual ability to make him sound in characteristic voice. When, however, Mr. Burgin's solo-violin entered, he relaxed his care not a whit. With assiduous ear and hand, he smoothed euphonies or sharpened contrasts; adjusted the symphonic background to the predominant solo-instrument; blended his own and the soloist's conception of the Concerto until they sounded as from one mind and one temperament. Mr. Koussevitzky is a conductor loyal to his players. Upon Mr. Heifetz in Brahms's Concerto a fortnight hence, he will spend no more, and no less, pains, than he did upon Mr. Burgin and Sibelius. All of which is his rule and custom. Through his five seasons in Boston, as now they nearly are, with no Concerto and with no virtuoso has he been indifferent. Rather, out of the reciprocal zeal of conductor and virtuoso the music has sounded in renewed life and being.

The audience of Saturday took its pleasure much as had the audience of Friday. It found the little Symphony of Frederick the Great an agreeable bonne bouche; was warm to Mr. Burgin as present soloist and long-established Concert-master; sat possessed before a performance of "Pictures at An Exhibition," in which there was equal reason to applaud the manifold resource of Ravel as orchestrator, the manifold eloquence of the conductor as interpreter, the manifold range of the orchestra as instrument. Through the corridors went the news that next autumn this celebrated transcription will be published. Mr. Stokowski and other eminent conductors, it appears, crave it. As for the Janin, once more it passed. While the superior reproached the conductor with the choice of such a piece, the few whose daily work it is to deal with contributed articles, in words or tones, knew how easy it is to over-persuade one's self as to their merit.

Incidents and Prospects

Unlike some musicians, Mr. Koussevitzky lives in no world apart. On Wednesday next, two days after the inauguration of President Hoover, the Symphony Orchestra will play in Washington, the capital city of these United States. The chief item upon the conductor's program is Mr. Bloch's "America." . . . For Baltimore, he has listed three Symphonies—Frederick the Great's; Sibelius's Third; Chaikovsky's Fifth. For New York, the programs assemble Mr. Foote's Suite for Strings—deserved compliment to piece and composer; Sibelius's Third Symphony; Frederick the Great's Symphony; Strauss's "Zarathustra" and, at both concerts, Ravel's orchestral version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at An Exhibition."

TRANS MAR 11

Incidents and Prospects

Having heard Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in Mr. Foote's Suite for Strings, Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Ravel's version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the reviewers in New York wrote warmly of its present quality. Said The Sun: "The Bostonians gave a mighty performance of 'Zarathustra.' This was the Boston Symphony of old, splendid in tone and confident in technic. Mr. Koussevitzky was not betrayed into incontinence in his reading. It had all the sensuous quality of the music, but it lost no jot of breadth or weight." Said The Evening Post: "Ravel's 'Pictures' were most adroitly played, and seldom has the brass of the Boston band sounded so rich and buoyant, so completely a match for the singing splendor of the strings." "Magnificent" was The Tribune's adjective for the performance of "Zarathustra."

"Worth Knowing"

Well-Turned Praise from New York for "A. Foote of Boston"

REVIEWING the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York last Thursday, Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun:

It was good to hear Arthur Foote's Suite once more. To be sure, no one can write a Pizzicato without recalling the symphonic one of Chaikovsky, but Mr. Foote's stands pretty firmly on its own feet. The fugue is about as exhilarating a piece of canonic writing as one could expect to hear from any composer not of the authoritative classic school. It is one of the gems of American music and ought to be studied by every young composer who wishes to see how scholarship can be made to serve the purposes of romanticism. The whole Suite was brilliantly played, but the audience seemed to be in doubt as to how it ought to react to the name of one A. Foote of

Henschel at Eighty

He May Yet Share in The Jubilee of the Boston Orchestra of Which He Was First Conductor

THE TRUSTEES of the Symphony Orchestra are hopeful that when it celebrates a fiftieth season two years hence, Sir George Henschel may come from London to be their guest. He was conductor at its first concert in the autumn of 1881. In the spring of 1931, he might even lead it through one number from his first program. The hope and the prospect are not so vain as some may fancy. Read, for proof, this paragraph from the London Daily Telegraph about Sir George's present liveliness:

It has been written in various places in the last few days that Sir George Henschel shows no outward and visible sign of having reached the beginning of his eightieth year. Outward certainly not; inward also certainly not. It is not more than a few weeks ago that he walked several miles to visit me, and incidently walked back, his gait as light as that of a thirty-year-old. During our ten-table talk, this octogenarian related a yarn of an Aberdonian who had sent to a lady a Christmas greeting, wishing her the joys of Christmas in 1928, 1929 and 1930—these dates all printed upon one card, the cost of the greeting for three years being thus compounded! Nothing the matter with the octogenarian mind that is, so to speak, so lighthearted.

Letters to the Editor

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Thinking again of the Symphony Concert programs, I can't help feeling that Mr. H. T. P. did not see the point of my argument. My plea was for good standard music, not for "try it ons."

For more than forty years there was a time-honored custom. Saturday night was a sacred rite. Now, on account of increased demands, concerts are given on Mondays and Tuesdays, in addition to those given on Saturdays.

On Mondays and Tuesdays, the programs are strictly classical. On Saturdays, there is usually some sort of a symphony or a suite, or some ballet music. The rest of the program is filled up with "try it ons," many of which don't fit.

Why not make everybody and every concert happy, Saturday, Monday and Tuesday, by having two-thirds of each program devoted to distinguished music and the other third devoted to "try it ons" or to well worn gowns which everybody likes to wear.

Quoting from the Transcript's letter of March 6, written by Mr. John Ritchie—bless his heart!—Mr. Ritchie says: "We are in an age of new art and in pictures, I have been told that they occasionally get hung upside down and no one knows the difference. In the gallery one may select the subject to view, but in the concert hall one must accept what the gods provide and muffle his mumblings."

Let me add that a young friend of mine, bitten with modernity, has his house filled with examples of the ultra-modern school. On one of his walls hangs a picture of Adam and Eve. No one can see any difference between Adam and Eve, or Eve and Adam.

CLAYTON JOHNS

Boston, March 10.

29

MU

A "ROMANTIC" PROGRAM . .

For yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Koussevitzky chose the "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat major.

These works are loosely described as belonging to the romantic school. There are romantic associations connected with them—the trials and tribulations of the flaming Berlioz in the composition and the production of his "Benvenuto Bellini" to which this overture belongs—Berlioz, whose genius is still doubted by those who cannot find "melody" in his works and complain of his harmonic schemes as they appear on paper but suit his thought and invention and sound eloquently when they are played—no wonder Moussorgsky called Beethoven the thinker and Berlioz, the super-thinker; Schubert with the romantic adventure in the finding of the "Unfinished" symphony long after his death; Schumann inspired by a poem, the thought of Spring and his Clara.

But these compositions might as well be called "classical." For what is a "classic" work? What a "romantic"? Has any one defined these words better than Stendhal?

"Romanticism" says Stendahl as quoted by Walter Pater, "is the art of presenting to people the literary works which, in the actual state of their habits and beliefs, are capable of giving them the greatest possible pleasure, classicism, on the contrary, of presenting them with that which gave the greatest possible pleasure to their grandfathers." What Stendhal said of literature may well be said of music. Romanticism in music did not come in with Hector Berlioz; it is to be found in music by Scarlatti, Couperin; in music by Handel, Bach, Mozart, Beethoven. For as Pater puts it, "the romantic spirit is, in reality, an ever-present, an enduring principle, in the artistic temperament; and the qualities of thought and style, which that and other similar uses of the word 'romantic' really indicate, are indeed but symptoms of a very continuous and widely working influence." Nor is classic music only that which is "old and accustomed." No, there is no hard and fixed line between music that is classic and music that is romantic. There is only music that is good or bad; music that is still fresh though it was written two centuries ago; music that is dull and boresome though it was composed last year.

Yesterday there was classically romantic music performed in the appropriately romantic manner: with classic purity of musical outline with romantic coloring-haunting euphony, dazzling brilliance demanded by Berlioz; the melancholy and tenderness peculiar to Schubert; the restless, impassioned energy and the dreaminess that were Schumann's own.

The next concert in the Tuesday series will take place on April 2.

G. S. M.

MORE ABOUT THE PROGRAMS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Ordinarily I would be content to leave the Symphony Program subject with no further comment, but in replying as if there had been an attack on Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. H. T. P. is really barking up a different tree from mine. A few more words may therefore be permissible.

In passing it is only fair to say that no one who has watched Mr. Koussevitzky as director of the orchestra can question his sincerity, devotion to his ideals, musical ability, successful handling of his men and intensive application to his work. His interpretations of what comes within my limited appreciation seem to me artistic, and in the main satisfactory.

Since we are really dealing with programs and not directors, we must revise our arithmetic. Experienced computers would at once question whether a piece demanding half or more of the program like Mahler's or "America," should not have a value in counting of two or three ordinary pieces, but just now I make no claim here, but I do insist that the programs of the guest conductors be counted. Of the concert of Arbos I have heard nothing but praise, "an admirable cross section of Spanish music." Honegger presented eight of his own compositions. The concertino was aided by the psychology of a charming pianiste, while the onomatopœic "Pacific 231" may be tolerated for its plainly imitative features.

There are therefore six Honeggers to add to the eighteen possible "departures from orthodox custom," twenty-four in all. And then there is Prokofieff, with the "Classical Symphony" to his credit and one of his customary numbers to balance it. In view of the revision of the arithmetic, I feel that it is still reasonable to ask for fewer of the less interesting modernists.

As for the "larger and deeper interest," I fully realize it, for have I not been repeatedly reminded of the need of contributions to reduce the growing deficit? The "satisfied customer" plays an important part in commerce; should it not hold good in art and music?

I agree perfectly with H. T. P. that youth is active and energetic, and will "work his head off" for his own ideals, but I notice that it is usually the older group that is invited in to help to pay the bills. The question of "taking flight to New York or Chicago" pertains not to music alone or art, or matters in which the young may take counsel from the old. It is a burning business question in a good many circles, the migration of literary centers to New York, cotton industries to the South and boots and shoes to the West, for example, and it is not to be avoided by giving youth its head, but is a sober and serious matter for the consideration of and action of practical business men.

JOHN RITCHIE

Malden, March 9.

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Schubert and Schumann on Third Tuesday Program

Mr Koussevitzky again put two symphonies on the program of the third Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony yesterday, Schubert's "Unfinished" and Schumann's First. The only other number was Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture, so the concert was unusually short. Although the programs of this series do not follow this year any historical scheme these numbers were seemingly chosen to represent the romantic movement in 19th century music.

An audience which filled the hall, as all Boston Symphony audiences, thanks to Mr Koussevitzky's immense popularity, now do, seemed greatly pleased with program and performance. It is the dramatic contrasts, the theatrical quality of romantic music which Mr Koussevitzky chiefly emphasises. He cares less, it would seem, for the kind of romanticism exemplified in Keats' lines about the "magic casements opening on the foam of perilous seas in faery lands forlorn," or in Wordsworth's line about "old unhappy far-off things" than he does for the glitter and stage thunder of which Byron was past master. The simplicity and sentiment of Schubert evade him But he excels in Schumann's moody music of Spring, and revels in the brilliance of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival." The only melancholy and languor he seems to feel intuitively is that to be found in Tschaikowsky.

Yesterday's performance was typical of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. The orchestra played eloquently, brilliantly, but not with perfect accuracy. Mr Koussevitzky does not insist on the drill master precision secured by such conductors as Muck and Toscanini. He, perhaps feels that absolute accuracy of detail could be won only at a sacrifice of emotional power. Yet those who have listened to Muck and Toscanini have seldom felt any lack of emotional power in their conducting.

One admired yesterday the skill with which the melodic line of Schumann's slow movement was revealed. Mr Koussevitzky did not begin his career by triumphing over the double bass' limitations for nothing. Anything that can be interpreted as a soulful piece for 'cello, or for the double bass as played by Koussevitzky, he always does well.

In the first movement of the Schumann one thought what a fine pianoforte concerto Schumann could have made by adding a piano solo part, so essentially pianistic are the melodies he used.

The next concert in this series will be given April 2.

P. R.

GLOBE WANTS
READ THEM TODAY

SYMPHONY IN ALL CLASSICS

Third of Tuesday Afternoon Series Given

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of the present series of Tuesday afternoon concerts. The "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz and two symphonies, Schubert's "Unfinished" and the First of Schumann, were the chosen pieces. Classics all, as is the custom at these Tuesday concerts.

Berlioz's Overture was heard for the first time this season, to be played again at the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is the second time during the current series that a Tuesday afternoon audience has had the pleasure of hearing a first performance of the year. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the familiar overture his usual sympathetic reading. Under his hand it was polished until it shone with dazzling brilliance.

Prevailingly in the past Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the "Unfinished" Symphony has suggested a dramatic tone-poem rather than a composition chiefly made up of flowing melody. Yesterday, however, the orchestra played the Symphony with consistent beauty of tone, with careful regard to smoothness and length of line.

Once more at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the Symphony of Schumann came into its own. It has remained for him to rejuvenate this senescent masterpiece, to reveal in it beauties unsuspected by the present generation. In response to the hearty applause which followed its performance Mr. Koussevitzky bade his orchestra rise in acknowledgement.

Concert-Chronicle

Classics Undefiled

ONE virtue of the more brittle music by contemporary composers which conservative listeners have overlooked in their plea for old-fashioned symphony programs is its usefulness as spicy contrast to solid and conventional matter. They may not like it when they hear it. But they may appreciate their Schumann, Brahms and Beethoven with all the more relish, albeit with knowing satisfaction on the superiority of established masters, if they have something entirely different with which to set them off. To put the contemporary composer in this secondary service is far from his just due; but the conservatives should consider the matter in this light before seeking to have programs all of standard numbers.

Whether the third concert in the Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday needed modern spice is matter for conjecture. Perhaps the weather was too spring-like for enthusiasm in the concert hall. Perhaps the orchestra had not recovered from its trip. Perhaps the Tuesday afternoon audience is not so devoted to a program all of the "classics" as it imagines itself to be. Most likely a combination of these circumstances obtained. Whatever the case, when the orchestra played Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Schumann's First Symphony, in B major, the applause was not remarkable. Before these two symphonies Mr. Koussevitzky proferred the fantastic contrast of Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival," in lieu of a contemporary compositon which would serve the same purpose. Strangely enough, Schubert's symphony, usually warmly received at these supplementary concerts, drew but scattered approval. The same may be said of Berlioz' overture.

"Roman Carnival," originally intended as the introduction to the second act of the composer's opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," has been a familiar, though not too familiar, repertory number with most orchestras. As students ,we understood that Berlioz loomed large in the history of music, a significant if erratic individuality and a master of orchestral technique. We have read his scores. We have studied his treatise on orchestration. Yet, with the exception of "Roman Carnival," seldom have we heard his less familiar compositions performed. In the same spirit of adventure and research, Mr. Koussevitzky would please many of us by performing some of this seldom-heard music of Berlioz. Yesterday he drew the overture together as a more coherent piece than it has seemed at previous hearings. The theme of the English horn was beautifully played; the melody expanded and moved smoothly to the violas; the saltarello measures acquired vitality and significance.

The orchestra is now almost too familiar with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. The performance moved slowly and reverently, but it wanted the interested and graceful delicacy which characterized previous performances. Mr. Koussevitzky softened the ensemble for the woodwind soloists who affectionately did their part. With Schumann's symphony, too, the conductor was less enthused than usual. But the impetuous close, was irresistible, and the orchestra rounded it off with enthusiasm. N. M. J.

Sibelius in New York

The third symphony of Jan Sibelius, Mr. Koussevitzly's second number [at the matinée of the Boston Orchestra in New York last Saturday] is a relatively unfamiliar one. If not the loftiest or the most individual of the Finnish giant's six works in this form it is replete with beauties that can ill be spared in these times of endless repetitions of the same standard works in alternation with puerile and transient novelties. Why our conductors have never taken Sibelius more to heart is difficult to understand. Do they believe that our audiences are bored? That of Saturday was amply applausive. Or is it possible that they think first of their own background, and become propagandists for their nationals, leaving the lonely Finn of Tavastehus without any persistent champion. This symphony is a warm and richly hued work, in no way justifying those terms of "bleak," "dour" and "somber" that quite possibly have done Sibelius much harm with audiences that hope to be excited and not depressed. In style, it is transitional, less unified, less personal perhaps than works which preceded and followed it. But its themes are strong and melodius, their treatment that of an artist of great capacity and deep sincerity. The symphony was superbly played, a marvel of clarity, balance and sumptuous tone. [Oscar Thompson in The Evening Post

The Sibelius symphony resembles his other orchestral work in that the melodic materials suggest the folk songs of the Finns and some of the rhythms that of the historic ballad of that people. It is a strong symphony, with the deep, brooding emotion which characterizes so much of Sibelius's art and the aggressive advances into broad expansions of its ideas. But it lacks firmness of joint in many places and it wants the relief of a burst of cheerfulness or at least of content. Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted it with compelling sympathy and the orchestra performed it with somber richness of tone. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Incidentally

Let Frederick the Great have his due. Also, give Mr. Koussevitzky the recognition of playing his music quite as beautifully as he might have played a symphony by Haydn or Mozart. . . . To conclude his program, Mr. Koussevitzky repeated his incandescent performance of Strauss's "Zarathustra." One needs to listen to such playing with caution, not to go over heart and soul, bag and baggage, to music that past experience has placed among the less inspired works of a supreme master of sonorities, a wizard who long since proved his ability to make commonplace material sound like the music of the spheres, given such a performance as this one to work his magic through. [The Evening Post een TRANS MAR 11-

"Worth Knowing"

Well-Turned Praise from New York for "A. Foote of Boston"

REVIEWING the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York last Thursday, Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun:

It was good to hear Arthur Foote's Suite once more. To be sure, no one can write a Pizzicato without recalling the symphonic one of Chaikovsky, but Mr. Foote's stands pretty firmly on its own feet. The fugue is about as exhilarating a piece of canonic writing as one could expect to hear from any composer not of the authoritative classic school. It is one of the gems of American music and ought to be studied by every young composer who wishes to see how scholarship can be made to serve the purposes of romanticism. The whole Suite was brilliantly played, but the audience seemed to be in doubt as to how it ought to react to the name of one A. Foote of Boston. Music-lovers who do not know Arthur Foote should look him up; he is worth knowing.

Herald Mar. 13 29

29

MU

A "ROMANTIC" PROGRAM . .

For yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Koussevitzky chose the "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat major.

These works are loosely described as belonging to the romantic school. There are romantic associations connected with them—the trials and tribulations of the flaming Berlioz in the composition and the production of his "Benvenuto Bellini" to which this overture belongs—Berlioz, whose genius is still doubted by those who cannot find "melody" in his works and complain of his harmonic schemes as they appear on paper but suit his thought and invention and sound eloquently when they are played—no wonder Moussorgsky called Beethoven the thinker and Berlioz, the super-thinker; Schubert with the romantic adventure in the finding of the "Unfinished" symphony long after his death; Schumann inspired by a poem, the thought of Spring and his Clara.

But these compositions might as well be called "classical." For what is a "classic" work? What a "romantic"? Has any one defined these words better than Stendhal?

"Romanticism" says Stendahl as quoted by Walter Pater, "is the art of presenting to people the literary works which, in the actual state of their habits and beliefs, are capable of giving them the greatest possible pleasure, classicism, on the contrary, of presenting them with that which gave the greatest possible pleasure to their grandfathers." What Stendhal said of literature may well be said of music. Romanticism in music did not come in with Hector Berlioz; it is to be found in music by Scarlatti, Couperin; in music by Handel, Bach, Mozart, Beethoven. For as Pater puts it, "the romantic spirit is, in reality, an ever-present, an enduring principle, in the artistic temperament; and the qualities of thought and style, which that and other similar uses of the word 'romantic' really indicate, are indeed but symptoms of a very continuous and widely working influence." Nor is classic music only that which is "old and accustomed." No, there is no hard and fixed line between music that is classic and music that is romantic. There is only music that is good or bad; music that is still fresh though it was written two centuries ago; music that is dull and boresome though it was composed last year.

Yesterday there was classically romantic music performed in the appropriately romantic manner: with classic purity of musical outline with romantic coloring-haunting euphony, dazzling brilliance demanded by Berlioz; the melancholy and tenderness peculiar to Schubert; the restless, impassioned energy and the dreaminess that were Schumann's own.

The next concert in the Tuesday series will take place on April 2.

G. S. M.

MORE ABOUT THE PROGRAMS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Ordinarily I would be content to leave the Symphony Program subject with no further comment, but in replying as if there had been an attack on Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. H. T. P. is really barking up a different tree from mine. A few more words may therefore be permissible.

In passing it is only fair to say that no one who has watched Mr. Koussevitzky as director of the orchestra can question his sincerity, devotion to his ideals, musical ability, successful handling of his men and intensive application to his work. His interpretations of what comes within my limited appreciation seem to me artistic, and in the main satisfactory.

Since we are really dealing with programs and not directors, we must revise our arithmetic. Experienced computers would at once question whether a piece demanding half or more of the program like Mahler's or "America," should not have a value in counting of two or three ordinary pieces, but just now I make no claim here, but I do insist that the programs of the guest conductors be counted. Of the concert of Arbos I have heard nothing but praise, "an admirable cross section of Spanish music." Honegger presented eight of his own compositions. The concertino was aided by the psychology of a charming pianiste, while the onomatopœic "Pacific 231" may be tolerated for its plainly imitative features.

There are therefore six Honeggers to add to the eighteen possible "departures from orthodox custom," twenty-four in all. And then there is Prokofieff, with the "Classical Symphony" to his credit and one of his customary numbers to balance it. In view of the revision of the arithmetic, I feel that it is still reasonable to ask for fewer of the less interesting modernists.

As for the "larger and deeper interest," I fully realize it, for have I not been repeatedly reminded of the need of contributions to reduce the growing deficit? The "satisfied customer" plays an important part in commerce; should it not hold good in art and music?

I agree perfectly with H. T. P. that youth is active and energetic, and will "work his head off" for his own ideals, but I notice that it is usually the older group that is invited in to help to pay the bills. The question of "taking flight to New York or Chicago" pertains not to music alone or art, or matters in which the young may take counsel from the old. It is a burning business question in a good many circles, the migration of literary centers to New York, cotton industries to the South and boots and shoes to the West, for example, and it is not to be avoided by giving youth its head, but is a sober and serious matter for the consideration of and action of practical business men.

JOHN RITCHIE

Malden, March 9.

SYMPHONY IN ALL CLASSICS

Third of Tuesday Afternoon Series Given

POST MAR 13

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of the present series of Tuesday afternoon concerts. The "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz and two symphonies, Schubert's "Unfinished" and the First of Schumann, were the chosen pieces. Classics all, as is the custom at these Tuesday concerts.

Berlioz's Overture was heard for the first time this season, to be played again at the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is the second time during the current series that a Tuesday afternoon audience has had the pleasure of hearing a first performance of the year. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the familiar overture his usual sympathetic reading. Under his hand it was polished until it shone with dazzling brilliance.

Prevailingly in the past Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the "Unfinished" Symphony has suggested a dramatic tone-poem rather than a composition chiefly made up of flowing melody. Yesterday, however, the orchestra played the Symphony with consistent beauty of tone, with careful regard to smoothness and length of line.

Once more at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands the Symphony of Schumann came into its own. It has remained for him to rejuvenate this senescent masterpiece, to reveal in it beauties unsuspected by the present generation. In response to the hearty applause which followed its performance Mr. Koussevitzky bade his orchestra rise in acknowledgement.

Concert-Chronicle TRANS MAR 13 1929

Classics Undefiled

ONE virtue of the more brittle music by contemporary composers which conservative listeners have overlooked in their plea for old-fashioned symphony programs is its usefulness as spicy contrast to solid and conventional matter. They may not like it when they hear it. But they may appreciate their Schumann, Brahms and Beethoven with all the more relish, albeit with knowing satisfaction on the superiority of established masters, if they have something entirely different with which to set them off. To put the contemporary composer in this secondary service is far from his just due; but the conservatives should consider the matter in this light before seeking to have programs all of standard numbers.

Whether the third concert in the Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday needed modern spice is matter for conjecture. Perhaps the weather was too spring-like for enthusiasm in the concert hall. Perhaps the orchestra had not recovered from its trip. Perhaps the Tuesday afternoon audience is not so devoted to a program all of the "classics" as it imagines itself to be. Most likely a combination of these circumstances obtained. Whatever the case, when the orchestra played Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Schumann's First Symphony, in B major, the applause was not remarkable. Before these two symphonies Mr. Koussevitzky proferred the fantastic contrast of Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival," in lieu of a contemporary compositon which would serve the same purpose. Strangely enough, Schubert's symphony, usually warmly received at these supplementary concerts, drew but scattered approval. The same may be said of Berlioz' overture.

"Roman Carnival," originally intended as the introduction to the second act of the composer's opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," has been a familiar, though not too familiar, repertory number with most orchestras. As students ,we understood that Berlioz loomed large in the history of music, a significant if erratic individuality and a master of orchestral technique. We have read his scores. We have studied his treatise on orchestration. Yet, with the exception of "Roman Carnival," seldom have we heard his less familiar compositions performed. In the same spirit of adventure and research, Mr. Koussevitzky would please many of us by performing some of this seldom-heard music of Berlioz. Yesterday he drew the overture together as a more coherent piece than it has seemed at previous hearings. The theme of the English horn was beautifully played; the melody expanded and moved smoothly to the violas; the saltarello measures acquired vitality and significance.

The orchestra is now almost too familiar with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. The performance moved slowly and reverently, but it wanted the interested and graceful delicacy which characterized previous performances. Mr. Koussevitzky softened the ensemble for the woodwind soloists who affectionately did their part. With Schumann's symphony, too, the conductor was less enthused than usual. But the impetuous close, was irresistible, and the orchestra rounded it off with enthusiasm. N. M. J.

Sibelius in New York

The third symphony of Jan Sibelius, Mr. Koussevitzly's second number [at the matinée of the Boston Orchestra in New York last Saturday] is a relatively unfamiliar one. If not the loftiest or the most individual of the Finnish giant's six works in this form it is replete with beauties that can ill be spared in these times of endless repetitions of the same standard works in alternation with puerile and transient novelties. Why our conductors have never taken Sibelius more to heart is difficult to understand. Do they believe that our audiences are bored? That of Saturday was amply applausive. Or is it possible that they think first of their own background, and become propagandists for their nationals, leaving the lonely Finn of Tavastehus without any persistent champion. This symphony is a warm and richly hued work, in no way justifying those terms of "bleak," "dour" and "somber" that quite possibly have done Sibelius much harm with audiences that hope to be excited and not depressed. In style, it is transitional, less unified, less personal perhaps than works which preceded and followed it. But its themes are strong and melodius, their treatment that of an artist of great capacity and deep sincerity. The symphony was superbly played, a marvel of clarity, balance and sumptuous tone. [Oscar Thompson in The Evening Post

The Sibelius symphony resembles his other orchestral work in that the melodic materials suggest the folk songs of the Finns and some of the rhythms that of the historic ballad of that people. It is a strong symphony, with the deep, brooding emotion which characterizes so much of Sibelius's art and the aggressive advances into broad expansions of its ideas. But it lacks firmness of joint in many places and it wants the relief of a burst of cheerfulness or at least of content. Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted it with compelling sympathy and the orchestra performed it with somber richness of tone. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Incidenfally

Let Frederick the Great have his due. Also, give Mr. Koussevitzky the recognition of playing his music quite as beautifully as he might have played a symphony by Haydn or Mozart. . . . To conclude his program, Mr. Koussevitzky repeated his incandescent performance of Strauss's "Zarathustra." One needs to listen to such playing with caution, not to go over heart and soul, bag and baggage, to music that past experience has placed among the less inspired works of a supreme master of sonorities, a wizard who long since proved his ability to make commonplace material sound like the music of the spheres, given such a performance as this one to work his magic through. [The Evening Post

Castles Down ... The Jubilee ... chestra of ... s First ... actor

THE TRUSTEES of the Symphony Orchestra are hopeful that when it celebrates a fiftieth season two years hence, Sir George Henschel may come from London to be their guest. He was conductor at its first concert in the autumn of 1881. In the spring of 1931, he might even lead it through one number from his first program. The hope and the prospect are not so vain as some may fancy. Read, for proof, this paragraph from the London Daily Telegraph about Sir George's present liveliness:

It has been written in various places in the last few days that Sir George Henschel shows no outward and visible sign of having reached the beginning of his eightieth year. Outward certainly not; inward also certainly not. It is not more than a few weeks ago that he walked several miles to visit me, and incidently walked back, his gait as light as that of a thirty-year-old. During our ten-table talk, this octogenarian related a yarn of an Aberdonian who had sent to a lady a Christmas greeting, wishing her the joys of Christmas in 1928, 1929 and 1930—these dates all printed upon one card, the cost of the greeting for three years being thus compounded! Nothing the matter with the octogenarian mind that is, so to speak, so lighthearted.

Letters to the Editor

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

Mar 12

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Thinking again of the Symphony Concert programs, I can't help feeling that Mr. H. T. P. did not see the point of my argument. My plea was for good standard music, not for "try it ons."

For more than forty years there was a time-honored custom. Saturday night was a sacred rite. Now, on account of increased demands, concerts are given on Mondays and Tuesdays, in addition to those given on Saturdays.

On Mondays and Tuesdays, the programs are strictly classical. On Saturdays, there is usually some sort of a symphony or a suite, or some ballet music. The rest of the program is filled up with "try it ons," many of which don't fit.

Why not make everybody and every concert happy, Saturday, Monday and Tuesday, by having two-thirds of each program devoted to distinguished music and the other third devoted to "try it ons" or to well worn gowns which everybody likes to wear.

Quoting from the Transcript's letter of March 6, written by Mr. John Ritchie—bless his heart!—Mr. Ritchie says: "We are in an age of new art and in pictures, I have been told that they occasionally get hung upside down and no one knows the difference. In the gallery one may select the subject to view, but in the concert hall one must accept what the gods provide and muffle his mumblings."

Let me add that a young friend of mine, bitten with modernity, has his house filled with examples of the ultra-modern school. On one of his walls hangs a picture of Adam and Eve. No one can see any difference between Adam and Eve, or Eve and Adam.

CLAYTON JOHNS

Boston, March 10.

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mar 13 29

Schubert and Schumann on Third Tuesday Program

Mr Koussevitzky again put two symphonies on the program of the third Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony yesterday, Schubert's "Unfinished" and Schumann's First. The only other number was Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture, so the concert was unusually short. Although the programs of this series do not follow this year any historical scheme these numbers were seemingly chosen to represent the romantic movement in 19th century music.

An audience which filled the hall, as all Boston Symphony audiences, thanks to Mr Koussevitzky's immense popularity, now do, seemed greatly pleased with program and performance. It is the dramatic contrasts, the theatrical quality of romantic music which Mr Koussevitzky chiefly emphasises. He cares less, it would seem, for the kind of romanticism exemplified in Keats' lines about the "magic casements opening on the foam of perilous seas in faery lands forlorn," or in Wordsworth's line about "old unhappy far-off things" than he does for the glitter and stage thunder of which Byron was past master. The simplicity and sentiment of Schubert evade him But he excels in Schumann's moody music of Spring, and revels in the brilliance of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival." The only melancholy and languor he seems to feel intuitively is that to be found in Tschaikowsky.

Yesterday's performance was typical of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. The orchestra played eloquently, brilliantly, but not with perfect accuracy. Mr Koussevitzky does not insist on the drill master precision secured by such conductors as Muck and Toscanini. He, perhaps feels that absolute accuracy of detail could be won only at a sacrifice of emotional power. Yet those who have listened to Muck and Toscanini have seldom felt any lack of emotional power in their conducting.

One admired yesterday the skill with which the melodic line of Schumann's slow movement was revealed. Mr Koussevitzky did not begin his career by triumphing over the double bass' limitations for nothing. Anything that can be interpreted as a soulful piece for 'cello, or for the double bass as played by Koussevitzky, he always does well.

In the first movement of the Schumann one thought what a fine pianoforte concerto Schumann could have made by adding a piano solo part, so essentially pianistic are the melodies he used.

The next concert in this series will be given April 2.

P. R.

GLOBE WANTS READ THEM TODAY

108

TRANS MAR. 14 '29 Phila.

Bouncing Into Fortune's Lap And Out Again

The Years and The Courses Of Vladimir Dukelsky, Composer at Hand

COMPOSERS of modern music are a wandering race. Often they live and work outside their own country. Ernest Bloch embraced American faith; Varèse found congenial surroundings in New York city; while George Antheil went to France "pour épater les bourgeois." Stravinsky has not seen Russia since the days of "Petrushka." Prokofiev re-visited the U. S. S. R. after his fame was firmly established in foreign lands. The youngest side of Russia is Vladimir Dukelsky, Russian who writes Russian music outrightful heir to Stravinsky and Prokofiev in spirit and manner, but as independent of either as any college boy blossoming forth into a grand career along the lines in which his parents, now growing respectable, had been prominent and successful. This week his Symphony in F will be heard at the Symphony Concerts.

Dukelsky—writes Nicolas Slonimsky to The Transcript—belongs entirely to the twentieth century. He was born in 1903, with the movies and aviation, and grew at a quick pace. At eight he was already engaged in composition of a ballet in fourteen acts, having picked up elementary information about music anywhere he could. He also felt the disturbing flow of poetic feelings within him and indulged in poetry until the realization of his musical powers displaced the weaker gift. Both symbolism and classicism attracted him; he chose Maeterlinck for an "opera in three acts" and an arcadian story about Milovsor for an opera-pastorale. At the Conservatory of Kiev he received regular instruction; his examination-piece—a string sextet—was a surprising revelation of maturity at sixteen. with Dukelsky, in the class of Gliére, was Skriabin's son, Julian, boy of genius, who was drowned at the age of eleven. A few piano pieces and an unfinished orchestral score was his legacy and for years after the quality of the music stirred speculation.

The civil war in Russia divided the country into separated fragments, with no definite boundaries. The overflow of population moved in general direction southwards, converging on Constantinople, where the various streams met. Dukelsky was caught in the tide, and emerged as Boy-Scout and member of the Y. M. C. A. in the Turkish capital, which at that time was in an occupation by the Allied forces. Dukelsky's family spoke English, and he himself was a polyglot. American affiliations saved him from the bitterest ordeals of Russian emigres. He did some piano-playing here and there; composed songs which passed unappreciated at the Y. M. C. A.'s Musicales; wrote a ballet for a Russian group of dancers appearing at one of the theaters. Constantinople in 1920 was a melting pot of all nationalities, fit only for temporary refuge. Steamers and railroads were busy carrying Russians to France and Germany. Dukelsky waited for a bigger chance, and one fine day, an American ship took him and his family to New York. He struggled valiantly for a place in the unorganized musical colony. An Overture from his pen was played at Carnegie Hall and dismissed as a piece of risible pretence.

In 1923 Dukelsky completed his Piano-Concerto in C major. It marks his beginnings as composer of power and imagination. There could be no mistake: it sufficed to hear the first two measures—a simple excursion from C major to G-sharp minor and back—to invest in the composer's future. As it stands now, it is one of the best modern Concertos—for the piano, not for a dissembling harpsichord or illusory percussion instrument. The quality of the music is such as may be expected from a composer of genius unaware of his abilities and his inspiration, free of influences, repressions or inhibitions. Not a false stroke or affected emphasis from one end to the other, and a display of brilliance in the coda that would dazzle even those brought up on Lisztian sonorities. The secret lies in the simplicity of design and resulting concentration and condensation of effect. The Concerto, willingly proffered by the composer at private parties in arrangement for two pianos, aroused a few inchoate societies of modern music but the tempo of events was obviously slow, with no prospect of a vigorous accelerando. After many discussions, doubts and fears, Dukelsky sailed for Paris, there to start it all over again as others had started. He was well furnished with introductory letters to Parisian magnificoes of the baton and the press. But, almost Lindbergh like, he did not have to use these testimonials to his worth. He met Diaghilev, played the Concerto for him, was instantly "discovered," and commissioned to write a ballet.

The theme was Zephyr and other winds improbably falling in love with Flora, with intermezzi, interludes and various episodes. Dukelsky wrote it in Monte Carlo, in the basement of the Casino, and Diaghilev's troupe gave it to the world. From the beginning the reception was favorable. Diaghilev hailed him as his third find—after Stravinsky and Prokofiev; the papers buzzed; Poulenc and Auric wrote articles about Dukelsky's opinions on jazz, and his picture was reproduced in musical journals. At the first night in Paris the orchestra played atrociously, but the composer was cordially greeted and, clad in immaculate black and white, bowed from the stage. Then came London and, with changing fortunes, other cities with a few depressing lulls between. Dukelsky was flying back and forth, from Paris to Venice, from Monte Carlo to London, overcoming the barriers that are set for Russian citizens traveling in Europe. He was a picturesque and engaging figure in those days, almost mid-Victorian in the magnificence of his deportment and the resplendence of his attire. Fortunately, his versatility spared him pecuniary embarrassments. He contributed, as Mr. Duke, a few jazz-numbers to a London review, and the royalties therefrom kept him going comfortably for a length of time. He wrote, in 1925, three songs to eighteenth-century Russian texts, charming and simple musical treatment of the subject. Stravinsky was fond of the songs; and seekers for sensation may dicover in "Apollo," which was written two years later, a passage well-nigh identical with the introductory measures of one of Dukelsky's melodies. . . . But—has not Stravinsky written a ballet entirely based upon Chaikovsky's tunes?

The Concerto was meanwhile forgotten. It had been published in version for two pianos; the composer had spoken to several pianists of eminence about a possible performance; all were interested, but the necessary orchestration was not forthcoming. True to the care-free spirit of one who feels the gods at his call, Dukelsky on several occasions missed appointments for which struggling musicians would strive for months. Next the realization that music inferior to his is performed and enjoyed would throw him into fits of activity, interrupted by a sudden and urgent departure for another point of destination, with futile telegrams following in the wake. . . .

Does Dukelsky imitate Stravinsky? This question is the first in the modern catechism. According to Dukelsky himself, he follows Glinka and Dargomijsky, his musical grandfathers, so to say. Inasmuch as Stravinsky harked back in "Maura" to Glinka's methods (with a displacement of harmonies by one-half wave-length, which often pitches the tonic against the dominant) Dukelsky would be imitating Stravinsky imitating Glinka. But there is no trace of Stravinsky's syllogistic frigidity in Dukelsky's bright and pastoral style. If Stravinsky is Torquemada, then Dukelsky is a dealer in indulgences, of which he makes ample use himself. His Concerto is a delectable sin, with unashamed cantilena alternating with darts of rhythmic virulence. Question number two: Does Dukelsky retrovert to Bach or to Handel in some other non-Stravinskian way? Still easier is it to answer in the negative. The next question would touch a composer's attitude towards folk-tunes or quasi-folk-tunes. Yes, Dukelsky cultivates them in his songs, and, less obviously, in his ballet. Sophisticated songfulness—the Concerto always excepted—tempts him, and he resorts to it in moderation. It is as difficult for a composer nowadays not to roll down into a numbered hole, as it is to walk on a narrow plank without leaning on the rails. But those unaware of the narrowness of the path are said to walk unperturbed, like Charlie Chaplin, in "The Circus," rope-walking and gamboling in the air, not realizing that his support has gone. Dukelsky started gorgeously, and betrays so far no sign of weakness. Why not grant him that high order of distinction—originality?

So much, biographically, from Mr. Slonimsky. A. H. M. may now take up the tale, analytically, with a word about the impending Symphony in F major. Little less than two years ago—he writes—Mr. Koussevitzky introduced a new composer to the Symphony Concerts, Vladimir Dukelsky. The chosen music was a Suite assembled from his ballet "Zephyr and Flora," as above described. Last June Mr. Koussevitzky produced at his Paris concerts the most important work subsequently written by Dukelsky, the Symphony in F major. This week he is bringing it to Boston. It was drafted in Scotland and in Italy. The orchestration was completed in London in the spring of 1928. (Apparently the mere composition of a Symphony is not a matter to curb the young composer's globe-trotting propensities.

The symphony runs through three movements—"Risoluto," "Molto moderato," "Allegro non troppo" as finale. From the program-book of the Concerts Koussevitzky (of Paris) we learn that the first of these movements "is developed along the broadest lines and corresponds more or less to sonata-form. The first theme is heard at the beginning in chords for brass, and after some modifications leads to a contrasting episode of rhythmic character. The second theme, at first scarcely more than a sketch, is then developed and after establishing its tonality (C major) passes to the concluding theme, which is based on an episode of the type of a harmonized chorale. The development is in the character of a toccata and is decidedly homophonic in construction. In the recapitulation the two themes are somewhat modified; the second is this time in F, according to classic formula, and leads precipitately into a coda with a conclusion in fanfares.

"The broad melody of the second movement, almost a cavarina, had its origin in Florence, and it is probably to this fact that it owes its slightly Italian outline. After the middle division, which is in the character of a march (in D major), there is a brusk pause on the chord of the dominant followed by the return of the principal theme, which is played in its entirety with some additional figuration. Formally considered this last portion ends with a short stretto.

"The firsth measures of the Finale (in 2-4) serve to replace the scherzo, which is lacking as an independent movement in this Symphony. Of chief interest in this portion is the middle part in E minor, which is broadly developed. Its sad theme is first given to the strings and later grows to canon in two voices for full orchestra. The Allegro in 3-4 which follows merely represents a continued development of the principal theme of the preceding, considerably altered, and containing no new material. The form of the Finale resembles that of a rondo."

TRANS MAR 15 29

New York is still echoing praises of Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Strauss's "Zarathustra"—"played with clarity, a glory of tone, a perfection of balance, a virtuosity of utterance to make the reviewer suspect his own ears." The conductor could do worse than repeat the tone-poem on one of the four programs yet to be made for Symphony Hall.

Mr. Rakhmaninov may be expected

"The Crime of Being Young"

Vladimir Dukelsky (Helen McGregor)

Re-entering the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

been TRANS MAR 15 '29

Koussevitzky Amid Rattle of Radiators

THREE numbers stood upon Mr. Koussevitzky's program at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening: Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major as orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg; Sibelius's concerto for violin, played by Mr. Burgin; Brahms's second symphony, in D major. But the program did not list all the happenings of the evening. Mr. Koussevitzky had no more than begun the symphony when radiators and steam pipes began to make noises. Involuntarily one wished for Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" or Prokofiev's "Pas d' Acier." Instead, Mr. Koussevitzky signaled his men to stop, descended from his platform, began smilingly to walk about among his players. Audience, orchestra, conductor "registered" nothing but amusement. When there was an interval of silence longer than the most, causing the audience to grow silent and the conductor to approach his post, another crash renewed amusement. After this there were no more attempts at starting until the proper official of Harvard University had notified Mr. Koussevitzky that he might proceed in peace. And Mr. Koussevitzky, beginning at approximately the same point at which he broke off, went on with a performance of the symphony that caused the most excited hand-clapping. Not until he had bidden his men rise did the clapping cease. An equal enthusiasm Mr. Burgin had already caused with the Sibelius concerto. For him too there was applause that made the rafters ring, that made him return again and again to make his bows. And when, after the intermission he took his place at the concert master's desk there was renewed spontaneous applause, and again the violinist made his acknowledgment.

Of the several Koussevitzkys that we know—conductor, program-maker, patron, pioneer, discoverer and explorer—none is greater than Koussevitzky the discoverer. His discoveries are of a catholicity as wide as the range of the programs themselves. They begin with or before Bach; they end with the latest stripling composer. Thus they never confine themselves to a single period or a single style. And it is almost uncanny that among these discoveries the ratio of the significant and worth-while is so exceedingly high. All of which reflections were started by hearing again Bach's concerto. It was welcomed when first heard, a few years ago. It was welcomed again on the programs of the current month. And last evening one could not help thinking that here was a piece not to be played once and laid aside, but a piece that has been part of the permanent enrichment of the repertory of the orchestra. Secondly, listening to this work, one pictured its composer sitting at a harpsichord playing for the Great Frederick's flute—and perhaps old Quantz discreetly and with cause gently coughing. And one says, "Small wonder from one of such powers." Nor must Steinberg be entirely omitted from praise for this work. For his orchestration enhances and brings to the fore many beauties which might otherwise slumber in the work unsuspected.

Let the connoisseur run through, in his mind, the list of concertos for the violin. His own artistic conscience alone will tell him how many (or how few) great works he will find. He will not need the fingers of very many hands to count them. In his enumeration he may or may not give consideration to Sibelius. Then let him hear Richard Burgin play this work of Sibelius, and the chances are strong that his list will be enlarged by it. Not in many concertos does one find so many beauties. The themes are significant. The ochestral score has much to say. The violin tops it in splendid proportioning. One feels instinctively that none of the many beauties of line, or of color, or of combination have been missed.

If it is true that the first and second themes of a symphony are the masculine and feminine manifestations of the idea of the symphony, the "hero" and "heroine" of the "plot," then Brahms has sketched a couple of perfect characters in his second symphony. They are almost twins (male and female) so perfectly do they reflect the same poetic thought from two different angles. Or perhaps it is better to say that they are the perfect lo... be... on... no... ch... rar... An... int... tra... ins...

BANG! BANG! BUT SYMPHONY WINS

Koussevitsky and Musicians In Battle with Din of Steam Pipes

Bang! Bang! Bang!

The capacity audience listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night, knew that something was wrong. For, no matter how you play it, the sound of a hammer on a steam pipe does not enter into Brahms's Symphony No. 2.

Undismayed by the din, which came from under the seats of the audience as the steam, for some unknown reason, was turned on, M. Koussevitsky continued to wave his baton. There was bewilderment in his look, and a serious, solemn cast to the faces of the musicians. But the rhythm of the steam pipes continued.

After five minutes of an unequal battle the steam pipes won. Mr. Koussevitsky surrendered. The orchestra stopped.

Another five minutes passed with the pipes silent. The audience and M. Koussevitsky felt that the trouble was over. The symphony was resumed, when—

BANG!!

It sounded as if 50 men had simultaneously struck the steam pipes with sledge hammers. The audience laughed. M. Koussevitsky and his musicians joined in.

After a slight pause the orchestra again played. When they finished the piece they received just what they deserved—tremendous applause.

Herald March 15

108

TRANS MAR. 14 '29 Phila.

Bouncing Into Fortune's Lap And Out Again

The Years and The Courses Of Vladimir Dukelsky, Composer at Hand

COMPOSERS of modern music are a wandering race. Often they live and work outside their own country. Ernest Bloch embraced American faith; Varèse found congeilal surroundings in New York city; while George Antheil went to France "pour épater les bourgeois." Stravinsky has not seen Russia since the days of "Petrushka." Prokoffiev re-visited the U. S. S. R. after his fame was firmly established in foreign lands. The youngest side of Russia is Vladimir Dukelsky, Russian who writes Russian music outrightful heir to Stravinsky and Prokoffiev in spirit and manner, but as independent of either as any college boy blossoming forth into a grand career along the lines in which his parents, now growing respectable, had been prominent and successful. This week his Symphony in F will be heard at the Symphony Concerts.

Dukelsky—writes Nicolas Slonimsky to The Transcript—belongs entirely to the twentieth century. He was born in 1903 with the movies and aviation, and grew at a quick pace. At eight he was already engaged in composition of a ballet in fourteen acts, having picked up elementary information about music anywhere he could. He also felt the disturbing flow of poetic feelings within him and indulged in poetry until the realization of his musical powers displaced the weaker gift. Both symbolism and classicism attracted him; he chose Maeterlinck for an "opera in three acts" and an arcadian story about Milovsor for an opera-pastorale. At the Conservatory of Kiev he received regular instruction; his examination-piece—a string sextet—was a surprising revelation of maturity at sixteen. with Dukelsky, in the class of Gliére, was Skriabin's son, Julian, boy of genius, who was drowned at the age of eleven. A few piano pieces and an unfinished orchestral score was his legacy and for years after the quality of the music stirred speculation.

The civil war in Russia divided the country into separated fragments, with no definite boundaries. The overflow of population moved in general direction southwards, converging on Constantinople, where the various streams met. Dukelsky was caught in the tide, and emerged as Boy-Scout and member of the Y. M. C. A. in the Turkish capital, which at that time was in an occupation by the Allied forces. Dukelsky's family spoke English, and he himself was a polyglot. American affiliations saved him from the bitterest ordeals of Russian emigres. He did some piano-playing here and there; composed songs which passed unappreciated at the Y. M. C. A.'s Musicales; wrote a ballet for a Russian group of dancers appearing at one of the theaters. Constantinople in 1920 was a melting pot of all nationalities, fit only for temporary refuge. Steamers and railroads were busy carrying Russians to France and Germany. Dukelsky waited for a bigger chance, and one fine day, an American ship took him and his family to New York. He struggled valiantly for a place in the unorganized musical colony. An Overture from his pen was played at Carnegie Hall and dismissed as a piece of risible pretence.

In 1923 Dukelsky completed his Piano-Concerto in C major. It marks his beginnings as composer of power and imagination. There could be no mistake: it sufficed to hear the first two measures—a simple excursion from C major to G-sharp minor and back—to invest in the composer's future. As it stands now, it is one of the best modern Concertos—for the piano, not for a dissembling harpsichord or illusory percussion instrument. The quality of the music is such as may be expected from a composer of genius unaware of his abilities and his inspiration, free of influences, repressions or inhibitions. Not a false stroke or affected emphasis from one end to the other, and a display of brilliance in the coda that would dazzle even those brought up on Lisztian sonorities. The secret lies in the simplicity of design and resulting concentration and condensation of effect. The Concerto, willingly proffered by the composer at private parties in arrangement for two pianos, aroused a few inchoate societies of modern music but the tempo of events was obviously slow, with no prospect of a vigorous accelerando. After many discussions, doubts and fears, Dukelsky sailed for Paris, there to start it all over again as others had started. He was well furnished with introductory letters to Parisian magnificoes of the baton and the press. But, almost Lindbergh like, he did not have to use these testimonials to his worth. He met Diaghilev, played the Concerto for him, was instantly "discovered," and commissioned to write a ballet.

The theme was Zephyr and other winds improbably falling in love with Flora, with intermezzi, interludes and various episodes. Dukelsky wrote it in Monte Carlo, in the basement of the Casino, and Diaghilev's troupe gave it to the world. From the beginning the reception was favorable. Diaghilev hailed him as his third find—after Stravinsky and Prokoffiev; the papers buzzed; Poulenc and Auric wrote articles about Dukelsky's opinions on jazz, and his picture was reproduced in musical journals. At the first night in Paris the orchestra played atrociously, but the composer was cordially greeted and, clad in immaculate black and white, bowed from the stage. Then came London and, with changing fortunes, other cities with a few depressing lulls between. Dukelsky was flying back and forth, from Paris to Venice, from Monte Carlo to London, overcoming the barriers that are set for Russian citizens traveling in Europe. He was a picturesque and engaging figure in those days, almost mid-Victorian in the magnificence of his deportment and the resplendence of his attire. Fortunately, his versatility spared him pecuniary embarrassments. He contributed, as Mr. Duke, a few jazz-numbers to a London review, and the royalties therefrom kept him going comfortably for a length of time. He wrote, in 1925, three songs to eighteenth-century Russian texts, charming and simple musical treatment of the subject. Stravinsky was fond of the songs; and seekers for sensation may dicover in "Apollo," which was written two years later, a passage well-nigh identical with the introductory measures of one of Dukelsky's melodies. . . . But—has not Stravinsky written a ballet entirely based upon Chaikovsky's tunes?

The Concerto was meanwhile forgotten. It had been published in version for two pianos; the composer had spoken to several pianists of eminence about a possible performance; all were interested, but the necessary orchestration was not forthcoming. True to the care-free spirit of one who feels the gods at his call, Dukelsky on several occasions missed appointments for which struggling musicians would strive for months. Next the realization that music inferior to his is performed and enjoyed would throw him into fits of activity, interrupted by a sudden and urgent departure for another point of destination, with futile telegrams following in the wake. . . .

Does Dukelsky imitate Stravinsky? This question is the first in the modern catechism. According to Dukelsky himself, he follows Glinka and Dargomijsky, his musical grandfathers, so to say. Inasmuch as Stravinsky harked back in "Maura" to Glinka's methods (with a displacement of harmonies by one-half wave-length, which often pitches the tonic against the dominant) Dukelsky would be imitating Stravinsky imitating Glinka. But there is no trace of Stravinsky's syllogistic frigidity in Dukelsky's bright and pastoral style. If Stravinsky is Torquemada, then Dukelsky is a dealer in indulgences, of which he makes ample use himself. His Concerto is a delectable sin, with unashamed cantilena alternating with darts of rhythmic virulence. Question number two: Does Dukelsky retrovert to Bach or to Handel in some other non-Stravinskian way? Still easier is it to answer in the negative. The next question would touch a composer's attitude towards folk-tunes or quasi-folk-tunes. Yes, Dukelsky cultivates them in his songs, and, less obviously, in his ballet. Sophisticated songfulness—the Concerto always excepted—tempts him, and he resorts to it in moderation. It is as difficult for a composer nowadays not to roll down into a numbered hole, as it is to walk on a narrow plank without leaning on the rails. But those unaware of the narrowness of the path are said to walk unperturbed, like Charlie Chaplin, in "The Circus," rope-walking and gamboling in the air, not realizing that his support has gone. Dukelsky started gorgeously, and betrays so far no sign of weakness. Why not grant him that high order of distinction—originality?

So much, biographically, from Mr. Slonimsky. A. H. M. may now take up the tale, analytically, with a word about the impending Symphony in F major. Little less than two years ago—he writes—Mr. Koussevitzky introduced a new composer to the Symphony Concerts, Vladimir Dukelsky. The chosen music was a Suite assembled from his ballet "Zephyr and Flora," as above described. Last June Mr. Koussevitzky produced at his Paris concerts the most important work subsequently written by Dukelsky, the Symphony in F major. This week he is bringing it to Boston. It was drafted in Scotland and in Italy. The orchestration was completed in London in the spring of 1928. (Apparently the mere composition of a Symphony is not a matter to curb the young composer's globe-trotting propensities.

The symphony runs through three movements—"Risoluto," "Molto moderato," "Allegro non troppo" as finale. From the program-book of the Concerts Koussevitzky (of Paris) we learn that the first of these movements "is developed along the broadest lines and corresponds more or less to sonata-form. The first theme is heard at the beginning in chords for brass, and after some modifications leads to a contrasting episode of rhythmic character. The second theme, at first scarcely more than a sketch, is then developed and after establishing its tonality (C major) passes to the concluding theme, which is based on an episode of the type of a harmonized chorale. The development is in the character of a toccata and is decidedly homophonic in construction. In the recapitulation the two themes are somewhat modified; the second is this time in F, according to classic formula, and leads precipitately into a coda with a conclusion in fanfares.

"The broad melody of the second movement, almost a cavarina, had its origin in Florence, and it is probably to this fact that it owes its slightly Italian outline. After the middle division, which is in the character of a march (in D major), there is a brusk pause on the chord of the dominant followed by the return of the principal theme, which is played in its entirety with some additional figuration. Formally considered this last portion ends with a short stretto.

"The firsth measures of the Finale (in 2-4) serve to replace the scherzo, which is lacking as an independent movement this portion is the middle part in E minor, which is broadly developed. Its sad theme is first given to the strings and later grows to canon in two voices for full orchestra. The Allegro in 3-4 which follows merely represents a continued development of the principal theme of the preceding, considerably altered, and containing no new material. The form of the Finale resembles that of a rondo."

TRANS MAR 15 29

New York is still echoing praises of Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Strauss's "Zarathustra"—"played with clarity, a glory of tone, a perfection of balance, a virtuosity of utterance to make the reviewer suspect his own ears." The conductor could do worse than repeat the tone-poem on one of the four programs yet to be made for Symphony Hall.

Mr. Rakhmaninov may be expected

"The Crime of Being Young"

Vladimir Dukelsky (Helen McGregor)

Re-entering the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

been TRANS MAR 15 '29

Koussevitzky Amid Rattle of Radiators

THREE numbers stood upon Mr. Koussevitzky's program at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening: Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major as orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg; Sibelius's concerto for violin, played by Mr. Burgin; Brahms's second symphony, in D major. But the program did not list all the happenings of the evening. Mr. Koussevitzky had no more than begun the symphony when radiators and steam pipes began to make noises. Involuntarily one wished for Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" or Prokofiev's "Pas d' Acier." Instead, Mr. Koussevitzky signaled his men to stop, descended from his [illegible] platform, began smilingly to walk about among his players. Audience, orchestra, conductor "registered" nothing but amusement. When there was an interval of silence longer than the most, causing the audience to grow silent and the conductor to approach his post, another crash renewed amusement. After this there were no more attempts at starting until the proper official of Harvard University had notified Mr. Koussevitzky that he might proceed in peace. And Mr. Koussevitzky, beginning at approximately the same point at which he broke off, went on with a performance of the symphony that caused the most excited hand-clapping. Not until he had bidden his men rise did the clapping cease. An equal enthusiasm Mr. Burgin had already caused with the Sibelius concerto. For him too there was applause that made the rafters ring, that made him return again and again to make his bows. And when, after the intermission he took his place at the concert master's desk there was renewed spontaneous applause, and again the violinist made his acknowledgment.

Of the several Koussevitzkys that we know—conductor, program-maker, patron, pioneer, discoverer and explorer—none is greater than Koussevitzky the discoverer. His discoveries are of a catholicity as wide as the range of the programs themselves. They begin with or before Bach; they end with the latest stripling composer. Thus they never confine themselves to a single period or a single style. And it is almost uncanny that among these discoveries the ratio of the significant and worth-while is so exceedingly high. All of which reflections were started by hearing again Bach's concerto. It was welcomed when first heard, a few years ago. It was welcomed again on the programs of the current month. And last evening one could not help thinking that here was a piece not to be played once and laid aside, but a piece that has been part of the permanent enrichment of the repertory of the orchestra. Secondly, listening to this work, one pictured its composer sitting at a harpsichord playing for the Great Frederick's flute—and perhaps old Quantz discreetly and with cause gently coughing. And one says, "Small wonder from one of such powers." Nor must Steinberg be entirely omitted from praise for this work. For his orchestration enhances and brings to the fore many beauties which might otherwise slumber in the work unsuspected.

Let the connoisseur run through, in his mind, the list of concertos for the violin. His own artistic conscience alone will tell him how many (or how few) great works he will find. He will not need the fingers of very many hands to count them. In his enumeration he may or may not give consideration to Sibelius. Then let him hear Richard Burgin play this work of Sibelius, and the chances are strong that his list will be enlarged by it. Not in many concertos does one find so many beauties. The themes are significant. The ochestral score has much to say. The violin tops it in splendid proportioning. One feels instinctively that none of the many beauties of line, or of color, or of combination have been missed.

If it is true that the first and second themes of a symphony are the masculine and feminine manifestations of the idea of the symphony, the "hero" and "heroine" of the "plot," then Brahms has sketched a couple of perfect characters in his second symphony. They are almost twins (male and female) so perfectly do they reflect the same poetic thought from two different angles. Or perhaps it is better to say that they are the perfect lovers who will never be separated. And beauty and significance of theme goes on in the other movements, the broad, noble theme of 'cellos in the second, the charming one of the third, the one of rare warmth and depth in the finale. And to sing these themes in their various interplay the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky were perfect instrument and perfect interpreter.

A. H. M.

[illegible] the rhythm of the steam pipes continued.

After five minutes of an unequal battle the steam pipes won. Mr. Koussevitsky surrendered. The orchestra stopped.

Another five minutes passed with the pipes silent. The audience and Mr. Koussevitsky felt that the trouble was over. The symphony was resumed, when—

BANG!!

It sounded as if 50 men had simultaneously struck the steam pipes with sledge hammers. The audience laughed. Mr. Koussevitsky and his musicians joined in.

After a slight pause the orchestra again played. When they finished the piece they received just what they deserved—tremendous applause.

Herald March 15

108

TRANS MAR. 14 '29 Phila.

Bouncing Into Fortune's Lap And Out Again

The Years and The Courses Of Vladimir Dukelsky, Composer at Hand

COMPOSERS of modern music are a wandering race. Often they live and work outside their own country. Ernest Bloch embraced American faith; Varèse found congenial surroundings in New York city; while George Antheil went to France "pour épater les bourgeois." Stravinsky has not seen Russia since the days of "Petrushka." Prokofiev re-visited the U. S. S. R. after his fame was firmly established in foreign lands. The youngest side of Russia is Vladimir Dukelsky, Russian who writes Russian music outrightful heir to Stravinsky and Prokofiev in spirit and manner, but as independent of either as any college boy blossoming forth into a grand career along the lines in which his parents, now growing respectable, had been prominent and successful. This week his Symphony in F will be heard at the Symphony Concerts.

Dukelsky—writes Nicolas Slonimsky to The Transcript—belongs entirely to the twentieth century. He was born in 1903 with the movies and aviation, and grew at a quick pace. At eight he was already engaged in composition of a ballet in fourteen acts, having picked up elementary information about music anywhere he could. He also felt the disturbing flow of poetic feelings within him and indulged in poetry until the realization of his musical powers displaced the weaker gift. Both symbolism and classicism attracted him; he chose Maeterlinck for an "opera in three acts" and an arcadian story about Milovsor for an opera-pastorale. At the Conservatory of Kiev he received regular instruction; his examination-piece—a string sextet—was a surprising revelation of maturity at sixteen, with Dukelsky, in the class of Gliére, was Skriabin's son, Julian, boy of genius, who was drowned at the age of eleven. A few piano pieces and an unfinished orchestral score was his legacy and for years after the quality of the music stirred speculation.

The civil war in Russia divided the country into separated fragments, with no definite boundaries. The overflow of population moved in general direction southwards, converging on Constantinople, where the various streams met. Dukelsky was caught in the tide, and emerged as Boy-Scout and member of the Y. M. C. A. in the Turkish capital, which at that time was in an occupation by the Allied forces. Dukelsky's family spoke English, and he himself was a polyglot. American affiliations saved him from the bitterest ordeals of Russian emigres. He did some piano-playing here and there; composed songs which passed unappreciated at the Y. M. C. A.'s Musicales; wrote a ballet for a Russian group of dancers appearing at one of the theaters. Constantinople in 1920 was a melting pot of all nationalities, fit only for temporary refuge. Steamers and railroads were busy carrying Russians to France and Germany. Dukelsky waited for a bigger chance, and one fine day, an American ship took him and his family to New York. He struggled valiantly for a place in the unorganized musical colony. An Overture from his pen was played at Carnegie Hall and dismissed as a piece of risible pretence.

In 1923 Dukelsky completed his Piano-Concerto in C major. It marks his beginnings as composer of power and imagination. There could be no mistake: it sufficed to hear the first two measures—a simple excursion from C major to G-sharp minor and back—to invest in the composer's future. As it stands now, it is one of the best modern Concertos—for the piano, not for a dissembling harpsichord or illusory percussion instrument. The quality of the music is such as may be expected from a composer of genius unaware of his abilities and his inspiration, free of influences, repressions or inhibitions. Not a false stroke or affected emphasis from one end to the other, and a display of brilliance in the coda that would dazzle even those brought up on Lisztian sonorities. The secret lies in the simplicity of design and resulting concentration and condensation of effect. The Concerto, willingly proffered by the composer at private parties in arrangement for two pianos, aroused a few inchoate societies of modern music but the tempo of events was obviously slow, with no prospect of a vigorous accelerando. After many discussions, doubts and fears, Dukelsky sailed for Paris, there to start it all over again as others had started. He was well furnished with introductory letters to Parisian magnificoes of the baton and the press. But, almost Lindbergh like, he did not have to use these testimonials to his worth. He met Diaghilev, played the Concerto for him, was instantly "discovered," and commissioned to write a ballet.

The theme was Zephyr and other winds improbably falling in love with Flora, with intermezzi, interludes and various episodes. Dukelsky wrote it in Monte Carlo, in the basement of the Casino, and Diaghilev's troupe gave it to the world. From the beginning the reception was fa-

Diaghilev hailed him as his third find—after Stravinsky and Prokofiev; the papers buzzed; Poulenc and Auric wrote articles about Dukelsky's opinions on jazz, and his picture was reproduced in musical journals. At the first night in Paris the orchestra played atrociously, but the composer was cordially greeted and, clad in immaculate black and white, bowed from the stage. Then came London and, with changing fortunes, other cities with a few depressing lulls between. Dukelsky was flying back and forth, from Paris to Venice, from Monte Carlo to London, overcoming the barriers that are set for Russian citizens traveling in Europe. He was a picturesque and engaging figure in those days, almost mid-Victorian in the magnificence of his deportment and the resplendence of his attire. Fortunately, his versatility spared him pecuniary embarrassments. He contributed, as Mr. Duke, a few jazz-numbers to a London review, and the royalties therefrom kept him going comfortably for a length of time. He wrote, in 1925, three songs to eighteenth-century Russian texts, charming and simple musical treatment of the subject. Stravinsky was fond of the songs; and seekers for sensation may dicover in "Apollo," which was written two years later, a passage well-nigh identical with the introductory measures of one of Dukelsky's melodies. . . . But—has not Stravinsky written a ballet entirely based upon Chaikovsky's tunes?

The Concerto was meanwhile forgotten. It had been published in version for two pianos; the composer had spoken to several pianists of eminence about a possible performance; all were interested, but the necessary orchestration was not forthcoming. True to the care-free spirit of one who feels the gods at his call, Dukelsky on several occasions missed appointments for which struggling musicians would strive for months. Next the realization that music inferior to his is performed and enjoyed would throw him into fits of activity, interrupted by a sudden and urgent departure for another point of destination, with futile telegrams following in the wake. . . .

Does Dukelsky imitate Stravinsky? This question is the first in the modern catechism. According to Dukelsky himself, he follows Glinka and Dargomijsky, his musical grandfathers, so to say. Inasmuch as Stravinsky harked back in "Maura" to Glinka's methods (with a displacement of harmonies by one-half wave-length, which often pitches the tonic against the dominant) Dukelsky would be imitating Stravinsky imitating Glinka. But there is no trace of Stravinsky's syllogistic frigidity in Dukelsky's bright and pastoral style. If Stravinsky is Torquemada, then Dukelsky is a dealer in indulgences, of which he makes ample use himself. His Concerto is a delectable sin, with unashamed cantilena alternating with darts of rhythmic virulence. Question number two: Does Dukelsky retrovert to Bach or to Handel in some other non-Stravinskian way? Still easier is it to answer in the negative. The next question would touch a composer's attitude towards folk-tunes or quasi-folk-tunes. Yes, Dukelsky cultivates them in his songs, and, less obviously, in his ballet. Sophisticated songfulness—the Concerto always excepted—tempts him, and he resorts to it in moderation. It is as difficult for a composer nowadays not to roll down into a numbered hole, as it is to walk on a narrow plank without leaning on the rails. But those unaware of the narrowness of the path are said to walk unperturbed, like Charlie Chaplin, in "The Circus," rope-walking and gamboling in the air, not realizing that his support has gone. Dukelsky started gorgeously, and betrays so far no sign of weakness. Why not grant him that high order of distinction—originality?

So much, biographically, from Mr. Slonimsky. A. H. M. may now take up the tale, analytically, with a word about the impending Symphony in F major. Little less than two years ago—he writes—Mr. Koussevitzky introduced a new composer to the Symphony Concerts, Vladimir Dukelsky. The chosen music was a Suite assembled from his ballet "Zephyr and Flora," as above described. Last June Mr. Koussevitzky produced at his Paris concerts the most important work subsequently written by Dukelsky, the Symphony in F major. This week he is bringing it to Boston. It was drafted in Scotland and in Italy. The orchestration was completed in London in the spring of 1928. (Apparently the mere composition of a Symphony is not a matter to curb the young composer's globe-trotting propensities.

The symphony runs through three movements—"Risoluto," "Molto moderato," "Allegro non troppo" as finale. From the program-book of the Concerts Koussevitzky (of Paris) we learn that the first of these movements "is developed along the broadest lines and corresponds more or less to sonata-form. The first theme is heard at the beginning in chords for brass, and after some modifications leads to a contrasting episode of rhythmic character. The second theme, at first scarcely more than a sketch, is then developed and after establishing its tonality (C major) passes to the concluding theme, which is based on an episode of the type of a harmonized chorale. The development is in the character of a toccata and is decidedly homophonic in construction. In the recapitulation the two themes are somewhat modified; the second is this time in F, according to classic formula, and leads precipitately into a coda with a conclusion in fanfares.

"The broad melody of the second movement, almost a cavarina, had its origin in Florence, and it is probably to this fact that it owes its slightly Italian outline. After the middle division, which is in the character of a march (in D major), there is a brusk pause on the chord of the dominant followed by the return of the principal theme, which is played in its entirety with some additional figuration. Formally considered this last portion ends with a short stretto.

"The firsth measures of the Finale (in 2-4) serve to replace the scherzo, which is lacking as an independent movement this portion is the middle part in E minor, which is broadly developed. Its sad theme is first given to the strings and later grows to canon in two voices for full orchestra. The Allegro in 3-4 which follows merely represents a continued development of the principal theme of the preceding, considerably altered, and containing no new material. The form of the Finale resembles that of a rondo."

TRANS MAR 15 '29

New York is still echoing praises of Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Strauss's "Zarathustra"—"played with a clarity, a glory of tone, a perfection of balance, a virtuosity of utterance to make the reviewer suspect his own ears." The conductor could do worse than repeat the tone-poem on one of the four programs yet to be made for Symphony Hall.

Mr. Rakhmaninov may be expected

"The Crime of Being Young"

Vladimir Dukelsky (Helen MacGregor)

Re-entering the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

been TRANS MAR 15 '29

Koussevitzky Amid Rattle of Radiators

THREE numbers stood upon Mr. Koussevitzky's program at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening: Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major as orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg; Sibelius's concerto for violin, played by Mr. Burgin; Brahms's second symphony, in D major. But the program did not list all the happenings of the evening. Mr. Koussevitzky had no more than begun the symphony when radiators and steam pipes began to make noises. Involuntarily one wished for Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" or Prokofiev's "Pas d' Acier." Instead, Mr. Koussevitzky signaled his men to stop, descended from his [illegible] platform, began smilingly to walk about among his players. Audience, orchestra, conductor "registered" nothing but amusement. When there was an interval of silence longer than the most, causing the audience to grow silent and the conductor to approach his post, another crash renewed amusement. After this there were no more attempts at starting until the proper official of Harvard University had notified Mr. Koussevitzky that he might proceed in peace. And Mr. Koussevitzky, beginning at approximately the same point at which he broke off, went on with a performance of the symphony that caused the most excited hand-clapping. Not until he had bidden his men rise did the clapping cease. An equal enthusiasm Mr. Burgin had already caused with the Sibelius concerto. For him too there was applause that made the rafters ring, that made him return again and again to make his bows. And when, after the intermission he took his place at the concert master's desk there was renewed spontaneous applause, and again the violinist made his acknowledgment.

Of the several Koussevitzkys that we know—conductor, program-maker, patron, pioneer, discoverer and explorer—none is greater than Koussevitzky the discoverer. His discoveries are of a catholicity as wide as the range of the programs themselves. They begin with or before Bach; they end with the latest stripling composer. Thus they never confine themselves to a single period or a single style. And it is almost uncanny that among these discoveries the ratio of the significant and worth-while is so exceedingly high. All of which reflections were started by hearing again Bach's concerto. It was welcomed when first heard, a few years ago. It was welcomed again on the programs of the current month. And last evening one could not help thinking that here was a piece not to be played once and laid aside, but a piece that has been part of the permanent enrichment of the repertory of the orchestra. Secondly, listening to this work, one pictured its composer sitting at a harpsichord playing for the Great Frederick's flute—and perhaps old Quantz discreetly and with cause gently coughing. And one says, "Small wonder from one of such powers." Nor must Steinberg be entirely omitted from praise for this work. For his orchestration enhances and brings to the fore many beauties which might otherwise slumber in the work unsuspected.

Let the connoisseur run through, in his mind, the list of concertos for the violin. His own artistic conscience alone will tell him how many (or how few) great works he will find. He will not need the fingers of very many hands to count them. In his enumeration he may or may not give consideration to Sibelius. Then let him hear Richard Burgin play this work of Sibelius, and the chances are strong that his list will be enlarged by it. Not in many concertos does one find so many beauties. The themes are significant. The ochestral score has much to say. The violin tops it in splendid proportioning. One feels instinctively that none of the many beauties of line, or of color, or of combination have been missed.

If it is true that the first and second themes of a symphony are the masculine and feminine manifestations of the idea of the symphony, the "hero" and "heroine" of the "plot," then Brahms has sketched a couple of perfect characters in his second symphony. They are almost twins (male and female) so perfectly do they reflect the same poetic thought from two different angles. Or perhaps it is better to say that they are the perfect lovers who will never be separated. And beauty and significance of theme goes on in the other movements, the broad, noble theme of 'cellos in the second, the charming one of the third, the one of rare warmth and depth in the finale. And to sing these themes in their various interplay the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky were perfect instrument and perfect interpreter.

A. H. M.

[illegible] the rhythm of the steam pipes continued.

After five minutes of an unequal battle the steam pipes won. Mr. Koussevitsky surrendered. The orchestra stopped.

Another five minutes passed with the pipes silent. The audience and M. Koussevitsky felt that the trouble was over. The symphony was resumed, when—

BANG!!

It sounded as if 50 men had simultaneously struck the steam pipes with sledge hammers. The audience laughed. M. Koussevitsky and his musicians joined in.

After a slight pause the orchestra again played. When they finished the piece they received just what they deserved—tremendous applause.

Herald March 15

The Concerto, The Violinist, The Conductor

TRANS MAR. 16 –

From Brahms Transfigured To Dukelsky Introduced At Symphony Hall

FROM the years before the late war recollection treasures an unsurpassed performance at Symphony Hall of Beethoven's Concerto for Violin. Dr. Muck was the conductor; Mr. Kreisler, the violinist. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Heifetz and an orchestra of like flexibility and fineness did as much for Brahms's Violin-Concerto. Objectors will hasten to say that both conductor and violinist slipped into Mr. Toscanini's pit, overdoing the lyric, the songful, Brahms. They will add in the next breath that the twofold performance, thus softened and sweetened, missed "ruggedness"—the word in which, almost invariably, they epitomize the composer. Brahms, they will conclude, wrote a music of thought and line; whereas Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Heifetz drew from the Concerto a music of feeling and color.

So saying, these objectors proceed from a general principle, which may or may not be valid as applied to the whole work of Brahms, rather than from the particular instance on Friday before them. It is true that the first movement of the Concerto is intrinsically symphonic; that the development of musical ideas between violin and orchestra seems the primary purpose; that here and there, especially in the "passage-work," the composer is as abstruse, not to say plodding, as the most devout of earlier Brahmsians could wish. On the other hand, even this first division, considered without prepossession, is of lighter substance and texture than are usual with Brahms, more gracious of motion, more seductive to the ear. Unmistakably, the ensuing slow movement unfolds gentle matter and pensive mood; while the Finale is manifestly free-rhythmed, quick-spirited, almost light-hearted. Moreover, from the cadenza of the first movement, through the euphonies of the second, to the bright turns of the third Brahms—no doubt with Joachim at his side—has not neglected opportunity for the violinist as virtuoso.

The truth is that the gravest and most puissant of composers usually relax themselves when they write a Concerto for Violin. As likely as not they are persuaded to such courses by the sound of the fiddle. It can sing melodies, set them a-quiver with feeling, touch and clothe them with beauty. Therefore melodies it shall have, melodies that invite these gentler strokes and moods. The fiddle, again, is capable of fine-shaded or luscious euphonies with an instrument or a choir in the accompanying orchestra. A composer would be musical mathematician or musical anchorite did he renounce such suavities. The tone of the fiddle, once more, can make "passage-work" the play of lustrous figures into silken pattern woven; wherefore the composer draws a sigh of relief as he sets to his "development."

For a Concerto for Violin—and for the most part a Concerto for Piano—is conceived at the outset as an ingratiating music; or of itself comes to be such. Possibly violin-concertos were written first for the Herr Kapellmeister or the signal virtuoso of the patron's orchestra, bound to please the seigneur's guests in a noble apartment. The salon enlarged into the concert-hall, the Herr Kapellmeister evolved into the far-reputed and wandering virtuoso. Thereby the intent and the quality of the Concerto stood confirmed. The nineteenth century, with its passion for educing non-musical values from music, was a forcing-house for prigs. But which one of its admired composers ever wrote an altogether "thoughtful" violin-concerto? Present modernism is a breeding-place for a new sort of pedants; but the worst of them have not yet wizened up their pieces for violin.

Therefore, it is within reason to make Brahms's Violin-Concerto ingratiating, instead of formidable, to clothe it with a tempered beauty of the ear and of the senses—the course and the end that Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Heifetz and the orchestra yesterday accomplished. It were an old story to recount anew the limpid flow, the instant elasticity, the super-sensibility of the violinist's tone; its edgeless contours, silken texture, speckless surface; to dwell upon its just measure, its singing warmth, its inexhaustible fineness of graduation and transition; above all that quality for which the moderns have found a limping word—its musicality. There is no violinist to transcend Mr. Heifetz in the conception of music as thought and emotion transfused into patterned and beautified sound. In such fashion he responds to it; in such guise transmits it. His sense of music is akin to Wagner's sense of the underlying melody. With these qualities he suffused, illuminated and transfigured the Violin-Concerto of Brahms.

By the same token it is needless to dwell upon the ability of Mr. Koussevitzky to sound the songful note in Brahms, to release him, when the music warrants, into glowing and romantical beauty, to distil the pensive mood, uncover the smiling face, release the gracious fingers to which Johannes, however "rugged" and "abstruse," was no stranger. As superfluous to renew praises for the sedulous, susceptible, divining Koussevitzky as conductor in concertos; or for the orchestra that, in the play of these qualities, is his responsive instrument. To all these things the audience testified while it listened rapt; when it applauded the returning conductor hardly less than it had clapped the recalled violinist. And for Johannes thus new robed in songful and sensuous beauty? There is but one answer. He need not go musically as he went too often visually, in clothes that may have been "rugged" but were unmistakably uncouth, ill-fitting, unbrushed.

The other incident of as pleasurable a concert as the symphonic year has yielded was the playing of Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony. The obliging "programist," eager, like the rest of us, to re-assure those who seemed to doubt the existence of the young Russian, quoted him as saying: "As to my ideas on music—I do hate all 'modernism,' and I love being modern," which sentence might be true description of his piece. The "modernism," which he sets between scornful quotation-marks is too widely known, too often endured. It proceeds by pedantic formulas; it applies them by a quasi-mathematical cerebration. It would have ideas bone-dry: processes machine-like and marrowless. It keeps one eye on the theories and practice in vogue; the other on the audience to be grated as by sand-paper. In fear lest it say something conventional, it reiterates that which is fashionably eccentric or that which is dryly null. "Being modern," as Mr. Dukelsky puts it, is another matter. To be so is to be sensitive to the musical air blowing over our time, to set it astir in one's own composition because there is no other natural, honest way; to accept the time-spirit yet to tinge it with the individuality that is equally precious possession. Out of the past, says the wise modern, it is possible to achieve the present.

As Mr. Dukelsky preaches—if the word is in place with so witty, not to say pert, a young gentleman—so he practices. There is Latin, as well as Russian, blood in his veins; he is fond of Mediterranean skies. Therefore the warmly songful measures, broad-curved and with Italianate pulse, of his slow movement. The time-spirit, however, is restless. Forthwith a march-rhythm is the motion, while the sonorities enlarge. There is halt and the songful glow returns expansive. No remarkable, no epochal music—as though composers always wrote such!—but music of clear personal quality, winning and holding interest, which is quite enough to ask of Mr. Dukelsky in the twenty-sixth year of his precocious Russian age.

The finale bears out and deepens this impression. Scherzo-like measures begin it; succumb quickly to the restless mood animating the whole Symphony; darken into sombre pages. These gather force, only to yield in turn to the rhythmic vigors of an exuberant close. Mr. Dukelsky has an imagination and procedure of his own; but no more than our other youth can he escape occasional Stravinskian tang. He is true modern again who must have his spice of scholarship, his prop out of the ancient style. Then a Canon intrigues him, as in this third movement, or he builds the first upon the urgent progress and cumulation of a Toccata. There he writes an ardent, full-voiced, large-striding music. Plentifully it throws off modernist sparks; yet not mannerism but vitality tosses in dissonance; while the whole gains a forthright, impetuous, sonorous progress that is clear play of creative musical temperament. It is the conductor's obligation to open the doors of Symphony Hall to youthful talent. Mr. Dukelsky's, obscured in the ballet suite of two seasons ago, is now unmistakable.

There was prelude to these middle-pieces in Emanuel Bach's Concerto for eighteenth-century orchestra that Mr. Koussevitzky has made repertory piece at the Symphony Concerts; postlude in the Overture of Berlioz, "Roman Carnival," dear also to his sense of orchestral virtuosity in romantic guise. If terseness is ear-mark of the moderns—Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony is hardly twenty-five minutes long—the ancients tranquilly traversed lengths. The son of Bach does not spare them; fills them, moreover, with the antidotes to tedium. His first Allegro lacks no needful abundance; quick on the uptake are his instruments or his choirs in tonal conversation. They interchange, moreover, a round, warm, songful speech that, as we hear it now in retrospect, seems clear pre-figuring of the romantic age. No mere figure-spinning, no counterpoint and tuttis for their own saye, will content Philip-Emanuel. Though the purists ban the word, he was reaching toward patterns that should also express the mood behind the form. In his slow movement he frankly forswears the ancient gravities, serenities and spaciousness; is all for a warmer, more nervous glow. Even in the dart of figures through his finale, the nascent expressive impulse will out. To some of the ancients we listeners throw back aurally and mentally. Philip-Emanuel meets us quarter-way and intercourse with him is stirring. As well, the string choir stood ready to give him singing splendor; the wood winds to lend him piquancy and grace.

Berlioz's Overture bears sympathetically the dramatizing, characterizing, picturizing courses that are Mr. Koussevitzky's way with such pieces. Nay, invites them; for "Roman Carnival" is intrinsically music that must go on from the composer's substance and suggestion to the fulfillment of intensified performance. Much also, in these days, it needs such aid. Those who will have little or none of Berlioz, ravage his reputation. In their hearts they probably think this Overture no better than movie-music. The opposing faithful are as sure, or surer, that Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra are no more than the composer's mouthpieces, albeit rich and gilding tongued. We others, sitting on middle ground, watch contentedly enough, while with the kindling of his own temperament, he makes romantic fires blaze out of musical husks.

H. T. P.

Music Born From Visions Into Sounds

TRANS MAR. 16

Return to Symphony Hall of Bruckner Long Overlooked

THE fire in Bruckner had free channel. Logs were not felled across its road. No neuro-watchman sprang alert as to an alarm when it began its stirring and collings preparatory to motion, and promptly set to beating it from its course and driving it in alien directions. No haggard fear commenced running about, hissing, "Take care, this is not modern; this is not the symphony of the future; this is not what is wanted by our time; this will not free the Austrian youth and let floods of life over the sands; this is not greater than Brahms; this is not the most important form of music; this is not carrying Beethoven further than Beethoven could go." Something did not shrill, "Yonder is a man your contemporary who had done revolutionary work; make this modern, make it new and important; you must give just this nuance, you must give just that tone!" There was no floating baseless mind to interfere, to wrench the bud from its root, to commence kneading and forcing and trimming, to look into the world and get ideas and then give the musician back his substance wrapped in tight neat packages. There was the fire, only; rising, towering, finding its path; and the road before it was clear of obstructions.

What came out of Bruckner and became song of instruments is unmarred by the choking fingers of the floating mind; witness of the easiness of the passage it had into the world. Symphonies and religious services composed by him have the innocency and the largeness of such stuffs as are dredged deep where life has no weakness. The music is the speech of the heart, simple and direct and unaffected, and reverent and strong in mood. There is no room for jewelry for the facile, for the pretty, where these grave and lofty tones are found. Bruckner's symphonies have scarce commenced heaving their mighty volumes through time, before we know we are come into the world of deep breaths and far vistas and profound experience. We hear someone singing; singing as though none were near to hear the song, and as though it issued forth for its own good sake; singing out of great ecstasies and great solitudes. The tones have their own distinct accent, strong and uncouth and soft-colored. A horn commences its dreamful speech over pianissimo strings; and what comes is old, something which must have been in every Allemand, something which must have been in Allemanic forests long since, and that was again in Weber; and which is new nevertheless, freighted with new solemnity and melancholy and pain.

And Bruckner's works are large in form as in conception. They bring us into contact with an elemental and taurian strength. The lung-capacity of the man, the vast span and breadth of his themes and thematic groups make the majority of composers seem asthmatic. The rhythmic hurl, curve and freshness of his rude, lumbering and troll-like scherzi subjects; the Homeric delight shown by him in ruddy sonorities in the exuberant blasts of the reinforced brass; the cubical bulk of so many of his opening and final movements, make it appear to the fancy as though an elemental spirit had broken forth. Once the slow, ox-like power is gotten in motion; once the Bruckner orchestra begins squaring its great monoliths of tone, then, mountainous things commence to happen. The great gradual climaxes of the adagios of the symphonies; the long powerfully sustained ecstasies with their wildly and solemnly chanting trumpets, have something almost terrible in their vehemence and amount. The great battering-rams are slowly gotten in action. But, once heaved forward, they crash walls down.

The man was an innocent, seeing only his own idea. Modern music has no greater example of perfect unsophistication and oneness. Bruckner must have lived in complete obliviousness of his surroundings. A sort of rudimentary connsciousness of things was there, perhaps, sufficient to steer him through a few duties; but the greater part of his man was walking always in the high cathedral of his vision. Waltz-blooded Vienna could scarce have existed for him. What rumbled and flowed beneath his windows; what he passed through in his courses through the streets, was vapor merely. Where a world felt lightness of life and the decay of a state and modern commercial tempi, there the little organist found the walls and windows and vaulting of a cathedral nave; and the high experiences that transformed themselves imperceptibly into the solemn trumpetings and ecstatic gamuts of his unworldly musics. No brother in blank Carthusian aisles could have paced sunken further in prayerfulness, God-passionates and Lenten mood, than Bruckner through the city roads. There was the father in heaven. There was the father in heaven, and not the houses and the people. There was the father in heaven who could open his robes and hang them about his child in the cold as the walls of a woolen tent. There was no realness in the world except the soversign moments when he lifted his child out of the lonely gray air into his bosom, and held him tight with his hand till the good minute went and the clouds of beatitude dwindled in the sad color of the world.

Here was the [illegible] God-lover, God-embracer, in contemporary Vienna! Bruckner not only was an innocent; he was a mystic too. On the back of this subject of Francis Joseph's, there sat the robe of the world-estranged seer. The German mystics are his kinsmen more than are the musicians; more than is the religio-philosophical Beethoven of the Ninth Symphony and the "Missa Solemnis," from whom he stems; more than is the piestic Bach, whose God-love he shared. To be sure, Bruckner remains an Austrian composer in his idiom, if not in his thought. His love for soft orchestral effects, for rich full color, links him with Schubert. Like Schubert, he speaks major in minor keys. Indeed, there are pages of his that make him seem the most Austrian of all composers; the one least affected by Italian sweetness and imbued most strongly with the uncontaminated racial traits.

The contemporary of Wagner and Brahms and Franck, Bruckner brings to mind not so much the refinements of his own century as the uncouthness of the Allemanic tribesmen, his ancestors, who smeared their long hair with butter and brewed thick black beers. For all the magnificences of his orchestration, he remains the Upper-Austrian peasant, uncultivated, clumsy, naïve. One of his works, a Te Deum, is qualified with the adjective "Peasant"; all his work, so heavy-limbed and slow-blooded, deserves the title. The spirit of lightness, of the graceful dance, of the delicate jest, of the subtle half-statement, present in so many Austrian musicians, in Mozart, for example, is absent almost entirely from his work. Absent, too, is the gayety and charm and sweetness of Schubert. Bruckner's dance is all hoofs, all heavy springs and drunken fury. Even the trios of his scherzi, tender, dreamy and intermezzo-like, have a certain predominant homeliness and humbleness. The good-natured, sluggish South-German farmer dreams across his sunny land.

And yet, of course, one finds oneself setting him by the side of the religious mystics. One feels in Bruckner a completer removal from the world of objective reality, a completer tendency to consider all events purely from a psychological viewpoint, a completer habit of perceiving in the outer world merely the image of his own inner, than one finds either in the later Beethoven or in the most Memnonite pages of Bach's cantatas. It is in the company of a seer like Jacob Boehme, say, that one finds oneself instinctively placing him. In the square massive symphonies of the modern, as in the confessions of the seventeenth-century imaginer of the "centrum naturae," the "virgin Sophia," one glimpses the workings of a similar excessive transformation of the lust of the eye and the other senses into the power of mystical and almost hallucinatory vision. There are pages in the adagios of Bruckner that appear strangely akin to the records of his inner experiences left by the cobbler of Görlitz; to the experiences of the mystic marriages, the perception of fiery symbols, the progression from lugubrious depressed states through ecstasy to tranquility.

How it comes that in listening to the performances of ninety instrumentalists on their fiddles, pipes and horns, one should enter through such forbidden doors; that, it is not easy to explain. Perhaps the cause of the strange communication lies in Bruckner's predilection for themes of a chorale or hymn-like character. It is possible that it results from the general austere and yet strangely soft and tender character of his style. His harmony is rich, solemn, stately. He delighted in the use of full, grandiose progressions of chords in the brass, through which harp music sweeps. His climaxes are slow, distended, piercing; it is possible that the solemn tones of the trombones, the sobbing of horns through pulsating chords of shrilling wind and strings, are in some measure the origin of the sensations communicated. It may be that the general character of the work, merely, predisposes one to interpret so the ecstasies. We cannot say for sure. It is doubtful whether any analysis of form, no matter how keen and scientific it may be, can arrive at elucidating these mysteries of art. And yet, we know full well that just as, in some mysterious manner, the Bruckner scherzi bring one the sensations of being in the open air, of seeing the green earth and gray sky, so, too, the Bruckner adagios give us the sensations of an inner hallucinatory vision. The light that goes up in us from the chanting of the clear, high, loud orchestra in those movements, is not, we are somehow positive, the light that comes from the sun. It is not the light irradiated into an hundred tints by the orchestra of Debussy and the other impressionists. It is the dazzling shine that some dreaming men have suddenly seen piercing at them from out an opaque wall, or seen flooding upward at night from earth strewn thick with leaves.

PAUL ROSENFELD

(Reprinted from "Musical Chronicle," published by Harcourt Brace and Company)

TRANS MAR 16

109

Heifetz Plays With Boston Orchestra

MON. MAR. 16

Popular interest in the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra centered, naturally enough, in the appearance of Jascha Heifetz, who lent his baronial art to the meridian exposition of the Brahms Violin Concerto. The ovation accorded him from floor and platform alike broke down the imperturbability even of this fastidious artist, who smiled almost shyly in acknowledgment. Nor, without in the least detracting from his imperious performance, should the support vouchsafed him by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra be overlooked. No soloist could hope for better backing. The audience recognized the importance of this orchestral contribution, and gave the conductor more than the usual applause when he returned to the stage after the soloist had finally been released.

The concerto occupied the position immediately following the intermission. The place of honor immediately preceding that interval was allotted to a new Symphony in F major by Vladimir Dukelsky, a young Russian expatriate previously known to Boston only by a suite from his ballet, "Zéphyr et Flore." M. Diaghileff claims credit for the "discovery" of this young composer, along with his two elder "brothers," Stravinsky and Prokofieff. It appeared to at least one listener yesterday afternoon that M. Diaghileff in this classification had been much too amiable to M. Dukelsky. M. Diaghileff also traces the composer's musical heredity back to his "grandfather," Glinka. But in this musical genealogy has not the immediate parenthood been overlooked? There is perhaps evidence of the influence of Prokofieff in the neo-classical form; and of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," certainly. But brush aside the film of modernity, and what have you? To this watcher the composer appears as a particularly ill-favored musical son of Tchaikovsky, attempting to conceal his lack of individuality by donning the cast-off toggery of his "elder brothers."

Mr. Heifetz was not the only soloist of the day. Mr. Louis Speyer distinguished himself by his playing of the English horn in the opening C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg Concerto for orchestra in D major, and again in the final number, Berlioz's Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain." This old concerto and like pieces of its period are always welcome because they give us repeated opportunity to enjoy the incandescence of the Boston strings. And those subscribers who left after the violin concerto missed one of the finest performances of the season. Theatrical stuff, this from Berlioz? Very likely; but a touch of the theater, a dash of Gallic liveliness, come not amiss after much Teutonic erudition. And there is nothing to be ashamed of in enjoying a good tune, sprightly rhythms and bright colors.

L. A. S.

CONCERT CALENDAR

TRANS MAR

JOSEF HOFMANN

The recital which Josef Hofmann will give in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 will be the great pianist's last appearance in Boston for two years, dividing his program between the music of Chopin and Liszt.

LAST MONDAY'S PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fifth and last concert of the Monday evening series in Symphony hall, tomorrow evening, March 18, at 8:15.

Serge Koussevitzky will then present Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; Satie's "Gymnopedies," as orchestrated by Debussy; Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," based on the humorous ballad of Goethe, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the second and last pair of Young People's concerts this season, in Symphony hall, next Tuesday and Wednesday afternoon, March 19 and 20, at 4 o'clock.

Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will each conduct, and explanatory remarks will be given, with stereopticon slides, by Alfred H. Meyer.

PENSION FUND PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky announces an all Wagner program for the coming spring Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, March 24, at 3:30.

The Concerto, The Violinist, The Conductor

TRANS MAR. 16 –

From Brahms Transfigured To Dukelsky Introduced At Symphony Hall

FROM the years before the late war recollection treasures an unsurpassed performance at Symphony Hall of Beethoven's Concerto for Violin. Dr. Muck was the conductor; Mr. Kreisler, the violinist. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Heifetz and an orchestra of like flexibility and fineness did as much for Brahms's Violin-Concerto. Objectors will hasten to say that both conductor and violinist slipped into Mr. Toscanini's pit, overdoing the lyric, the songful, Brahms. They will add in the next breath that the two-fold performance, thus softened and sweetened, missed "ruggedness"—the word in which, almost invariably, they epitomize the composer. Brahms, they will conclude, wrote a music of thought and line; whereas Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Heifetz drew from the Concerto a music of feeling and color.

So saying, these objectors proceed from a general principle, which may or may not be valid as applied to the whole work of Brahms, rather than from the particular instance on Friday before them. It is true that the first movement of the Concerto is intrinsically symphonic; that the development of musical ideas between violin and orchestra seems the primary purpose; that here and there, especially in the "passage-work," the composer is as abstruse, not to say plodding, as the most devout of earlier Brahmsians could wish. On the other hand, even this first division, considered without prepossession, is of lighter substance and texture than are usual with Brahms, more gracious of motion, more seductive to the ear. Unmistakably, the ensuing slow movement unfolds gentle matter and pensive mood; while the Finale is manifestly free-rhythmed, quick-spirited, almost light-hearted. Moreover, from the cadenza of the first movement, through the euphonies of the second, to the bright turns of the third Brahms—no doubt with Joachim at his side—has not neglected opportunity for the violinist as virtuoso.

The truth is that the gravest and most puissant of composers usually relax themselves when they write a Concerto for Violin. As likely as not they are persuaded to such courses by the sound of the fiddle. It can sing melodies, set them a-quiver with feeling, touch and clothe them with beauty. Therefore melodies it shall have, melodies that invite these gentler strokes and moods. The fiddle, again, is capable of fine-shaded or luscious euphonies with an instrument or a choir in the accompanying orchestra. A composer would be musical mathematician or musical anchorite did he renounce such suavities. The tone of the fiddle, once more, can make "passage-work" the play of lustrous figures into silken pattern woven; wherefore the composer draws a sigh of relief as he sets to his "development."

For a Concerto for Violin—and for the most part a Concerto for Piano—is conceived at the outset as an ingratiating music; or of itself comes to be such. Possibly violin-concertos were written first for the Herr Kapellmeister or the signal virtuoso of the patron's orchestra, bound to please the seigneur's guests in a noble apartment. The salon enlarged into the concert-hall, the Herr Kapellmeister evolved into the far-reputed and wandering virtuoso. Thereby the intent and the quality of the Concerto stood confirmed. The nineteenth century, with its passion for educing non-musical values from music, was a forcing-house for prigs. But which one of its admired composers ever wrote an altogether "thoughtful" violin-concerto? Present modernism is a breeding-place for a new sort of pedants; but the worst of them have not yet wizened up their pieces for violin.

Therefore, it is within reason to make Brahms's Violin-Concerto ingratiating, instead of formidable, to clothe it with a tempered beauty of the ear and of the senses—the course and the end that Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Heifetz and the orchestra yesterday accomplished. It were an old story to recount anew the limpid flow, the instant elasticity, the super-sensibility of the violinist's tone; its edgeless contours, silken texture, speckless surface; to dwell upon its just measure, its singing warmth, its inexhaustible fineness of graduation and transition; above all that quality for which the moderns have found a limping word—its musicality. There is no violinist to transcend Mr. Heifetz in the conception of music as thought and emotion transfused into patterned and beautified sound. In such fashion he responds to it; in such guise transmits it. His sense of music is akin to Wagner's sense of the underlying melody. With these qualities he suffused, illuminated and transfigured the Violin-Concerto of Brahms.

By the same token it is needless to dwell upon the ability of Mr. Koussevitzky to sound the songful note in Brahms, to release him, when the music warrants, into glowing and romantical beauty, to distil the pensive mood, uncover the smiling face, release the gracious fingers to which Johannes, however "rugged" and "abstruse," was no stranger. As superfluous to renew praises for the sedulous, susceptible, divining Koussevitzky as conductor in concertos; or for the orchestra that, in the play of these qualities, is his responsive instrument. To all these things the audience testified while it listened rapt; when it applauded the returning conductor hardly less than it had clapped the recalled violinist. And for Johannes thus new robed in songful and sensuous beauty? There is but one answer. He need not go musically as he went too often visually, in clothes that may have been "rugged" but were unmistakably uncouth, ill-fitting, unbrushed.

The other incident of as pleasurable a concert as the symphonic year has yielded was the playing of Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony. The obliging "programist," eager, like the rest of us, to re-assure those who seemed to doubt the existence of the young Russian, quoted him as saying: "As to my ideas on music—I do hate all 'modernism,' and I love being modern," which sentence might be true description of his piece. The "modernism," which he sets between scornful quotation-marks is too widely known, too often endured. It proceeds by pedantic formulas; it applies them by a quasi-mathematical cerebration. It would have ideas bone-dry: processes machine-like and marrowless. It keeps one eye on the theories and practice in vogue; the other on the audience to be grated as by sand-paper. In fear lest it say something conventional, it reiterates that which is fashionably eccentric or that which is dryly null. "Being modern," as Mr. Dukelsky puts it, is another matter. To be so is to be sensitive to the musical air blowing over our time, to set it astir in one's own composition because there is no other natural, honest way; to accept the time-spirit yet to tinge it with the individuality that is equally precious possession. Out of the past, says the wise modern, it is possible to achieve the present.

As Mr. Dukelsky preaches—if the word is in place with so witty, not to say pert, a young gentleman—so he practices. There is Latin, as well as Russian, blood in his veins; he is fond of Mediterranean skies. Therefore the warmly songful measures, broad-curved and with Italianate pulse, of his slow movement. The time-spirit, however, is restless. Forthwith a march-rhythm is the motion, while the sonorities enlarge. There is halt and the songful glow returns expansive. No remarkable, no epochal music—as though composers always wrote such!—but music of clear personal quality, winning and holding interest, which is quite enough to ask of Mr. Dukelsky in the twenty-sixth year of his precocious Russian age.

The finale bears out and deepens this impression. Scherzo-like measures begin it; succumb quickly to the restless mood animating the whole Symphony; darken into sombre pages. These gather force, only to yield in turn to the rhythmic vigors of an exuberant close. Mr. Dukelsky has an imagination and procedure of his own; but no more than our other youth can he escape occasional Stravinskian tang. He is true modern again who must have his spice of scholarship, his prop out of the ancient style. Then a Canon intrigues him, as in this third movement, or he builds the first upon the urgent progress and cumulation of a Toccata. There he writes an ardent, full-voiced, large-striding music. Plentifully it throws off modernist sparks; yet not mannerism but vitality tosses in dissonance; while the whole gains a forthright, impetuous, sonorous progress that is clear play of creative musical temperament. It is the conductor's obligation to open the doors of Symphony Hall to youthful talent. Mr. Dukelsky's, obscured in the ballet suite of two seasons ago, is now unmistakable.

There was prelude to these middle-pieces in Emanuel Bach's Concerto for eighteenth-century orchestra that Mr. Koussevitzky has made repertory piece at the Symphony Concerts; postlude in the Overture of Berlioz, "Roman Carnival," dear also to his sense of orchestral virtuosity in romantic guise. If terseness is ear-mark of the moderns—Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony is hardly twenty-five minutes long—the ancients tranquilly traversed lengths. The son of Bach does not spare them; fills them, moreover, with the antidotes to tedium. His first Allegro lacks no needful abundance; quick on the uptake are his instruments or his choirs in tonal conversation. They interchange, moreover, a round, warm, songful speech that, as we hear it now in retrospect, seems clear pre-figuring of the romantic age. No mere figure-spinning, no counterpoint and tuttis for their own saye, will content Philip-Emanuel. Though the purists ban the word, he was reaching toward patterns that should also express the mood behind the form. In his slow movement he frankly forswears the ancient gravities, serenities and spaciousness; is all for a warmer, more nervous glow. Even in the dart of figures through his finale, the nascent expressive impulse will out. To some of the ancients we listeners throw back aurally and mentally. Philip-Emanuel meets us quarter-way and intercourse with him is stirring. As well, the string choir stood ready to give him singing splendor; the wood winds to lend him piquancy and grace.

Berlioz's Overture bears sympathetically the dramatizing, characterizing, picturizing courses that are Mr. Koussevitzky's way with such pieces. Nay, invites them; for "Roman Carnival" is intrinsically music that must go on from the composer's substance and suggestion to the fulfillment of intensified performance. Much also, in these days, it needs such aid. Those who will have little or none of Berlioz, ravage his reputation. In their hearts they probably think this Overture no better than movie-music. The opposing faithful are as sure, or surer, that Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra are no more than the composer's mouthpieces, albeit rich and gilding tongued. We others, sitting on middle ground, watch contentedly enough, while with the kindling of his own temperament, he makes romantic fires blaze out of musical husks.

H. T. P.

Music Born From Visions Into Sounds

TRANS—MAR. 16

Return to Symphony Hall of Bruckner Long Overlooked

THE fire in Bruckner had free channel. Logs were not felled across its road. No neuro-watchman sprang alert as to an alarm when it began its stirring and collings preparatory to motion, and promptly set to beating it from its course and driving it in alien directions. No haggard fear commenced running about, hissing, "Take care, this is not modern; this is not the symphony of the future; this is not what is wanted by our time; this will not free the Austrian youth and let floods of life over the sands; this is not greater than Brahms; this is not the most important form of music; this is not carrying Beethoven further than Beethoven could go." Something did not shrill, "Yonder is a man your contemporary who had done revolutionary work; make this modern, make it new and important; you must give just this nuance, you must give just that tone!" There was no floating baseless mind to interfere, to wrench the bud from its root, to commence kneading and forcing and trimming, to look into the world and get ideas and then give the musician back his substance wrapped in tight neat packages. There was the fire, only: rising, towering, finding its path; and the road before it was clear of obstructions.

What came out of Bruckner and became song of instruments is unmarred by the choking fingers of the floating mind; witness of the easiness of the passage it had into the world. Symphonies and religious services composed by him have the innocency and the largeness of such stuffs as are dredged deep where life has no weakness. The music is the speech of the heart, simple and direct and unaffected, and reverent and strong in mood. There is no room for jewelry for the facile, for the pretty, where these grave and lofty tones are found. Bruckner's symphonies have scarce commenced heaving their mighty volumes through time, before we know we are come into the world of deep breaths and far vistas and profound experience. We hear someone singing; singing as though none were near to hear the song, and as though it issued forth for its own good sake; singing out of great ecstasies and great solitudes. The tones have their own distinct accent, strong and uncouth and soft-colored. A horn commences its dreamful speech over pianissimo strings; and what comes is old, something which must have been in every Allemand, something which must have been in Allemanic forests long since, and that was again in Weber; and which is new nevertheless, freighted with new solemnity and melancholy and pain.

And Bruckner's works are large in form as in conception. They bring us into contact with an elemental and taurian strength. The lung-capacity of the man, the vast span and breadth of his themes and thematic groups make the majority of composers seem asthmatic. The rhythmic hurl, curve and freshness of his rude, lumbering and troll-like scherzi subjects; the Homeric delight shown by him in ruddy sonorities in the exuberant blasts of the reinforced brass; the cubical bulk of so many of his opening and final movements, make it appear to the fancy as though an elemental spirit had broken forth. Once the slow, ox-like power is gotten in motion; once the Bruckner orchestra begins squaring its great monoliths of tone, then, mountainous things commence to happen. The great gradual climaxes of the adagios of the symphonies; the long powerfully sustained ecstasies with their wildly and solemnly chanting trumpets, have something almost terrible in their vehemence and amount. The great battering-rams are slowly gotten in action. But, once heaved forward, they crash walls down.

The man was an innocent, seeing only his own idea. Modern music has no greater example of perfect unsophistication and oneness. Bruckner must have lived in complete obliviousness of his surroundings. A sort of rudimentary connsciousness of things was there, perhaps, sufficient to steer him through a few duties; but the greater part of his man was walking always in the high cathedral of his vision. Waltz-blooded Vienna could scarce have existed for him. What rumbled and flowed beneath his windows; what he passed through in his courses through the streets, was vapor merely. Where a world felt lightness of life and the decay of a state and modern commercial tempi, there the little organist found the walls and windows and vaulting of a cathedral nave; and the high experiences that transformed themselves imperceptibly into the solemn trumpetings and ecstatic gamuts of his unworldly musics. No brother in blank Carthusian aisles could have paced sunken further in prayerfulness, God-passionates and Lenten mood, than Bruckner through the city roads. There was the father in heaven. There was the father in heaven, and not the houses and the people. There was the father in heaven who could open his robes and hang them about his child in the cold as the walls of a woolen tent. There was no realness in the world except the sovereign moments when he lifted his child out of the lonely gray air into his bosom, and held him tight with his hand till the good minute went and the clouds of beatitude dwindled in the sad color of the world.

Here was the paradox: the medieval God-lover, God-embracer, in contemporary Vienna! Bruckner not only was an innocent; he was a mystic, too. On the back of this subject of Francis Joseph's, there sat the robe of the world-estranged seer. The German mystics are his kinsmen more than are the musicians; more than is the religio-philosophical Beethoven of the Ninth Symphony and the "Missa Solemnis," from whom he stems; more than is the piestic Bach, whose God-love he shared. To be sure, Bruckner remains an Austrian composer in his idiom, if not in his thought. His love for soft orchestral effects, for rich full color, links him with Schubert. Like Schubert, he speaks major in minor keys. Indeed, there are pages of his that make him seem the most Austrian of all composers; the one least affected by Italian sweetness and imbued most strongly with the uncontaminated racial traits.

The contemporary of Wagner and Brahms and Franck, Bruckner brings to mind not so much the refinements of his own century as the uncouthness of the Allemanic tribesmen, his ancestors, who smeared their long hair with butter and brewed thick black beers. For all the magnificences of his orchestration, he remains the Upper-Austrian peasant, uncultivated, clumsy, naïve. One of his works, a Te Deum, is qualified with the adjective "Peasant"; all his work, so heavy-limbed and slow-blooded, deserves the title. The spirit of lightness, of the graceful dance, of the delicate jest, of the subtle half-statement, present in so many Austrian musicians, in Mozart, for example, is absent almost entirely from his work. Absent, too, is the gayety and charm and sweetness of Schubert. Bruckner's dance is all hoofs, all heavy springs and drunken fury. Even the trios of his scherzi, tender, dreamy and intermezzo-like, have a certain predominant homeliness and humbleness. The good-natured, sluggish South-German farmer dreams across his sunny land.

And yet, of course, one finds oneself setting him by the side of the religious mystics. One feels in Bruckner a completer removal from the world of objective reality, a completer tendency to consider all events purely from a psychological viewpoint, a completer habit of perceiving in the outer world merely the image of his own inner, than one finds either in the later Beethoven or in the most Memnonite pages of Bach's cantatas. It is in the company of a seer like Jacob Boehme, say, that one finds oneself instinctively placing him. In the square massive symphonies of the modern, as in the confessions of the seventeenth-century imaginer of the "centrum naturae," the "virgin Sophia," one glimpses the workings of a similar excessive transformation of the lust of the eye and the other senses into the power of mystical and almost hallucinatory vision. There are pages in the adagios of Bruckner that appear strangely akin to the records of his inner experiences left by the cobbler of Gòrlitz; to the experiences of the mystic marriages, the perception of fiery symbols, the progression from lugubrious depressed states through ecstasy to tranquility.

How it comes that in listening to the performances of ninety instrumentalists on their fiddles, pipes and horns, one should enter through such forbidden doors; that, it is not easy to explain. Perhaps the cause of the strange communication lies in Bruckner's predilection for themes of a chorale or hymn-like character. It is possible that it results from the general austere and yet strangely soft and tender character of his style. His harmony is rich, solemn, stately. He delighted in the use of full, grandiose progressions of chords in the brass, through which harp music sweeps. His climaxes are slow, distended, piercing; it is possible that the solemn tones of the trombones, the sobbing of horns through pulsating chords of shrilling wind and strings, are in some measure the origin of the sensations communicated. It may be that the general character of the work, merely, predisposes one to interpret so the ecstasies. We cannot say for sure. It is doubtful whether any analysis of form, no matter how keen and scientific it may be, can arrive at elucidating these mysteries of art. And yet, we know full well that just as, in some mysterious manner, the Bruckner scherzi bring one the sensations of being in the open air, of seeing the green earth and gray sky, so, too, the Bruckner adagios give us the sensations of an inner hallucinatory vision. The light that goes up in us from the chanting of the clear, high, loud orchestra in those movements, is not, we are somehow positive, the light that comes from the sun. It is not the light irradiated into an hundred tints by the orchestra of Debussy and the other impressionists. It is the dazzling shine that some dreaming men have suddenly seen piercing at them from out an opaque wall, or seen flooding upward at night from earth strewn thick with leaves.

PAUL ROSENFELD

(Reprinted from "Musical Chronicle," published by Harcourt Brace and Company)

TRANS MAR 16

109

Heifetz Plays With Boston Orchestra

MON. MAR. 16 –

Popular interest in the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra centered, naturally enough, in the appearance of Jascha Heifetz, who lent his baronial art to a meridian exposition of the Brahms Violin Concerto. The ovation accorded him from floor and platform alike broke down the imperturbability even of this fastidious artist, who smiled almost shyly in acknowledgment. Nor, without in the least detracting from his imperious performance, should the support vouchsafed him by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra be overlooked. No soloist could hope for better backing. The audience recognized the importance of this orchestral contribution, and gave the conductor more than the usual applause when he returned to the stage after the soloist had finally been released.

The concerto occupied the position immediately following the intermission. The place of honor immediately preceding that interval was allotted to a new Symphony in F major by Vladimir Dukelsky, a young Russian expatriate previously known to Boston only by a suite from his Ballet, "Zéphyr et Flore." M. Diaghileff claims credit for the "discovery" of this young composer, along with his two elder "brothers," Stravinsky and Prokofieff. It appeared to at least one listener yesterday afternoon that M. Diaghileff in this classification had been much too amiable to M. Dukelsky. M. Diaghileff also traces the composer's musical heredity back to his "grandfather," Glinka. But in this musical genealogy has not the immediate parenthood been overlooked? There is perhaps evidence of the influence of Prokofieff in the neo-classical form; and of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," certainly. But brush aside the film of modernity, and what have you? To this watcher the composer appears as a particularly ill-favored musical son of Tchaikovsky, attempting to conceal his lack of individuality by donning the cast-off toggery of his "elder brothers."

Mr. Heifetz was not the only soloist of the day. Mr. Louis Speyer distinguished himself by his playing of the English horn in the opening C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg Concerto for orchestra in D major, and again in the final number, Berlioz's Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain." This old concerto and like pieces of its period are always welcome because they give us repeated opportunity to enjoy the incandescence of the Boston strings. And those subscribers who left after the violin concerto missed one of the finest performances of the season. Theatrical stuff, this from Berlioz? Very likely; but a touch of the theater, a dash of Gallic liveliness, come not amiss after much Teutonic erudition. And there is nothing to be ashamed of in enjoying a good tune, sprightly rhythms and bright colors.

L. A. S.

CONCERT CALENDAR

TRANS MAR 16

JOSEF HOFMANN

The recital which Josef Hofmann will give in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 will be the great pianist's last appearance in Boston for two years, dividing his program between the music of Chopin and Liszt.

LAST MONDAY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fifth and last concert of the Monday evening series in Symphony hall, tomorrow evening, March 18, at 8:15.

Serge Koussevitzky will then present Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; Satie's "Gymnopedies," as orchestrated by Debussy; Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," based on the humorous ballad of Goethe, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the second and last pair of Young People's concerts this season, in Symphony hall, next Tuesday and Wednesday afternoon, March 19 and 20, at 4 o'clock.

Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will each conduct, and explanatory remarks will be given, with stereopticon slides, by Alfred H. Meyer.

PENSION FUND PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky announces an all Wagner program for the coming spring Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, March 24, at 3:30.

110

Herald

HERALD MAR. 16

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 19th concert of the 48th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg, concerto, D major, for orchestra. Dukelsky, symphony, F major—first time in the United States. Brahms, violin concerto (Jascha Heifetz, violinist). Berlioz, overture, "The Roman carnival."

Vladimir Dukelsky's symphony, composed in 1927-8, was first performed at one of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris on June 14, 1928. The name of the composer was not unkown in Boston before yesterday. A pleasing suite from his ballet "Zephyr et Flore" was performed here under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction two years ago next month; three of his songs were sung by Gertrude Ehrhart, in Jordan hall last January.

Mr. Diaghilev has called this composer, who is now in his 26th year, a younger brother of Stravinsky and Prokofieff. He does not seem to be so closely related. Whatever his musical parentage, he does not need any family recommendation. Perhaps he is musically an illegitimate child, a rather unruly one, but of a vigorous nature as have been many famous men born out of wedlock. What Dukelsky said to Edwin Evans two years ago was amusing; but not to be taken too seriously, for a young composer talking for publication, will be shyly reticent—this is seldom the case; pontifically priggish, or anxious to call attention to himself by epigrams, paradoxes, windy words to make the bourgeois sit up. Mr. Dukelsky indulged in at least one paradox: "I do hate all 'modernism', and I love being modern." After all this statement, carefully examined, is not so paradoxical as it seems, for he added: "I believe only in construction in the truly classical sense, knowing that it is more difficult to construct a fox-trot than to write a thousand poems on golden fishes, bald Chinamen, or oyster shells as the so-called 'modernists' do."

He went on to say, and sensibly: "We must, and will, undress music; it doesn't need the heavy coat of harmonies any more—winter is gone." The great Couperin, the younger Scarlatti, Mozart and Debussy would have grasped his meaning and approved. And in this symphony Dukelsky is found respecting the sonata form, referring to a scherzo section, and in the finale writing a canon.

The symphony is an interesting work. Like all the compositions of young men who are at all worthy of attention, in their joy of invention, in their desire to strike out a new path, to be individual, the symphonic first movement is yeasty. Here was need of the self-criticism that comes only with greater maturity. The thematic material is not in itself alluring. There are incongruous episodes interrupting noisily and ineffectively any development. It is as if the hearer were subjected to galvanic shocks. Yet even in this movement there is a proud independence—call it not arrogance or a foolish defiance—that wins respect if not wholehearted admiration. Better this wild irregularity than obsequious following in the footsteps of smug, dull music makers of whose works the damning compliment "Anyhow, they are well made" is all that can be said.

The second movement with its broad, flowing chief theme, ingeniously ornamented shows the Dukelsky of whose future one may entertain reasonable hopes; and the finale with its exciting rhythms, and not too scholastic treatment shows fancy as well as originality, though the rhythmic aggressiveness may be derived from Stravinsky.

The concert was a brilliant one. The slow movement of Emanuel Bach's concerto is nobly beautiful; even its great length does not bring the desire for an ending. The crispness and the virility of the other movements displayed the perfection of the strings and a few wind instruments. The ever-welcome "Roman Carnival" overture again proved—it additional proof were needed—that Mr. Koussevitzky has created a virtuoso orchestra of virtuoso players. The repetition of the word "virtuoso" is not here misplaced, for players of pronounced excellence do not always make a virtuoso ensemble.

Mr. Heifetz had not played here with the orchestra for 10 years. His technical proficiency was then recognized, but his interpretation was not conspicuous for musical or emotional qualities. Yesterday he gave a truly eloquent performance of Brahm's concerto. For sheer beauty of tone alone his playing would have been noteworthy, but in addition there was a display of musical appreciation of the concerto's contents, a warmth that was not forced into explosive passion, a refreshing absence of sentimentalism in the second movement. Even in passages of mere padding—from Brahms was a master at treading water until he could swim out for the familiar or a distant shore—Mr. Heifetz held the attention and ravished the ear. His treatment of the measures following the cadenza in the first movement will not be soon forgotten. The orchestra shared in his triumph.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will comprise Hill's symphony in B flat; "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, and the eighth symphony of Bruckner's which has not been played here for 20 years.

HEIFETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

POST MAR. 16

Memorable Performance of Brahm's Concerto Given

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since the coming of Mr. Koussevitzky soloists have not been plentiful at the Symphony concerts, and soloists of the first rank have been scarcer still. When, therefore, it was announced that Jascha Heifetz would appear as assisting artist at this week's pair of concerts, there was much anticipatory excitement, and that violinist's performance yesterday of the Concerto of Brahms took on the character of an event.

BECOMES THE VIOLINIST

Often, indeed prevailingly in recital, Mr. Heifetz has seemed, for all his remarkable powers, a singularly detached, almost apathetic performer. But let him play, as he did yesterday, a great concerto, with a great conductor and a great orchestra to accompany him, and he becomes himself, in the fullest sense of the word, a great violinist.

In some distant future, when another shall play this Concerto of Brahms at a Symphony Concert, the knowing ones will in all likelihood wag their heads sagely as they do now over Kreisler's and Dr. Muck's performance of that of Beethoven, and say: "Ah, but you should have heard Heifetz play it with Koussevitzky."

His Flawless Tone

It goes without saying that Mr. Heifetz brought to his playing of this Concerto yesterday the miraculous facility of execution that has long distinguished him, and his flawless tone. The august Brahms might hardly write a show-piece as such, yet the Concerto that he wrote for his friend Joachim bristles with difficulties. These Mr. Heifetz overcame with the expected ease, and with never a scratch or lapse of intonation. But not all could have been prepared for the warmth that yesterday he displayed, a warmth, since the music was Brahms, that ritly kept within certain bounds; or for the human note that entered into it and made his tone a living, breathing thing.

Possibly the orchestra fired him; certainly he fired the orchestra; and the result was this memorable performance. Nor was the audience unregaffful of these wonders. After the first and second movements Mr. Heifetz was roundly applauded, and at the end the multiplied recalls threatened to postpone indefinitely the ensuing and final number, Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

A Youngster's Symphony

Despite recent protests in the public prints and elsewhere, Mr. Koussevitzky continues to offer the music of the youthful moderns whom he so valiantly espouses. Yesterday came, for the first time in the United States, a Symphony by the 26-year-old Vladimir Dukelsky, already known here through a ballet-suite.

It would be difficult to be seriously annoyed with Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony, so amiably and ingeniously has he written it, with much melody and an unfailing gusto. But this melody, while copious and fluent, is sadly without distinction, and greatly at variance with the arbitrarily dissonant harmony that is used in a fashion curiously spasmodic. And Mr. Dukelsky has as yet little constructive power.

As a shrewd observer recently remarked apropos the Symphony of Janin played here a fortnight ago, one cannot let Mr. Dukelsky down easily by saying that his music is well-made.

A Philipp Bach Number

The Concerto of Philipp Emanuel Bach, arranged by Steinberg, that Mr. Koussevitzky had twice before played at a pair of Symphony Concerts, began the programme of yesterday.

Again the slow movement, with its prophetic suggestion of "Parsifal," proved the most fruitful in interest.

Globe Mar 16

HEIFETZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Performance in Brahms Concerto Superb

First American Performance of Symphony by Vladimir Dukelsky

Jascha Heifetz, appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in 10 years, won an ovation from orchestra and audience for his superb playing in the Brahms concerto at yesterday's Symphony concert. A new symphony by the young Russian composer, Vladimir Dukelsky, was performed for the first time in America. Steinberg's arrangement of a concerto by C. P. E. Bach and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture were the other numbers on a curiously assorted program.

The Heifetz yesterday's audience saw, impassive, with a melancholy masklike face, strangely old and world-weary for a young man only 28, contrasts startlingly with the Heifetz one remembers from a decade ago, an eager, charming boy, elated, but not intoxicated by his astonishing triumphs as a virtuoso. Zimbalist, who heard him play as a boy of 10, says that Heifetz as a child prodigy had the same superb mastery of his instrument which he displayed yesterday. A genius for playing the violin may develop early, as the more recent case of Menuhin would also indicate.

Yesterday's performance of Brahms' concerto had a curiously Russian quality, a nervous, half-melancholy, half-frenzied romanticism utterly un-Teutonic, suggesting Dostoievsky rather than Schiller. For this, both conductor and soloist were apparently responsible. The reading was vivid, powerful, unorthodox. The orchestra accompaniment was rather slipshod in details such as attacks, which are too often uneven, and a bit belated. Mr Koussevitzky does not give sufficiently clear and prompt signals to his men at times, or so it appears from the audience.

Dukelsky, born in 1903, has previously been represented at these concerts by some excerpts from a ballet, "Zphyr et Flore," played two years ago. His symphony in F, first performed at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris last Summer, has three movements, which are structurally more or less in accordance with classic precedent. There is, however, little or nothing that a classicist would recognize as harmony or counterpoint. The composer disclaims any intention of writing descriptive or pictorial music.

A listener biased rather for than against modernist music could not, at a first hearing, find much musical interest or importance in Dukelsky's symphony. Rhythms suggesting Stravinsky and American jazz but without the point and pungency of those in "Le Sacre" or in the best work of men like Gershwin, a slow movement with a banal Italianate melody disguised clumsily by an unnatural harmonization and pointless ejaculations from the percussion section of the orchestra; and a lively but quite unmemorable finale were all one could single out in the tonal melee. One felt that Dukelsky might write better in conventional 19th century style. But such first impressions cannot honestly masquerade as a judicial verdict. It is possible that further hearings might reveal beauties and profundities that went unnoticed yesterday.

Philipp Emanuel Bach might have difficulty in recognizing the elaborate orchestral piece Steinberg has made from a little chamber piece of his which Mr Koussevitzky once admired at a concert in Paris, and so had arranged. But the music has distinction and charm.

Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture sounded unusually clear and brilliant yesterday by contrast with the turgid orchestration of the Brahms concerto which preceded it. To one listener it was the most appealing and stirring music of the afternoon. Berlioz is among the most original figures in musical history. His themes are so unlike those of other composers that some critics to this day claim that Berlioz had no melodic invention. This overture alone should suffice to refute them.

Everyone concedes that Berlioz knew by instinct how to score music for a large orchestra. Compare this overture with a Beethoven or Brahms symphony, not to mention Schumann. It is to Liszt and Rimsky-Korsakov that one must turn for examples of orchestral music as sonorous and brilliant as Berlioz'. His rhythms, too, are vital and glowing in their clear intensity.

One wishes Mr Koussevitzky played Berlioz more often. He does it well, except for a tendency to exaggerate Berlioz' tempi and his dynamic contrasts, which, as they stand in the score, are sufficiently dramatic.

The program for next week includes the symphony by Prof E. B. Hill first played last year, Dukas' "Sorceror's Apprentice"; and Bruckner's Eighth Symphony.

P. R.

MUSIC

MAR 16. GLOBE

When Critics Disagree

Lawrence Gilman published last Sunday in the New York Herald Tribune one of his inimitably readable little essays with the title "When critics disagree," which may furnish the point of departure for a few remarks on a perennial topic. For any reader of the reviews, say, of the Boston Symphony concerts printed in half a dozen newspapers in this city, will not need to be told that critics of music do frequently disagree. To one one man Mr Koussevitzky's reading of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" will be poetic, dramatic, inspired. To another it will be an unpardonable violation of the letter and the spirit of the score. To some Bloch's "America" is a masterpiece, to others an amazing and annoying potpourri of trivial popular tunes, and so it goes.

Mr Gilman's examples to prove this point follow, and his conclusion:

"Mr John F. Runciman, one of the most eminent of Wagnerian critics, thought that the 'Redemption' theme which ends 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' bespeaks 'the great lyrical Wagner'; Mr Bernard Shaw thinks 'it might easily be the climax of a popular sentimental ballad.' Mr James Huneker was savagely contemptuous of the music of 'Parsifal'; Mr Ernest Newman thinks 'Parsifal' is 'in many ways the most wonderful and impressive thing ever done in music.' Mr Aldrich thinks a melody of Berlioz 'poor and pale'; Mr Hale thinks it 'beautiful and expressive.' Mr Krehbiel thought that 'nine-tenths of the music of "Pelleas et Melisande" is a dreary monotony'; others think that nine-tenths of 'Pelleas' is among the rarest achievments of the musical imagination.

"In the face of all this, is it not somewhat unrealistic to go on talking of absolute standards in the appraisal of musical values as if there really were such things—except within the narrowest limitations? Is it not foolish to pretend that there is any such thing as an impersonal judgment in asthetic matters? All asthetic judgments, declared Mr Runciman, a good many years ago, are 'the result of art playing upon a certain personality; we must know something of the critic's intellectual and imaginative personality to know the value of the art. . . . In the production of all good art criticism, the personality of the critic is the most important factor.'

"The belief that you can get at the artist except through the critic, with his virtues or his limitations thick upon him, is, unfortunately, a delusion. For if the critic is not Aldrich or Hale or Runciman or Newman or Huneker or Krehbiel, he is quite likely to be—yourself."

Parading Prejudices

Mr Gilman, then, approves of the familiar remark of Anatole France, that criticism is merely "the adventures of a soul among the masterpieces." Everything depends, it would seem, upon the quality of the critic's soul, since masterpieces have no quality of their own independent of human judment upon them.

Most of the younger generation of critics of music, the drama, and literature in this country have too evidently accepted the letter, though not the spirit of this maxim of Anatole France. Does not Mr Mencken, for example, collect his essays and publish them in volumes entitled "Prejudices"? Do not most young reviewers now write as though their personality was what readers wished to learn? Mr George Jean Nathan, when he finds a dull play, sometimes tells us in his review not why he thinks it dull, but how he read such and such a novel while the performance was going on and then went away during the second act to patronize his favorite speakeasy. This is a pity, since Mr Nathan's reasons for finding a play dull, when he deigns to offer them, are usually interesting and often convincing.

Several New York reviewers of music, though not Mr Gilman sometimes offer their readers what they would perhaps call "wisecracks" at the expense of performers and music instead of a serious attempt to give an impersonal and impartial opinion. The "wisecracks" might be even more amusing if the critics turned, as some of them have done, to the writing of humorous "columns," not tied down to so serious and so dull a topic as music, and the performance of music.

It is, of course, true, that nobody can prove mathematically or logically that Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is a masterpiece and Nevin's "Rosary" bad art. But how many of the truths that make life endurable are capable of really scientific demonstration? Must we not take our music, as we take our wives and our religion, very largely on faith? Do absolute standards of a coldly and purely intellectual character, exist outside of the minds of a few mathematicians and scientists? Music, when treated scientifically becomes mere acoustics, which is a branch of physics, not of art.

Seeking Impartiality

Granted that every musical review should be read as though it began in large letters with the remark, "this is merely one man's opinion," does it follow that flippancy and trivial personalities should fill the review? Reviewers, like the rest of the audience, know what they like, even though they don't know anything about "Art." But the reviewer, unlike the plain man knows why he likes it, or why he dislikes it, unless he is a mere trifler and dabbler.

Is not what people who have been to a concert, and perhaps, people who have given a concert want, if they want to read a musical review of it at all, a clear and fair minded statement of the critic's reasons for liking or not liking music or performance?

In a very limited class of cases these reasons are based on measurable observed fact. If wrong notes occur that is not a matter of opinion. If a piece marked andante is played very fast there is no doubt that it was not played "andante." But if the critic feels that the performance was "not in the spirit of the music" he should try and explain what he thinks the music really ought to sound like, and how the interpretation differed from this ideal of his. He can not speak with absolute authority. Colleagues of greater or less renown and experience may differ from him. But the fact that it is not his job to say the final word on the subject does not mean that the critic should take to mere clowning and "smart aleck" tricks.

The critic will, of course, be bound by his temperament and his prejudices, but should he glory in the fact and flaunt it in the face of his public, casting all attempts at fairness and impartiality to the winds?

It is very easy to be glib and flippant, very much harder to try to be fair and to think things through. The reviewer's first duty is to strive for an unattainable ideal of fairness and clearness, not to indulge in cheap and facile attempts at "wit."

Heifetz, who for some years past has played here only in recital, will reappear as soloist with the Boston Symphony this week in the Brahms concerts. The novelty on Mr Koussevitzky's program is to be a new symphony by the young Russian composer Dukelsky, several of whose works have been heard previously without rousing unusual enthusiasm.

For the Tuesday concerts Mr Koussevitzky adheres to his announced intention of offering only standard works. This week two familiar romantic symphonies, and the most popular of Berlioz's overtures will fill the third of the Tuesday programs.

Josef [illegible], most of whose time is now absorbed by his duties as director of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, will not be heard here for two years, it is announced, after his Symphony Hall recital of next Sunday.

At the Young People's Concerts of the Boston Symphony March 19 and 20, Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will both conduct the following program: Movements from Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso, Prokofieff's "Clasical" Symphony, an Arioso of Bach, with Jean Bedetti as "cello soloist; Movements from Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Johann Strauss' Waltz, "Vienna Blood." There is a public sale at the box office, and the remainder of the seats will be distributed through the schools of Boston.

At the closing Monday evening concert, Koussevitzky will present Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, [illegible] numbers shortly to be announced.

Both Mr Stokowski and his Philadelphians and Mr Koussevitzky and his Bostonians are recording for a phonograph company, as you know. Well, Mr Koussevitzky had it much on his mind to do Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony until Mr Stokowski was apprised of his design, and without asking anyone's advice promptly recorded that opus himself. * * * So at least runs the tale, though for its accuracy we are the last to vouch. Suetonius Jr. in the [illegible]lyn

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE MAR 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make this week what is apparently a record number of appearances in Symphony Hall, apart from such special occasions as the Beethoven Festival in 1927. The last Monday concert, two programs for young people on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, the usual two concerts in the regular series, and a pension fund concert next Sunday. Except for some of the Wagner numbers at the pension fund concert, and the Bruckner symphony on the regular program Mr Koussevitzky has, quite naturally, made his programs from familiar repertory pieces. Bruckner, regarded in Germany and Austria as one of the leading composers of the past century, has not been represented on Boston programs since the [illegible]

A limited number of tickets for the Boston Symphony young people's concerts have been reserved at the box office for public sale. The rest of the house will be filled with young people from public and private schools in and near Boston, whose tickets have been distributed at a nominal price through the schools. Alfred H. Meyer will talk briefly, with the aid of stereopticon slides, about the music to be played. Mr Koussevitzky will conduct part of the program.

110

Herald

HERALD MAR. 16

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 19th concert of the 48th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg, concerto, D major, for orchestra. Dukelsky, symphony, F major—first time in the United States. Brahms, violin concerto (Jascha Heifetz, violinist). Berlioz, overture, "The Roman carnival."

Vladimir Dukelsky's symphony, composed in 1927-8, was first performed at one of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris on June 14, 1928. The name of the composer was not unkown in Boston before yesterday. A pleasing suite from his ballet "Zephyr et Flore" was performed here under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction two years ago next month; three of his songs were sung by Gertrude Ehrhart, in Jordan hall last January.

Mr. Diaghilev has called this composer, who is now in his 26th year, a younger brother of Stravinsky and Prokofieff. He does not seem to be so closely related. Whatever his musical parentage, he does not need any family recommendation. Perhaps he is musically an illegitimate child, a rather unruly one, but of a vigorous nature as have been many famous men born out of wedlock. What Dukelsky said to Edwin Evans two years ago was amusing; but not to be taken too seriously, for a young composer talking for publication, will be shyly reticent—this is seldom the case; pontifically priggish, or anxious to call attention to himself by epigrams, paradoxes, windy words to make the bourgeois sit up. Mr. Dukelsky indulged in at least one paradox: "I do hate all 'modernism', and I love being modern." After all this statement, carefully examined, is not so paradoxical as it seems, for he added: "I believe only in construction in the truly classical sense, knowing that it is more difficult to construct a fox-trot than to write a thousand poems on golden fishes, bald Chinamen, or oyster shells as the so-called 'modernists' do."

He went on to say, and sensibly: "We must, and will, undress music; it doesn't need the heavy coat of harmonies any more—winter is gone." The great Couperin, the younger Scarlatti, Mozart and Debussy would have grasped his meaning and approved. And in this symphony Dukelsky is found respecting the sonata form, referring to a scherzo section, and in the finale writing a canon.

The symphony is an interesting work. Like all the compositions of young men who are at all worthy of attention, in their joy of invention, in their desire to strike out a new path, to be individual, the symphonic first movement is yeasty. Here was need of the self-criticism that comes only with greater maturity. The thematic material is not in itself alluring. There are incongruous episodes interrupting noisily and ineffectively any development. It is as if the hearer were subjected to galvanic shocks. Yet even in this movement there is a proud independence—call it not arrogance or a foolish defiance—that wins respect if not wholehearted admiration. Better this wild irregularity than obsequious following in the footsteps of smug, dull music makers of whose works the damning compliment "Anyhow, they are well made" is all that can be said.

The second movement with its broad, flowing chief theme, ingeniously ornamented shows the Dukelsky of whose future one may entertain reasonable hopes; and the finale with its exciting rhythms, and not too scholastic treatment shows fancy as well as originality, though the rhythmic aggressiveness may be derived from Stravinsky.

The concert was a brilliant one. The slow movement of Emanuel Bach's concerto is nobly beautiful; even its great length does not bring the desire for an ending. The crispness and the virility of the other movements displayed the perfection of the strings and a few wind instruments. The ever-welcome "Roman Carnival" overture again proved—it additional proof were needed—that Mr. Koussevitzky has created a virtuoso orchestra of virtuoso players. The repetition of the word "virtuoso" is not here misplaced, for players of pronounced excellence do not always make a virtuoso ensemble.

Mr. Heifetz had not played here with the orchestra for 10 years. His technical proficiency was then recognized, but his interpretation was not conspicuous for musical or emotional qualities. Yesterday he gave a truly eloquent performance of Brahm's concerto. For sheer beauty of tone alone his playing would have been noteworthy, but in addition there was a display of musical appreciation of the concerto's contents, a warmth that was not forced into explosive passion, a refreshing absence of sentimentalism in the second movement. Even in passages of mere padding—from Brahms was a master at treading water until he could swim out for the familiar or a distant shore—Mr. Heifetz held the attention and ravished the ear. His treatment of the measures following the cadenza in the first movement will not be soon forgotten. The orchestra shared in his triumph.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will comprise Hill's symphony in B flat; "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, and the eighth symphony of Bruckner's which has not been played here for 20 years.

HEIFETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

POST MAR. 16

Memorable Performance of Brahm's Concerto Given

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since the coming of Mr. Koussevitzky soloists have not been plentiful at the Symphony concerts, and soloists of the first rank have been scarcer still. When, therefore, it was announced that Jascha Heifetz would appear as assisting artist at this week's pair of concerts, there was much anticipatory excitement, and that violinist's performance yesterday of the Concerto of Brahms took on the character of an event.

BECOMES THE VIOLINIST

Often, indeed prevailingly in recital, Mr. Heifetz has seemed, for all his remarkable powers, a singularly detached, almost apathetic performer. But let him play, as he did yesterday, a great concerto, with a great conductor and a great orchestra to accompany him, and he becomes himself, in the fullest sense of the word, a great violinist.

In some distant future, when another shall play this Concerto of Brahms at a Symphony Concert, the knowing ones will in all likelihood wag their heads sagely as they do now over Kreisler's and Dr. Muck's performance of that of Beethoven, and say: "Ah, but you should have heard Heifetz play it with Koussevitzky."

His Flawless Tone

It goes without saying that Mr. Heifetz brought to his playing of this Concerto yesterday the miraculous facility of execution that has long distinguished him, and his flawless tone. The august Brahms might hardly write a show-piece as such, yet the Concerto that he wrote for his friend Joachim bristles with difficulties. These Mr. Heifetz overcame with the expected ease, and with never a scratch or lapse of intonation. But not all could have been prepared for the warmth that yesterday he displayed, a warmth, since the music was Brahms, that fitly kept within certain bounds; or for the human note that entered into it and made his tone a living, breathing thing.

Possibly the orchestra fired him; certainly he fired the orchestra; and the result was this memorable performance. Nor was the audience unregardful of these wonders. After the first and second movements Mr. Heifetz was roundly applauded, and at the end the multiplied recalls threatened to postpone indefinitely the ensuing and final number, Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

A Youngster's Symphony

Despite recent protests in the public prints and elsewhere, Mr. Koussevitzky continues to offer the music of the youthful moderns whom he so valiantly espouses. Yesterday came, for the first time in the United States, a Symphony by the 26-year-old Vladimir Dukelsky, already known here through a ballet-suite.

It would be difficult to be seriously annoyed with Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony, so amiably and ingeniously has he written it, with much melody and an unfailing gusto. But this melody, while copious and fluent, is sadly without distinction, and greatly at variance with the arbitrarily dissonant harmony that is used in a fashion curiously spasmodic. And Mr. Dukelsky has as yet little constructive power.

As a shrewd observer recently remarked apropos the Symphony of Janin played here a fortnight ago, one cannot let Mr. Dukelsky down easily by saying that his music is well-made.

A Philipp Bach Number

The Concerto of Philipp Emanuel Bach, arranged by Steinberg, that Mr. Koussevitzky had twice before played at a pair of Symphony Concerts, began the programme of yesterday.

Again the slow movement, with its prophetic suggestion of "Parsifal," proved the most fruitful in interest.

Globe Mar 16

HEIFETZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Performance in Brahms Concerto Superb

First American Performance of Symphony by Vladimir Dukelsky

Jascha Heifetz, appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in 10 years, won an ovation from orchestra and audience for his superb playing in the Brahms concerto at yesterday's Symphony concert. A new symphony by the young Russian composer, Vladimir Dukelsky, was performed for the first time in America. Steinberg's arrangement of a concerto by C. P. E. Bach and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture were the other numbers on a curiously assorted program.

The Heifetz yesterday's audience saw, impassive, with a melancholy masklike face, strangely old and world-weary for a young man only 28, contrasts startlingly with the Heifetz one remembers from a decade ago, an eager, charming boy, elated, but not intoxicated by his astonishing triumphs as a virtuoso. Zimbalist, who heard him play as a boy of 10, says that Heifetz as a child prodigy had the same superb mastery of his instrument which he displayed yesterday. A genius for playing the violin may develop early, as the more recent case of Menuhin would also indicate.

Yesterday's performance of Brahms' concerto had a curiously Russian quality, a nervous, half-melancholy, half-frenzied romanticism utterly un-Teutonic, suggesting Dostoievsky rather than Schiller. For this, both conductor and soloist were apparently responsible. The reading was vivid, powerful, unorthodox. The orchestra accompaniment was rather slipshod in details such as attacks, which are too often uneven, and a bit belated. Mr Koussevitzky does not give sufficiently clear and prompt signals to his men at times, or so it appears from the audience.

Dukelsky, born in 1903, has previously been represented at these concerts by some excerpts from a ballet, "Zphyr et Flore," played two years ago. His symphony in F, first performed at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris last Summer, has three movements, which are structurally more or less in accordance with classic precedent. There is, however, little or nothing that a classicist would recognize as harmony or counterpoint. The composer disclaims any intention of writing descriptive or pictorial music.

A listener biased rather for than against modernist music could not, at a first hearing, find much musical interest or importance in Dukelsky's symphony. Rhythms suggesting Stravinsky and American jazz but without the point and pungency of those in "Le Sacre" or in the best work of men like Gershwin, a slow movement with a banal Italianate melody disguised clumsily by an unnatural harmonization and pointless ejaculations from the percussion section of the orchestra; and a lively but quite unmemorable finale were all one could single out in the tonal melee. One felt that Dukelsky might write better in conventional 19th century style. But such first impressions cannot honestly masquerade as a judicial verdict. It is possible that further hearings might reveal beauties and profundities that went unnoticed yesterday.

Philipp Emanuel Bach might have difficulty in recognizing the elaborate orchestral piece Steinberg has made from a little chamber piece of his which Mr Koussevitzky once admired at a concert in Paris, and so had arranged. But the music has distinction and charm.

Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture sounded unusually clear and brilliant yesterday by contrast with the turgid orchestration of the Brahms concerto which preceded it. To one listener it was the most appealing and stirring music of the afternoon. Berlioz is among the most original figures in musical history. His themes are so unlike those of other composers that some critics to this day claim that Berlioz had no melodic invention. This overture alone should suffice to refute them.

Everyone concedes that Berlioz knew by instinct how to score music for a large orchestra. Compare this overture with a Beethoven or Brahms symphony, not to mention Schumann. It is to Liszt and Rimsky-Korsakov that one must turn for examples of orchestral music as sonorous and brilliant as Berlioz'. His rhythms, too, are vital and glowing in their clear intensity.

One wishes Mr Koussevitzky played Berlioz more often. He does it well, except for a tendency to exaggerate Berlioz' tempi and his dynamic contrasts, which, as they stand in the score, are sufficiently dramatic.

The program for next week includes the symphony by Prof E. B. Hill first played last year, Dukas' "Sorceror's Apprentice"; and Bruckner's Eighth Symphony.

P. R.

MUSIC

MAR 16. GLOBE

When Critics Disagree

Lawrence Gilman published last Sunday in the New York Herald Tribune one of his inimitably readable little essays with the title "When critics disagree," which may furnish the point of departure for a few remarks on a perennial topic. For any reader of the reviews, say, of the Boston Symphony concerts printed in half a dozen newspapers in this city, will not need to be told that critics of music do frequently disagree. To one one man Mr Koussevitzky's reading of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" will be poetic, dramatic, inspired. To another it will be an unpardonable violation of the letter and the spirit of the score. To some Bloch's "America" is a masterpiece, to others an amazing and annoying potpourri of trivial popular tunes, and so it goes.

Mr Gilman's examples to prove this point follow, and his conclusion:

"Mr John F. Runciman, one of the most eminent of Wagnerian critics, thought that the 'Redemption' theme which ends 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' bespeaks 'the great lyrical Wagner'; Mr Bernard Shaw thinks 'it might easily be the climax of a popular sentimental ballad.' Mr James Huneker was savagely contemptuous of the music of 'Parsifal'; Mr Ernest Newman thinks 'Parsifal' is 'in many ways the most wonderful and impressive thing ever done in music.' Mr Aldrich thinks a melody of Berlioz 'poor and pale'; Mr Hale thinks it 'beautiful and expressive.' Mr Krehbiel thought that 'nine-tenths of the music of "Pelleas et Melisande" is a dreary monotony'; others think that nine-tenths of 'Pelleas' is among the rarest achievements of the musical imagination.

"In the face of all this, is it not somewhat unrealistic to go on talking of absolute standards in the appraisal of musical values as if there really were such things—except within the narrowest limitations? Is it not foolish to pretend that there is any such thing as an impersonal judgment in asthetic matters? All asthetic judgments, declared Mr Runciman, a good many years ago, are 'the result of art playing upon a certain personality; we must know something of the critic's intellectual and imaginative personality to know the value of the art. . . . In the production of all good art criticism, the personality of the critic is the most important factor.'

"The belief that you can get at the artist except through the critic, with his virtues or his limitations thick upon him, is, unfortunately, a delusion. For if the critic is not Aldrich or Hale or Runciman or Newman or Huneker or Krehbiel, he is quite likely to be—yourself."

Parading Prejudices

Mr Gilman, then, approves of the familiar remark of Anatole France, that criticism is merely "the adventures of a soul among the masterpieces." Everything depends, it would seem, upon the quality of the critic's soul, since masterpieces have no quality of their own independent of human judment upon them.

Most of the younger generation of critics of music, the drama, and literature in this country have too evidently accepted the letter, though not the spirit of this maxim of Anatole France. Does not Mr Mencken, for example, collect his essays and publish them in volumes entitled "Prejudices"? Do not most young reviewers now write as though their personality was what readers wished to learn? Mr George Jean Nathan, when he finds a dull play, sometimes tells us in his review not why he thinks it dull, but how he read such and such a novel while the performance was going on and then went away during the second act to patronize his favorite speakeasy. This is a pity, since Mr Nathan's reasons for finding a play dull, when he deigns to offer them, are usually interesting and often convincing.

Several New York reviewers of music, though not Mr Gilman sometimes offer their readers what they would perhaps call "wisecracks" at the expense of performers and music instead of a serious attempt to give an impersonal and impartial opinion. The "wisecracks" might be even more amusing if the critics turned, as some of them have done to the writing of humorous "columns," not tied down to so serious and so dull a topic as music, and the performance of music.

It is, of course, true, that nobody can prove mathematically or logically that Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is a masterpiece and Nevin's "Rosary" bad art. But how many of the truths that make life endurable are capable of really scientific demonstration? Must we not take our music, as we take our wives and our religion, very largely on faith? Do absolute standards of a coldly and purely intellectual character, exist outside of the minds of a few mathematicians and scientists? Music, when treated scientifically becomes mere acoustics, which is a branch of physics, not of art.

Seeking Impartiality

Granted that every musical review should be read as though it began in large letters with the remark, "this is merely one man's opinion," does it follow that flippancy and trivial personalities should fill the review? Reviewers, like the rest of the audience, know what they like, even though they don't know anything about "art." But the reviewer, unlike the plain man knows why he likes it, or why he dislikes it, unless he is a mere trifler and dabbler.

Is not what people who have been to a concert, and perhaps, people who have given a concert want, if they want to read a musical review of it at all, a clear and fair minded statement of the critic's reasons for liking or not liking music or performance? In a very limited class of cases these reasons are based on measurable observed fact. If wrong notes occur that is not a matter of opinion. If a piece marked andante is played very fast there is no doubt that it was not played "andante." But if the critic feels that the performance was "not in the spirit of the music" he should try and explain what he thinks the music really ought to sound like, and how the interpretation differed from this ideal of his. He can not speak with absolute authority. Colleagues of greater or less renown and experience may differ from him. But the fact that it is not his job to say the final word on the subject does not mean that the critic should take to mere clowning and "smart aleck" tricks.

The critic will, of course, be bound by his temperament and his prejudices, but should he glory in the fact and flaunt it in the face of his public, casting all attempts at fairness and impartiality to the winds?

It is very easy to be glib and flippant, very much harder to try to be fair and to think things through. The reviewer's first duty is to strive for an unattainable ideal of fairness and clearness, not to indulge in cheap and facile attempts at "wit."

Heifetz, who for some years past has played here only in recital, will reappear as soloist with the Boston Symphony this week in the Brahms concerts. The novelty on Mr Koussevitzky's program is to be a new symphony by the young Russian composer Dukelsky, several of whose works have been heard previously without rousing unusual enthusiasm.

For the Tuesday concerts Mr Koussevitzky adheres to his announced intention of offering only standard works. This week two familiar romantic symphonies, and the most popular of Berlioz's overtures will fill the third of the Tuesday programs.

Josef Hofmann, most of whose time is now absorbed by his duties as director of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, will not be heard here for two years, it is announced, after his Symphony Hall recital of next Sunday.

At the Young People's Concerts of the Boston Symphony March 19 and 20, Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will both conduct the following program: Movements from Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso, Prokofieff's "Clasical" Symphony, an Arioso of Bach, with Jean Bedetti as "cello soloist; Movements from Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Johann Strauss' Waltz, "Vienna Blood." There is a public sale at the box office, and the remainder of the seats will be distributed through the schools of Boston.

At the closing Monday evening concert, Koussevitzky will present Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, [illegible] numbers shortly to be announced.

Both Mr Stokowski and his Philadelphians and Mr Koussevitzky and his Bostonians are recording for a phonograph company, as you know. Well, Mr Koussevitzky had it much on his mind to do Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony until Mr Stokowski was apprised of his design, and without asking anyone's advice promptly recorded that opus himself. * * * So at least runs the tale, though for its accuracy we are the last to vouch. Suetonius Jr. in the [illegible]klyn

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE MAR 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make this week what is apparently a record number of appearances in Symphony Hall, apart from such special occasions as the Beethoven Festival in 1927. The last Monday concert, two programs for young people on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, the usual two concerts in the regular series, and a pension fund concert next Sunday. Except for some of the Wagner numbers at the pension fund concert, and the Bruckner symphony on the regular program Mr Koussevitzky has, quite naturally, made his programs from familiar repertory pieces. Bruckner, regarded in Germany and Austria as one of the leading composers of the past century, has not been represented on Boston programs since the [illegible]

A limited number of tickets for the Boston Symphony young people's concerts have been reserved at the box office for public sale. The rest of the house will be filled with young people from public and private schools in and near Boston, whose tickets have been distributed at a nominal price through the schools. Alfred H. Meyer will talk briefly, with the aid of stereopticon slides, about the music to be played. Mr Koussevitzky will conduct part of the program.

Heifetz Afresh, Young Moderns And "Old Bach"

TRANS. MAR. 18

From The Symphony Concert To the Flute-Players, Most Hospitable

THERE WERE unusual honors and fervors at the Symphony Concert of Saturday. No sooner had Mr. Heifetz appeared to play Brahms's Violin-Concerto than the whole orchestra rose to its feet and hailed him with clapping long and loud. The audience added their hands vigorously. Through two or three minutes the applause crackled; before and behind the violinist bowed; while, as some said, his habitual composure was perceptibly shaken. At the end of the Concerto, feet stamped and throats shouted—rare exuberance in this town; but few had listened without emotion and of a Saturday, in these days of Mr. Koussevitzky, free spirits gather in Symphony Hall. Yet as grateful to Mr. Heifetz must have been the rapt listening of the men of the orchestra at every pause in their several parts. For the more one is master, the more does he treasure the regard of fellow-craftsmen. More than once the orchestra has risen in deference to a guest-conductor or in welcome to its own returning leader. But when, in the past did it do as much, and of its own will, for a visiting virtuoso? Nor was the audience content until, at the return of Mr. Koussevitzky, it had brought both conductor and players to their feet.

Mr. Heifetz is no violinist of mood and impulse. He measures and controls his powers. He prepares a piece and the preparation is complete. In performance the musical, not the personal, equation sways him. Therefore his playing of Brahms's Concerto on Saturday seemed almost an exact replica of his playing of that piece on Friday. Yet there was new occasion to observe, especially in the long-drawn "passage-work" of the first movement, the undulant, the vibrant quality in his tone giving life to every measure. It is not in the same world with the tremolo by which violinists of the baser sort smear out sentiment. It is not even a vibrato in the full musical sense of that term. Rather, it is the intuitive inflection—the exact word is hard to find—that is vitalizing spark to the note or the phrase at each passing instant. The responsive sensibility of a musician, the imparting instinct of a virtuoso—each at finest—join together to generate it. Again to be noted was the beauty of Mr. Heifetz's tone as it moved, through the slow song, against the mezza voce (so to say) of the string choir. The literary-minded recalled the Latin poet's "moon amongst lesser stars." The graphic-minded thought of the glowing velvet in some Venetian portrait crossed by a golden pattern woven fine and clear. The merely musical said "euphony" and held their breaths to listen. And who, having heard Mr. Heifetz's light hand upon the finale, will ever again reproach it as heavy-gaited?

From the younger generation Mr. Koussevitzky has not lately found a more fortunate "modern instance" than Dukelsky's Symphony. On Saturday, as on Friday, applause that was more than polite and scattering rewarded it; while on both occasions it was played to no restless audience. For once, even the unreconciled to the newer musical courses found the dissonances of the first movement forgivable, so plainly were they born of young energy engrossed in creation, speaking the speech that was natural utterance. Quickly, too, they resolved themselves into sonorities that stirred the ear; while page upon page pressed forward, fertile, vigorous, warm-blooded. At last a youthful, a modern, symphonist was to be heard, molding form to substance, to both giving rhythmical life and manifold voice. In many ears the slow movement sang broadly and richly out of well-conceived matter in well-conducted course. Through it clear musical imagination was ranging. The finale proceeds fitfully; the listener fancies that he hears the play of the changeful Russian temperament, brightening and darkening like a spring sky. Then the young energy returns, possesses and drives forward to the full-voiced close. Already Dukelsky can turn current formulas and fashions into individual and imaginative line. That way lies a "modernism" stimulating to hear.

Incidents and Prospects

Those omniscient persons who discovered this and that motive on Mr. Koussevitzky's part for the repetition of Bloch's "America" at the Symphony concerts may be reminded that on Friday and Saturday next Mr. Stock will repeat the Rhapsody in Chicago—for precisely the reason that actuated the Boston conductor, to wit, faith in, and admiration for, the piece. Curiously, Mr. Stock will also mate it with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

What passes through the minds of conductors while they are making programs none but themselves may know. . . . The other day in New York, Mr. Toscanini included in one of his lists Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony," long one of Mr. Koussevitzky's "specialties." On a program for next week at Symphony Hall stands Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Not long ago Mr. Toscanini proffered it to New York with loud applause.

The Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra, written by Debussy on commission from the late Mrs. Hall of Boston, reappeared last month at a concert of the Paris Symphony Orchestra. That band has also played, as concert-piece, Stravinsky's recent ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss." No doubt we shall hear it in Boston next season.

THE BOSTON HERALD
MONDAY, MARCH 18, 1929

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was never more brilliant than it is today. It is not an exaggeration to say that it is one of the three greatest orchestras in the world, a possession that any metropolis—London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, New York, or Buenos Aires—would boast of and revere. Bostonians who attend its concerts know its value. Every year many who pay for seats also contribute to the deficit fund. This year the deficit will be about $135,000, of which about $90,000 has already been subscribed. A symphony orchestra, like any superlative artistic organization, is an expensive accessory, but more of a necessity than a luxury. Boston would be a poor place to live in without her great library, the Museum of Fine Arts, and the orchestra.

And yet the orchestra, the most animated and perhaps the most naturally appealing of these three institutions, has the smallest following. To a certain degree this is inevitable. Symphony Hall is not a large hall as auditoriums go today, and the price of seats must be so high that the deficit will not be overwhelming. It is doubtful if the regular attendants of the five series of concerts (including the children's series) number more than 15,000 persons. When we consider that there are more than 1,500,000 people in Greater Boston, the number seems pitifully small. Is it any wonder that the symphony orchestra is only a name to the man in the street?

Granted that the appreciation of fine music is not every man's gift, cannot the orchestra's public be doubled or tripled in size? Unquestionably there are many men and women who are prevented from hearing the orchestra because of the prices of the tickets. The cost of taking himself, his wife and two or three children, to a concert is prohibitive to the man of small income. And yet, if the orchestra is to be a truly great inspirational and cultural factor in the community, it should be as accessible as the large motion picture theatres. We wonder if jazz would so predominate in popularity if classical music could be heard as easily. We do not ask that the orchestra in any way lower its standards or that it try to compete with other forms of amusement that the city now affords. We merely suggest that the orchestra is not doing all that it is capable of doing until every man and woman who wants to hear it hears it. After all, the orchestra is not self-sufficient. The beauty and vitality of fine music does not exist until it is heard. The greater its audience, the more souls it fills with glory, and the more men and women it momentarily lifts from the worries and sorrows of everyday life. And the sad part of it is that the people who most need the comfort and inspiration of great music are usually those who can least afford to hear it.

It is possible that one practical obstacle in the path of such a goal has been removed. The new Boston Garden seats 18,000 persons. If an admission charge of only 25 cents were made, $4500 would be realized, more than enough to pay the cost of engaging the hall and probably leaving something toward the running expenses of the orchestra. An admission fee of but ten cents would probably cover the cost of using the Garden instead of Symphony Hall. The only difficulty seems to lie in the question of the Garden's acoustics for orchestral music. But the Royal Belgian Guards band of eighty men is to give a symphonic program there April 3, and a study of the acoustics then should decide the question. The Garden's existence offers an opportunity to which the orchestra's trustees should not close their eyes. Three or four concerts there during a season would make the orchestra thousands of new friends.

A teacher in one of Boston's schools used to warn his English class of the danger of using the word "perfect" in describing things or persons of only superior merit. "There is only one thing that I know of that can be called perfect," he always said in ending the discussion, "and that is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Is a perfect thing too holy to be enjoyed only by the few?

SYMPHONY GIVES MONDAY CONCERT

Brilliant Playing Draws Enthusiastic Applause

GLOBE — MAR. 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night at Symphony Hall the fifth concert of its Monday evening series. C. P. E. Bach's D major concerto for orchestra, Satie's "Gymnopedies" (orchestrated by Debussy), Dukas' so-called Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony made up an attractive program which, excellently played, drew an exceptionally enthusiastic response from the large audience.

The young Bach's D major concerto, which Mr Koussevitzky introduced last Friday to his audience of the regular series, improves upon further acquaintance. The genial vigor and individual flavor of the two fast movements, their consummate musical craftsmanship, the moving beauty of the noble Andante, are the work of a composer who deserves to be better known by musicians and music-lovers, and who should be ranked higher by historians of the art.

Certainly this work of the humble Carl Philipp Emanuel is much superior to some things of his illustrious father, Johann Sebastian, that are still performed. It is improbable that Steinberg by his effective orchestration has falsified our view of its quality. It was admirably performed.

Debussy's delicate orchestrations of two of the strangely beautiful and disarmingly simple "Gymnopedies" of that queer genius Satie received an exquisitely apt performance. They were taken at a tempo slower than would be possible in their original pianoforte versions, but which suggested well the Greek ritual dances that had inspired them.

The cleverly illustrative "scherzo" which Dukas wrote "after" Goethe's famous ballad of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" drew from Mr Koussevitzky and his orchestra a performance well proportioned and certainly not lacking in brilliance, but which seemed a shade too careful and controlled to reach the heights of breathless excitement at which the composer aimed.

A masterly rendering of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony concluded the program. Mr Koussevitzky's admirable reading of this work is well known here by now. Under his baton the orchestra brought out with the utmost conviction, yet without the exaggeration one might have feared, all its somber, brooding, Slavonic color, its drama, its warm, if somewhat too melting, lyricism, its final overwhelming, defiant brilliance.

The enthusiasm of the audience recalled Mr Koussevitzky four times. On his last reappearance he shook the concertmaster, Mr Burgin, by the hand and motioned to his men to rise to receive the applause they deserved.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, MARCH 19, 1929

Satie and Dukas With Chaikovsky

TO say that it was an enthusiastic audience that took leave of the Monday concerts, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of Serge Koussevitzky last evening, would be to use the language of the lame, the halt and the blind. One might rise to the over-worked "ovation," and still be telling less than the truth. For that term has been used over and over again for the kind of approval which was expressed at the time of the intermission, when Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" had just been played. At the end, after an exceptionally powerful climax with Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, people in the front rows remained in their seats, smiting hand upon hand as though they were anchored there for the night. A little farther back, they were standing, putting on their things, then standing longer, missing not an opportunity of adding, with outstretched hands, to the volume of sound. That audience could not have done otherwise after that music, played as it was. From the beginning of the symphony to the end, Mr. Koussevitzky had been preparing for the climax which he produced at the last. In the very first movement he rose at once to heights which would have been highly climactic for many a conductor. The very sobriety, the very melancholy, of that opening song which is theme for the symphony, created its own tension. The rhythm of opening theme furthered it. The lyric outbursts which analysts call "second theme" gave it the impetus of exaltation. Still it increased. And when the first pause occurred the spines of the audience were at the least fairly straight. But an Andante did not fall back. The glowing melody of the horn was pitched upon no lower plane. For all its restraint in performance, for all its simple straightforward beauty, it nevertheless moved about—serenely, it is true—in the clouds to which a first movement had taken us. And when composer and conductor had done their work upon it, when brass again proclaimed that main theme of the symphony, the clouds had been left far below. Were at this point a third movement to continue in a straight line to greater heights, to tighter tensions, only discomfort would result. But Chaikovsky here brings in his little waltz. Deride its "prettiness" as much as you please in so high-strung a symphony, call it out of place—it served its purpose. It would have been inhumane to do other than one of two things with the audience last evening—either allow it to give vent to its feelings, or afford it relief in the music. Chaikovsky, of course, chooses the latter. But it is the relief which is administered only for the purpose of making it possible to lay on even more heavily. The finale recapitulates. The opening theme is heard again, this time with great breadth and nobility. It is as if it had been removed from earth to heaven. But still there is ascent. And words must needs fail in describing the climax at the end.

In retrospect, the rest of the concert seems but pale beside the magnificence for which it was preparation. And yet one remembers that the drolleries and the humors of a Dukas with his stupid apprentice to a clever sorcerer had done their share, and a large share it was, in

Continued on Following Page

KOUSSEVITZKY SCORES IN LAST SYMPHONY

AMERICAN. MAR 19

By MOSES SMITH

The last of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the source of sufficient glory for Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra to last at least until the beginning of next season. A program which was of good size to begin with, was prolonged greatly by several ovations of unusual length.

The audience expressed its enthusiasm at every occasion. There was a hearty greeting for the conductor at the beginning of the concert. More than once, after the performance of the various pieces, the conductor called on his men to rise, in order to share in tributes. At the end of the program the audience lingered several minutes for final expression of appreciation.

The concert was a brilliant one, as we have had occasion to say many times previously during the five seasons that Mr. Koussevitzky has spent in Boston. He began with C. P. E. Bach's major Concerto for Orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg—eighteenth century music which the conductor reads with square-edged clarity or, as the occasion demands, with tender simplicity.

Debussy's delicate orchestration of Satie's "Gymnopedies" and Dukas' brilliant orchestral scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," offered two representative aspects of French music of the last generation. For the second half of the program there was Mr. Koussevitzky's great tour de force, the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

It would be repetition for us to enumerate the virtues that make the Russian's reading of his fellow-countrymen's music epic. So enthralled were the listeners that, for once, there was no interruption at the pause just before the end of the symphony. The audience was paying heed with its head—and heart—as well as with its ears.

FINAL MONDAY NIGHT CONCERT

Symphony Closes Portion of Extra Series

Post — Mar 19

In anticipation of the symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky at the concert of last evening, the fifth and final one of the current Monday series, offered his listeners Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and in a singularly brilliant and imaginative performance that was much relished by the audience.

For beginning to last evening's concert there came, out of the programmes of last week's subscription concerts, the interesting concerto of Emanuel Bach which, at Mr. Koussevitzky's suggestion, was arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. Between this piece and the scherzo of Dukas stood the "Gymnopedies" of Satie as orchestrated by Debussy. In this music of dancing Greek youths conductor and orchestra once more delighted the ear with transparent euphonies and delicate sonorities. The final number, heard not long ago at the regular Friday and Saturday concerts, was the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky, which Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians have now brought to a pitch of perfection which makes it seem certain that in this symphony there is no detail, large or small, which does not receive at their hands its ultimate due.

Throughout the concert last evening's audience was enthusiastic, and justly so.

Miss Bates developed her voice to its full R. R. G.

Herald Mar 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, played the fifth program of its Monday evening concerts last night at Symphony hall. It seems inadequate to say that the concert last evening was magnificent in its quality of tone and expression, but nevertheless such a meagre expression will have to suffice as words cannot fully express the exquisite musicianship which was shown in the performance of the music Mr. Koussevitzky chose for this program.

Beginning with a Concerto for Orchestra in D major, by C. P. E. Bach, the orchestra played the swift allegro passages with infinite grace and in the second movement the quality of the sustained tones of the strings was of exceptional fineness. The "Gymnopedies" by Satie, might have suffered under a hand less sensitive to tonal effect than that of Mr. Koussevitzky because in truth the shadings and tonal qualities are its salvation. In "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, the interpretation was a vital thing, the strings so accentuated the story of the legend that one could almost see the water and imagine the plight of the poor man whose curiosity far exceeded his actual knowledge of proper procedure.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor is said to have been written in the latter part of his life. The music is turbulent, almost defiant, occasionally subsiding to a strain of futility and acquiescence. The orchestra played this symphony with infinite delicacy of phrasing revealing all the pathos of the beautiful slow melodies and the burning intensity of the allegro passages, finally mounting to a climax of superb majesty. O. A.

STON POST, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 20, 1929

YOUNG FOLKS AT SYMPHONY

A programme more exacting than some of its predecessors nevertheless kept the large audience attentive and even absorbed at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the first of its second pair of Young People's Concerts. Undoubtedly Mr. Alfred H. Meyer's introductory remarks, pointed by stereopticon slides, which preceded each piece, aided in maintaining and renewing this receptive attitude on the part of the listeners.

Not that yesterday's programme was in itself lacking in interest, but it depended less than have those of past concerts upon rhythmic and pictorial appeal. Beginning with the Larghetto and Allegro from Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, for two solo violins, which served admirably to display the virtuosity and exquisite tone of the string choirs of the orchestra, it proceeded to the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofiev, "absolute" music that in the 20th century would evoke the spirit of the 18th. Both these pieces Mr. Koussevitzky conducted.

Then for interlude came an Arioso of Bach for violoncello solo with organ accompaniment, prefaced by pictures and an explanation of the interior of an organ as well as comments concerning Bach and the 'cello. Jean Bedetti, leader of the orchestra's 'cello section, as the soloist displayed once more his familiar mastery of his instrument.

And at last to delineative music. With Mr. Burgin at the conductor's desk four of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the incomparably effective orchestration of Ravel gave obvious delight, in particular "The Hut on Fowl's Legs," which had been elucidated by a telling of the tale of the Russian witch Baba-Yaga. Johann Strauss' "Voices of Spring," played with all the rhythmic seductiveness which the waltzes of that Viennese master evoke, brought the concert to an end.

TRANS — MAR 20

Incidents and Prospects

In the program-book of the Symphony Concerts next Friday, the trustees will report subscriptions of $88,427 67 to the fund that meets yearly the deficit in the running expenses of the orchestra. These contributions come from 571 subscribers, 216 of whom have been recently added. An increase of no small satisfaction to the trustees, who desire wider support of the orchestra. As it is, the deficit is estimated at $130—$135,000, with $40,000 still necessary to meet it.

Contrary to recent custom Mr. Koussevitzky will not renew his orchestral concerts in Paris next May and June. Instead, he has agreed to conduct the forces of the Opéra through five or six performances of Musorgsky's "Boris Godunov." He used to do so before he came to Boston.

The [illegible] afternoon [illegible] in the Symphony Hall is filled. Then and there, Mr. Levitzki, who seldom revisits this corner of the world, will play piano-pieces.

Heifetz Afresh, Young Moderns And "Old Bach"

TRANS MAR. 18

From The Symphony Concert To the Flute-Players, Most Hospitable

THERE WERE unusual honors and fervors at the Symphony Concert of Saturday. No sooner had Mr. Heifetz appeared to play Brahms's Violin-Concerto than the whole orchestra rose to its feet and hailed him with clapping long and loud. The audience added their hands vigorously. Through two or three minutes the applause crackled; before and behind the violinist bowed; while, as some said, his habitual composure was perceptibly shaken. At the end of the Concerto, feet stamped and throats shouted—rare exuberance in this town; but few had listened without emotion and of a Saturday, in these days of Mr. Koussevitzky, free spirits gather in Symphony Hall. Yet as grateful to Mr. Heifetz must have been the rapt listening of the men of the orchestra at every pause in their several parts. For the more one is master, the more does he treasure the regard of fellow-craftsmen. More than once the orchestra has risen in deference to a guest-conductor or in welcome to its own returning leader. But when, in the past did it do as much, and of its own will, for a visiting virtuoso? Nor was the audience content until, at the return of Mr. Koussevitzky, it had brought both conductor and players to their feet.

Mr. Heifetz is no violinist of mood and impulse. He measures and controls his powers. He prepares a piece and the preparation is complete. In performance the musical, not the personal, equation sways him. Therefore his playing of Brahms's Concerto on Saturday seemed almost an exact replica of his playing of that piece on Friday. Yet there was new occasion to observe, especially in the long-drawn "passage-work" of the first movement, the undulant, the vibrant quality in his tone giving life to every measure. It is not in the same world with the tremolo by which violinists of the baser sort smear out sentiment. It is not even a vibrato in the full musical sense of that term. Rather, it is the intuitive inflection—the exact word is hard to find—that is vitalizing spark to the note or the phrase at each passing instant. The responsive sensibility of a musician, the imparting instinct of a virtuoso—each at finest—join together to generate it. Again to be noted was the beauty of Mr. Heifetz's tone as it moved, through the slow song, against the mezza voce (so to say) of the string choir. The literary-minded recalled the Latin poet's "moon amongst lesser stars." The graphic-minded thought of the glowing velvet in some Venetian portrait crossed by a golden pattern woven fine and clear. The merely musical said "euphony" and held their breaths to listen. And who, having heard Mr. Heifetz's light hand upon the finale, will ever again reproach it as heavy-gaited?

From the younger generation Mr. Koussevitzky has not lately found a more fortunate "modern instance" than Dukelsky's Symphony. On Saturday, as on Friday, applause that was more than polite, and scattering rewarded it; while on both occasions it was played to no restless audience. For once, even the unreconciled to the newer musical courses found the dissonances of the first movement forgivable, so plainly were they born of young energy engrossed in creation, speaking the speech that was natural utterance. Quickly, too, they resolved themselves into sonorities that stirred the ear; while page upon page pressed forward, fertile, vigorous, warm-blooded. At last a youthful, a modern, symphonist was to be heard, molding form to substance, to both giving rhythmical life and manifold voice. In many ears the slow movement sang broadly and richly out of well-conceived matter in well-conducted course. Through it clear musical imagination was ranging. The finale proceeds fitfully; the listener fancies that he hears the play of the changeful Russian temperament, brightening and darkening like a spring sky. Then the young energy returns, possesses and drives forward to the full-voiced close. Already Dukelsky can turn current formulas and fashions into individual and imaginative line. That way lies a "modernism" stimulating to hear.

Incidents and Prospects

Those omniscient persons who discovered this and that motive on Mr. Koussevitzky's part for the repetitions of Bloch's "America" at the Symphony concerts may be reminded that on Friday and Saturday next Mr. Stock will repeat the Rhapsody in Chicago—for precisely the reason that actuated the Bostonian conductor, to wit, faith in, and admiration for, the piece. Curiously, Mr. Stock will also mate it with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

What passes through the minds of conductors while they are making programs none but themselves may know. . . . The other day in New York, Mr. Toscanini included in one of his lists Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony," long one of Mr. Koussevitzky's "specialties." On a program for next week at Symphony Hall stands Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Not long ago Mr. Toscanini proffered it to New York with loud applause.

The Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra, written by Debussy on commission from the late Mrs. Hall of Boston, reappeared last month at a concert of the Paris Symphony Orchestra. That band has also played, as concert-piece, Stravinsky's recent ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss." No doubt we shall hear it in Boston next season.

THE BOSTON HERALD
MONDAY, MARCH 18, 1929

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was never more brilliant than it is today. It is not an exaggeration to say that it is one of the three greatest orchestras in the world, a possession that any metropolis—London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, New York, or Buenos Aires—would boast of and revere. Bostonians who attend its concerts know its value. Every year many who pay for seats also contribute to the deficit fund. This year the deficit will be about $135,000, of which about $90,000 has already been subscribed. A symphony orchestra, like any superlative artistic organization, is an expensive accessory, but more of a necessity than a luxury. Boston would be a poor place to live in without her great library, the Museum of Fine Arts, and the orchestra.

And yet the orchestra, the most animated and perhaps the most naturally appealing of these three institutions, has the smallest following. To a certain degree this is inevitable. Symphony Hall is not a large hall as auditoriums go today, and the price of seats must be so high that the deficit will not be overwhelming. It is doubtful if the regular attendants of the five series of concerts (including the children's series) number more than 15,000 persons. When we consider that there are more than 1,500,000 people in Greater Boston, the number seems pitifully small. Is it any wonder that the symphony orchestra is only a name to the man in the street?

Granted that the appreciation of fine music is not every man's gift, cannot the orchestra's public be doubled or tripled in size? Unquestionably there are many men and women who are prevented from hearing the orchestra because of the prices of the tickets. The cost of taking himself, his wife and two or three children, to a concert is prohibitive to the man of small income. And yet, if the orchestra is to be a truly great inspirational and cultural factor in the community, it should be as accessible as the large motion picture theatres. We wonder if jazz would so predominate in popularity if classical music could be heard as easily. We do not ask that the orchestra in any way lower its standards or that it try to compete with other forms of amusement that the city now affords. We merely suggest that the orchestra is not doing all that it is capable of doing until every man and woman who wants to hear it hears it. After all, the orchestra is not self-sufficient. The beauty and vitality of fine music does not exist until it is heard. The greater its audience, the more souls it fills with glory, and the more men and women it momentarily lifts from the worries and sorrows of everyday life. And the sad part of it is that the people who most need the comfort and inspiration of great music are usually those who can least afford to hear it.

It is possible that one practical obstacle in the path of such a goal has been removed. The new Boston Garden seats 18,000 persons. If an admission charge of only 25 cents were made, $4500 would be realized, more than enough to pay the cost of engaging the hall and probably leaving something toward the running expenses of the orchestra. An admission fee of but ten cents would probably cover the cost of using the Garden instead of Symphony Hall. The only difficulty seems to lie in the question of the Garden's acoustics for orchestral music. But the Royal Belgian Guards band of eighty men is to give a symphonic program there April 3, and a study of the acoustics then should decide the question. The Garden's existence offers an opportunity to which the orchestra's trustees should not close their eyes. Three or four concerts there during a season would make the orchestra thousands of new friends.

A teacher in one of Boston's schools used to warn his English class of the danger of using the word "perfect" in describing things or persons of only superior merit. "There is only one thing that I know of that can be called perfect," he always said in ending the discussion, "and that is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Is a perfect thing too holy to be enjoyed only by the few?

SYMPHONY GIVES MONDAY CONCERT

Brilliant Playing Draws Enthusiastic Applause

GLOBE — MAR. 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night at Symphony Hall the fifth concert of its Monday evening series. C. P. E. Bach's D major concerto for orchestra, Satie's "Gymnopedies" (orchestrated by Debussy), Dukas' so-called Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony made up an attractive program which, excellently played, drew an exceptionally enthusiastic response from the large audience.

The young Bach's D major concerto, which Mr Koussevitzky introduced last Friday to his audience of the regular series, improves upon further acquaintance. The genial vigor and individual flavor of the two fast movements, their consummate musical craftsmanship, the moving beauty of the noble Andante, are the work of a composer who deserves to be better known by musicians and music-lovers, and who should be ranked higher by historians of the art.

Certainly this work of the humble Carl Philipp Emanuel is much superior to some things of his illustrious father, Johann Sebastian, that are still performed. It is improbable that Steinberg by his effective orchestration has falsified our view of its quality. It was admirably performed.

Debussy's delicate orchestrations of two of the strangely beautiful and disarmingly simple "Gymnopedies" of that queer genius Satie received an exquisitely apt performance. They were taken at a tempo slower than would be possible in their original pianoforte versions, but which suggested well the Greek ritual dances that had inspired them.

The cleverly illustrative "scherzo" which Dukas wrote "after" Goethe's famous ballad of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" drew from Mr Koussevitzky and his orchestra a performance well proportioned and certainly not lacking in brilliance, but which seemed a shade too careful and controlled to reach the heights of breathless excitement at which the composer aimed.

A masterly rendering of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony concluded the program. Mr Koussevitzky's admirable reading of this work is well known here by now. Under his baton the orchestra brought out with the utmost conviction, yet without the exaggeration one might have feared, all its somber, brooding, Slavonic color, its drama, its warm, if somewhat too melting, lyricism, its final overwhelming, defiant brilliance.

The enthusiasm of the audience recalled Mr Koussevitzky four times. On his last reappearance he shook the concertmaster, Mr Burgin, by the hand and motioned to his men to rise to receive the applause they deserved.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, MARCH 19, 1929

Satie and Dukas With Chaikovsky

TO say that it was an enthusiastic audience that took leave of the Monday concerts, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of Serge Koussevitzky last evening, would be to use the language of the lame, the halt and the blind. One might rise to the over-worked "ovation," and still be telling less than the truth. For that term has been used over and over again for the kind of approval which was expressed at the time of the intermission, when Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" had just been played. At the end, after an exceptionally powerful climax with Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, people in the front rows remained in their seats, smiting hand upon hand as though they were anchored there for the night. A little farther back, they were standing, putting on their things, then standing longer, missing not an opportunity of adding, with outstretched hands, to the volume of sound. That audience could not have done otherwise after that music, played as it was. From the beginning of the symphony to the end, Mr. Koussevitzky had been preparing for the climax which he produced at the last. In the very first movement he rose at once to heights which would have been highly climactic for many a conductor. The very sobriety, the very melancholy, of that opening song which is theme for the symphony, created its own tension. The rhythm of opening theme furthered it. The lyric outbursts which analysts call "second theme" gave it the impetus of exaltation. Still it increased. And when the first pause occurred the spines of the audience were at the least fairly straight. But an Andante did not fall back. The glowing melody of the horn was pitched upon no lower plane. For all its restraint in performance, for all its simple straightforward beauty, it nevertheless moved about—serenely, it is true—in the clouds to which a first movement had taken us. And when composer and conductor had done their work upon it, when brass again proclaimed that main theme of the symphony, the clouds had been left far below. Were at this point a third movement to continue in a straight line to greater heights, to tighter tensions, only discomfort would result. But Chaikovsky here brings in his little waltz. Deride its "prettiness" as much as you please in so high-strung a symphony, call it out of place—it served its purpose. It would have been inhumane to do other than one of two things with the audience last evening—either allow it to give vent to its feelings, or afford it relief in the music. Chaikovsky, of course, chooses the latter. But it is the relief which is administered only for the purpose of making it possible to lay on even more heavily. The finale recapitulates. The opening theme is heard again, this time with great breadth and nobility. It is as if it had been removed from earth to heaven. But still there is ascent. And words must needs fail in describing the climax at the end.

In retrospect, the rest of the concert seems but pale beside the magnificence for which it was preparation. And yet one remembers the drolleries and the humors of a Dukas with his stupid apprentice to a clever sorcerer had done their share, and a large share it was, in

Continued on Following Page

FINAL MONDAY NIGHT CONCERT

Symphony Closes Portion of Extra Series

Post — Mar 19

In anticipation of the symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky at the concert of last evening, the fifth and final one of the current Monday series, offered his listeners Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and in a singularly brilliant and imaginative performance that was much relished by the audience.

For beginning to last evening's concert there came, out of the programmes of last week's subscription concerts, the interesting concerto of Emanuel Bach which, at Mr. Koussevitzky's suggestion, was arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. Between this piece and the scherzo of Dukas stood the "Gymnopedies" of Satie as orchestrated by Debussy. In this music of dancing Greek youths conductor and orchestra once more delighted the ear with transparent euphonies and delicate sonorities. The final number, heard not long ago at the regular Friday and Saturday concerts, was the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky, which Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians have now brought to a pitch of perfection which makes it seem certain that in this symphony there is no detail, large or small, which does not receive at their hands its ultimate due.

Throughout the concert last evening's audience was enthusiastic, and justly so.

KOUSSEVITZKY SCORES IN LAST SYMPHONY

AMERICAN. MAR 19

By MOSES SMITH

The last of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the source of sufficient glory for Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra to last at least until the beginning of next season. A program which was of good size to begin with, was prolonged greatly by several ovations of unusual length.

The audience expressed its enthusiasm at every occasion. There was a hearty greeting for the conductor at the beginning of the concert. More than once, after the performance of the various pieces, the conductor called on his men to rise, in order to share in tribute. At the end of the program the audience lingered several minutes for final expression of appreciation.

The concert was a brilliant one, as we have had occasion to say many times previously during the five seasons that Mr. Koussevitzky has spent in Boston. He began with C. P. E. Bach's major Concerto for Orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg—eighteenth century music which the conductor reads with square-edged clarity or, as the occasion demands, with tender simplicity.

Debussy's delicate orchestration of Satie's "Gymnopedies" and Dukas' brilliant orchestral scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," offered two representative aspects of French music of the last generation. For the second half of the program there was Mr. Koussevitzky's great tour de force, the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

It would be repetition for us to enumerate the virtues that make the Russian's reading of his fellow-countrymen's music epic. So enthralled were the listeners that, for once, there was no interruption at the pause just before the end of the symphony. The audience was paying heed with its head—and heart—as well as with its ears.

Miss Bates develop her voice to its full worth.

R. R. G.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, played the fifth program of its Monday evening concerts last night at Symphony hall. It seems inadequate to say that the concert last evening was magnificent in its quality of tone and expression, but nevertheless such a meagre expression will have to suffice as words cannot fully express the exquisite musicianship which was shown in the performance of the music Mr. Koussevitzky chose for this program.

Beginning with a Concerto for Orchestra in D major, by C. P. E. Bach, the orchestra played the swift allegro passages with infinite grace and in the second movement the quality of the sustained tones of the strings was of exceptional fineness. The "Gymnopedies" by Satie, might have suffered under a hand less sensitive to tonal effect than that of Mr. Koussevitzky because in truth the shadings and tonal qualities are its salvation. In "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, the interpretation was a vital thing, the strings so accentuated the story of the legend that one could almost see the water and imagine the plight of the poor man whose curiosity far exceeded his actual knowledge of proper procedure.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor is said to have been written in the latter part of his life. The music is turbulent, almost defiant, occasionally subsiding to a strain of futility and acquiescence. The orchestra played this symphony with infinite delicacy of phrasing revealing all the pathos of the beautiful slow melodies and the burning intensity of the allegro passages, finally mounting to a climax of superb majesty. O. A.

STON POST, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 20, 1929

YOUNG FOLKS AT SYMPHONY

A programme more exacting than some of its predecessors nevertheless kept the large audience attentive and even absorbed at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the first of its second pair of Young People's Concerts. Undoubtedly Mr. Alfred H. Meyer's introductory remarks, pointed by stereopticon slides, which preceded each piece, aided in maintaining and renewing this receptive attitude on the part of the listeners.

Not that yesterday's programme was in itself lacking in interest, but it depended less than have those of past concerts upon rhythmic and pictorial appeal. Beginning with the Larghetto and Allegro from Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, for two solo violins, which served admirably to display the virtuosity and exquisite tone of the string choirs of the orchestra, it proceeded to the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofiev, "absolute" music that in the 20th century would evoke the spirit of the 18th. Both these pieces Mr. Koussevitzky conducted.

Then for interlude came an Arioso of Bach for violoncello solo with organ accompaniment, prefaced by pictures and an explanation of the interior of an organ as well as comments concerning Bach and the 'cello. Jean Bedetti, leader of the orchestra's 'cello section, as the soloist displayed once more his familiar mastery of his instrument.

And at last to delineative music. With Mr. Burgin at the conductor's desk four of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the incomparably effective orchestration of Ravel gave obvious delight, in particular "The Hut on Fowl's Legs," which had been elucidated by a telling of the tale of the Russian witch Baba-Yaga. Johann Strauss' "Voices of Spring," played with all the rhythmic seductiveness which the waltzes of that Viennese master evoke, brought the concert to an end.

TRANS — MAR 20

Incidents and Prospects

In the program-book of the Symphony Concerts next Friday, the trustees will report subscriptions of $88,427 67 to the fund that meets yearly the deficit in the running expenses of the orchestra. These contributions come from 571 subscribers, 216 of whom have been recently added, an increase of no small satisfaction to the trustees, who desire wide support of the orchestra. As it is, the deficit is estimated at $130—$135,000, with $40,000 still necessary to meet it.

Contrary to recent custom Mr. Koussevitzky will not renew his orchestral concerts in Paris next May and June. Instead, he has agreed to conduct the forces of the Opéra through five or six performances of Musorgsky's "Boris Godunov." He used to do so before he came to Boston.

The [illegible] afternoon, March 31, in the [illegible] phony Hall is filled. Then and there, Mr. Levitzki, who seldom revisits this corner of the world, will play piano-pieces.

Children's Concert, Critic's Excursions

TRANS. — MAR. 20

Young People's Matinee With Side-Glances Toward Other Passing Matters

ANXIOUS, and also irritable, elders should bestir themselves. The children and young people of this town, being born into their own time, are already incipient modernists. In considerable numbers they assembled yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall for their last concert—save only the repetition today—of the current season. Under the present dispensation some three hundred places are reserved for the youngsters whose father, mother or next friend will pay the price and who usually appear accompanied. These are, in the words of a budding cynic of tender age, "the seats of the little rich children." Now on Tuesday afternoon, it was to be observed that almost every one of them was occupied; whereas an appreciable part of the seats distributed among the public schools at a nominal charge stood empty. The upper balcony, for example, was virtually bare; while the center of the parquet yielded hardly a gap. It is regrettable that the pupils in the public schools, their teachers and their parents, are not more receptive of opportunity. There may even be means, as yet unapplied, to incite them to it.

The point, however, to be made at the moment is quite different. A comically passionate voice was lately raised in this town, bidding the Symphony Orchestra give concerts at one dime per head in the vasty depths of the Boston Garden. Then would "the people" receive the "cultural" and "inspirational" impetus believed to proceed from its ministrations. By the cumulative evidence of these children's concerts at Symphony Hall, "the people" remain persistently indifferent to such "privileges"; whereas other social orders more generally and eagerly seek them. Were the trustees of orchestras to compare notes, a like disposition toward any and all symphonic music would probably be disclosed in every American city, with Chicago as the only possible exception. There is ground to believe that for some time to come symphony concerts will remain an aristocratic pleasure, for the excellent reason that the democratic world, customarily called "the people," sedom cares for them. Nor need the thick-waisted wrestlers or the swift-footed hockey-teams take alarm. The Boston Orchestra—it may be said with a smile of re-assurance—has no mind to enter the precincts that they abundantly adorn.

To return to the young modernists. . . . They heard yesterday, for example, an air of Bach played with matched skill and just feeling by Mr. Bedetti upon the violoncello and Mr. Snow upon the organ. As numbers at these concerts go, it was a slow movement, longish, sustained, songful. The assembled youngsters listened patiently and, as it is customary to say of their elders on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening, applauded politely. When, however, the orchestra sounded the rhythms and the sonorities of four of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the rich scoring of Ravel, the youthful audience pricked up ears, set eyes alight, clapped hands with a will. Its shoulders danced to a Viennese waltz out of Johann Strauss, while in the numbers in the ancient style—two divisions of a Concerto Grosso of Handel and Prokoffiev's "Classical Symphony"—the quick-paced, light-rhythmed Allegros or the Russian's tapping Gavotte most interested it. Even our children—it is to be feared—are as God made most of us, the creatures of our own time. Nor by that token are they musically unsusceptible. In the northwest corner of the first balcony the children caught more of Musorgsky's humor off the tongues of Goldberg and Schmuyle than do some quarters of the hall at the august subscription concerts.

Though New York is two hundred odd miles away and cares not tuppence ha' penny for us sorry dwellers in the hinterlands, there was reason to marvel at Mr. Koussevitzky's presumption in the placing of Prokoffiev's Classical Symphony upon the program. That eminent conductor, the Signor Toscanini, with whose ascent to the podium the performance of symphonic music seemingly began and with whose descent therefrom it will end "eternellement" (as they say in French operas) lately played the piece in Manhattan. Forthwith "this writer," as he oftenest calls himself, hastened in The Times to put all and sundry in their places. Said he:

> Now, the Prokofiev "Classic Symphony" has been played more than once in New York, and with almost impeccable finish and delicacy by Serge Koussevitzky and the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is hard to imagine the work better performed than it is by these gentlemen. Yet there was in the Toscanini interpretation something nearer and further than even the distinguished Bostonians achieved. At their hands one marveled at Prokofiev's ingenuity, fluency, adaptability in assuming for the nonce the mask of the classic form and style. Mr. Toscanini accomplished something more. He gave the music a vitality and an authenticity that neither Koussevitzky nor Prokofiev had achieved. Thus the symphony, transfigured, became a marvelous, laughing, Italianate inspiration, a modern glorification, as it were, of the spirit of a Scarlatti or Pergolesi, or other son of light and beauty. The Symphony danced. It was mercurial. It was winged. There were nuances, particularly Mr. Toscanini's." There were a dozen miracles a minute. The point is that the music sounded new, and freshly created, and genuinely inspired.

Yet Mr. Koussevitzky—shameless man, as they say in Wagnerian music-drama—continues to play the piece. Possibly he might cloak his shame were he to try it . . . with an orchestra as few in numbers as he assembles for lighter Mozart or earlier Beethoven. The quicker the pace, the defter the turns, the nimbler the touch, so much the better for Prokoffiev's quirks and fancies. And the normal seventy strings, however sensitive, may not escape a certain weight of tone and movement.

To make, at last, the record: Mr. Meyer succeeded well with the difficult task of informing and ingratiating talk to youngsters about an eighteenth-century Concerto Grosso and a twentieth-century "Classical Symphony;" apropos Bach digressed entertainly to organs; apropos Musorgsky's "Bydlo" to two-wheeled carts; finally came into his and the youngsters' own with the tale of Baba Yaga, the witch, as pictured—glowingly—in Russian fairy books. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted through the pieces from Handel and Prokoffiev; Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Snow went their own sweet way with Bach's air; Mr. Burgin led in the other items, the Viennese waltz included. He took it in straightforward, workmanlike fashion, but at

HERALD MAR. 21

1929 Herald Mar 20

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Perhaps it was due to the charm of the preliminary tales such as children love to hear, which were told by Alfred H. Meyer. It might have been purely because of the melodious and imaginative quality of the music. Whatever the influence, it was plain to see that Mousorgsky's four numbers—excerpts from "Pictures at an Art Exhibition," arranged for the orchestra by the French composer, Ravel, cast a certain spell over the large assemblage of music-loving youngsters gathered in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon for the Young People's concert, quite unequalled by the earlier selections of the program.

It may have been that youth from city apartments could hardly grasp a tonal representation of the heavy-breathing, labored swing of tired oxen and the creaking rumble of wooden carts so vividly described by Mr. Meyer in his interpretation of "Bydlo." But they liked it. And they surely caught the contented barnyard sounds in the "Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells," and the intonations of the two talkative Hebrews in the number, "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," if one might judge by happy chuckles. With a fairy story of an old Russian witch and an ill-treated maiden wandering in the woods haunting their memories, there was nothing for it but to be merry over "The Hut on Fowl's Legs."

The program began with Movements from the Concerto Grosso No. 12, by Handel, Larghetto-Allegro, continuing with the "Classical" Symphony, Opus 25, by Prokofieff and the Arioso by Bach. In the last-named number Jean Bedetti played the violoncello, with Albert W. Snow accompanying at the organ. Mr. Koussevitsky conducted throughout this part of the program. Mr. Burgin was the conductor for the Moussorgsky numbers and the final waltz, "Voices of Spring," by Strauss.

The Boston Symphony orchestra lived up to its high standard of perfection in the performance. Mr. Meyer gave an entertaining and informative account of each composer and the selections which were to be played before each rendition, illustrated with the stereopticon. The program will be repeated this afternoon at 4 o'clock.

F. A. B.

THE SYMPHONY AND CHILDREN

To the Editor of The Herald:

It would seem obvious to at least one of the readers of yesterday's editorial that if the Symphony orchestra is to win to it an increasing number of patrons, it must create in the young people now growing up a taste and a demand for the kind of music it provides. To that end were the young people's concerts inaugurated, with the hope that school authorities would appreciate the opportunity offered to students, and encourage attendance as far as possible.

Yet such has not proved to be the case. The first concerts came near to taxing the capacity of the hall, but this year's young patrons have so fallen off in numbers that there are always large numbers of vacant seats, in spite of the fact that the management has offered a block of floor seats to the adult public. Private schools have always been represented in goodly numbers. The indifference can be traced directly to the public schools. In several large public schools in the city proper, these young people's concerts have not been announced at all, or announced perfunctorily only by a notice on the school bulletin board. In some instances the order and purchase of tickets has been made difficult, because this must be done between periods, on the way to classes in more or less distant parts of the building. No one, unless possibly the music director, has urged attendance or encouraged interest in what is probably as fine orchestral music as may be heard anywhere in the world.

The young people themselves are not to blame. Many of them come from families whose taste in music as well as in the other arts, is still unformed and uncultured, and who have never realized their own deficiency. They cannot always recognize an opportunity when it is offered.

It remains for the school to stand in loco parentis. Yet here in Boston we could wish our school administrators more sympathetic to education in appreciation of the arts. We could wish them to remember that, over and beyond all training, education should serve as "the initiation of the mind into ever new and finer types of experience."

Boston should not lag so far behind other parts of the country in this. This week in New York a performance of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" is being given for students and school children, to whom choice seats have been awarded as prizes. The whole undertaking has been wisely planned and wisely executed, with a view to giving to children from families of moderate means an unforgettable vision of a beauty that may be part of their lives, or they have learned to recognize it.

... they can recognize ... that the instinct for great art can be encouraged and fostered to an amazing result is amply proved by Ernest Schelling's request program at last of his New York children's concerts. The children expressed a preference for Wagner's "Tannhauser Overture," MacDowell's "To a Water Lily," Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic," Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Golden Cockerell." Quite a contrast to the adult "request" programs at the Boston "pops"!

ELAINE WESTALL GOULD.

Jamaica Plain, March 19.

MAR 21 29

The Screen

After Twenty Years Bruckner's Eighth

A Symphony, Like No Other, Returns This Week to Symphony Hall

WHEN has a Symphony suffered the fate that Bruckner's Eighth has endured in Boston? Mr. Fiedler played it (for the first time in America) on March 3, 1909. It was so well liked that it was repeated "by general request," the same spring, on April 24. None the less, it straightway receded to the shelves. Dr. Muck turned to other Bruckner; Mr. Monteux did not touch it; and now Mr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back to the Symphony Concerts as semi-novelty for his first venture with Bruckner. Perhaps its length makes conductors think twice before they place it upon programs; for it requires well over an hour in performance. Only Mr. Hill's shorter Symphony, replayed from last year, stands with it on tomorrow's program. A brief intermission will separate them.

Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, in C minor, was written in the years 1885-86; was revised in the winter of 1889-90; came to first performance in Vienna Dec. 18, 1892, at a Philharmonic Concert led by Hans Richter. Even Hanslick admitted in his bitter review that the concert was a triumph for the composer. "How was the new Symphony received? Boisterous rejoicing, waving of handkerchiefs from those standing, innumerable recalls, laurel wreaths." It is dedicated to "His Imperial and Royal Apostolic Majesty, Franz Josef I., Emperor of Austria and Apostolic King of Hungary, etc., etc., with deepest respect, Anton Bruckner." It is scored for three each of the wood-winds, the third bassoon alternating wih a double bassoon; eight horns, four of which alternating with a quartet of tubas; three trumpets, three trombones, contra-bass tuba; three harps, kettle-drums, triangle, cymbals; the usual strings.

Bruckner has sometimes been accused of formlessness. In reality no criticism could be wider of the mark. His handling of form is merely different from that of symphonists like Beethoven. Witness the course of this Symphony in C minor. A single note sustained through several measures, serves as introduction. Bases sing the first theme. It comes in low register, at first hesitatingly, then in full melodic contour. It is gloomy, forbidding, of the essence of tragedy. There are several repetitions, there is some development. Then the second theme emerges. It is in G major, a typically Brucknerian theme. Its first motif comprises two quarter-notes followed by a triplet of three-quarters, a formula which Bruckner especially liked. This theme is the brightest in the symphony—a theme of cheerfulness tinged with sentiment. Bruckner uses it persistently in this first movement, often in inversion. That is, in descending form, whereas orginally it is chiefly ascending. An important subdivision of the theme occurs considerably later in horns followed by woodwinds over a pizzicato bass in triplets. Cheerfulness has now gone out of the mood, which is one of quiet solemnity. The development treats these themes by every known contrapuntal and rhythmical device, mainly in the order in which they originally occur, with a repetition of suggestions of the first theme near the end, to lead into the recapitulation. The recapitulation is much less a direct repetition of themes than is the custom of the classical composers. The first theme is now introduced in high woodwinds, where at first it entered in low basses. Not only is the register changed, but it is now heard also in inversion. And it comes not in the direct forthright form of the beginning, but in a more developed state. Further, there is less obvious preparation for the second theme, which enters in a solo trumpet, "ausdrucksvoll" (expressively).

In the symphonies before the Eighth Bruckner followed his first movement with an Adagio. In the Eighth and the Ninth a Scherzo succeeds. The gloom at the end of the first movement is too deep to permit a slow movement to come next. Rightly or wrongly the appellation "Der deutsche Michel" has come to be associated with this Scherzo. To translate the phrase into "The German Michael" is to lose all its significance. It represents the naive stupidity, the ponderous, and thick-headed humor which one associates with country bumpkins. The theme of the principal division of the Scherzo well deserves the label, "Der deutsche Michel," for its blunt, awkward, square-toed, or better, square-headedness. But it is cast against a background of fantastic and almost fairy-like delicacy. It receives due portion of repetition and development. Of the Trio Bruckner is reported to have said, "Der deutsche Michel träumt ins Land Hinaus—"The German Michael dreams (or would it be better under the circumstances to translate 'träumt' by 'stumbles'?) his way into the country." The theme, at first in the strings, is beautifully lyrical. The Scherzo is then literally repeated.

The Adagio is one of the longest slow movements in existence, and one of the most lovely. One can best understand it by remembering that it consists of three separate developments, each more extended and more climactic than the preceding, of the two themes of the movement. The first theme is of exceedingly long breath, haunting, pleading, in character. It is introduced by the first violins. The second theme is sung by 'cellos, as if in answer to the pleading of the first. It too is wondrously lyric. Near the height of the third development, brass intone the "Siegfried motiv" from Wagner's "Ring." The coda is given to the first theme.

The Finale is grandiose, a culmination in the truest sense. The figure with which it begins (suggestive of galloping horses) continues throughout the long, war-like first theme. A second theme is in part lyric, in part choral-like and churchly in mood. The development is exceedingly complex contrapuntally, with the choral motif frequently heard throughout. The recapitulation makes a powerful entry with the first theme, while the second enters as a fugato. The main climax of the whole work comes in the coda, which is begun by trombones proclaiming the first theme of the Symphony against the trumpets with the theme of the Scherzo, and ends at the last with a combination of the main themes of the four different movements in a triumphal C major.

A. H. M.

Block-Note

A Young Person Attends a Young People's Symphony

STACK your coats in your chairs . . . dears . . . sit on them . . . not your hats . . . just your coats . . . yes, the one in the middle . . . the one waving his arms about . . . yes . . . that's Koussevitzky.

What with beating time on the floor and prodding the velvet flowers on the hat before us while Koussevitzky made whoopee with Prokoffiev, we had an immense interesting time. But during the whoopee-making and the flower-prodding we stopped for a moment and wondered.

Of course there was Mr. Meyer (talking as Mr. Meyer thinks one should talk with children) and the strong and noble Larghetto followed by the weak and repetitious Allegro, both from the Concerto Grosso, No. 12, by Handel. There was the "Classical Symphony" and the sad moment when Koussevitzky left us to the less tender hands of Burgin and Bedetti. Bedetti quite as good as always. Burgin as good as could be expected, giving us a diminished version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and a strenuous (for Mr. Burgin only) tussle with Johann Strauss.

Then every one crammed hats onto heads and trolley cars filled. In the poignant north light of Huntington Avenue and violet-venders, some were tempted to sing. . . . At least we were.

JON CHEEVER

Cherubic Bruckner II.

In The Organ-Loft He Rhapsodizes Celestially

Music Aside, The Composer Was Simple-Minded, Devout, Child-Like. The Artist, Boehler, Caught the Fancy of The Viennese by Picturing Him in The Company of Cherubs

Children's Concert, Critic's Excursions

TRANS. — MAR. 20

Young People's Matinee With Side-Glances Toward Other Passing Matters

ANXIOUS, and also irritable, elders should bestir themselves. The children and young people of this town, being born into their own time, are already incipient modernists. In considerable numbers they assembled yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall for their last concert—save only the repetition today—of the current season. Under the present dispensation some three hundred places are reserved for the youngsters whose father, mother or next friend will pay the price and who usually appear accompanied. These are, in the words of a budding cynic of tender age, "the seats of the little rich children." Now on Tuesday afternoon, it was to be observed that almost every one of them was occupied; whereas an appreciable part of the seats distributed among the public schools at a nominal charge stood empty. The upper balcony, for example, was virtually bare; while the center of the parquet yielded hardly a gap. It is regrettable that the pupils in the public schools, their teachers and their parents, are not more receptive of opportunity. There may even be means, as yet unapplied, to incite them to it.

The point, however, to be made at the moment is quite different. A comically passionate voice was lately raised in this town, bidding the Symphony Orchestra give concerts at one dime per head in the vasty depths of the Boston Garden. Then would "the people" receive the "cultural" and "inspirational" impetus believed to proceed from its ministrations. By the cumulative evidence of these children's concerts at Symphony Hall, "the people" remain persistently indifferent to such "privileges"; whereas other social orders more generally and eagerly seek them. Were the trustees of orchestras to compare notes, a like disposition toward any and all symphonic music would probably be disclosed in every American city, with Chicago as the only possible exception. There is ground to believe that for some time to come symphony concerts will remain an aristocratic pleasure, for the excellent reason that the democratic world, customarily called "the people," sedom cares for them. Nor need the thick-waisted wrestlers or the swift-footed hockey-teams take alarm. The Boston Orchestra—it may be said with a smile of re-assurance—has no mind to enter the precincts that they abundantly adorn.

To return to the young modernists. . . . They heard yesterday, for example, an air of Bach played with matched skill and just feeling by Mr. Bedetti upon the violoncello and Mr. Snow upon the organ. As numbers at these concerts go, it was a slow movement, longish, sustained, songful. The assembled youngsters listened patiently and, as it is customary to say of their elders on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening, applauded politely. When, however, the orchestra sounded the rhythms and the sonorities of four of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the rich scoring of Ravel, the youthful audience pricked up ears, set eyes alight, clapped hands with a will. Its shoulders danced to a Viennese waltz out of Johann Strauss; while in the numbers in the ancient style—two divisions of a Concerto Grosso of Handel and Prokoffiev's "Classical Symphony"—the quick-paced, light-rhythmed Allegros or the Russian's tapping Gavotte most interested it. Even our children—it is to be feared—are as God made most of us, the creatures of our own time. Nor by that token are they musically unsusceptible. In the northwest corner of the first balcony the children caught more of Musorgsky's humor off the tongues of Goldberg and Schmuyle than do some quarters of the hall at the august subscription concerts.

Though New York is two hundred odd miles away and cares not tuppence ha'penny for us sorry dwellers in the hinterlands, there was reason to marvel at Mr. Koussevitzky's presumption in the placing of Prokoffiev's Classical Symphony upon the program. That eminent conductor, the Signor Toscanini, with whose ascent to the podium the performance of symphonic music seemingly began and with whose descent therefrom it will end "eterpellement" (as they say in French operas) lately played the piece in Manhattan. Forthwith "this writer," as he oftenest calls himself, hastened in The Times to put all and sundry in their places. Said he:

> Now, the Prokofiev "Classic Symphony" has been played more than once in New York, and with almost impeccable finish and delicacy by Serge Koussevitzky and the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is hard to imagine the work better performed than it is by these gentlemen. Yet there was in the Toscanini interpretation something nearer and further than even the distinguished Bostonians achieved. At their hands one marveled at Prokofiev's ingenuity, fluency, adaptability in assuming for the nonce the mask of the classic form and style. Mr. Toscanini accomplished something more. He gave the music a vitality and an authenticity that neither Koussevitzky nor Prokofiev had achieved. Thus the symphony, transfigured, became a marvelous, laughing, Italianate inspiration, a modern glorification, as it were, of the spirit of a Scarlatti or Pergolesi, or other son of light and beauty. The Symphony danced. It was mercurial. It was winged. There were nuances, particularly Mr. Toscanini's." There were a dozen miracles a minute. The point is that the music sounded new, and freshly created, and genuinely inspired.

Yet Mr. Koussevitzky—shameless man, as they say in Wagnerian music-drama—continues to play the piece. Possibly he might cloak his shame were he to try it with an orchestra as few in numbers as he assembles for lighter Mozart or earlier Beethoven. The quicker the pace, the defter the turns, the nimbler the touch, so much the better for Prokoffiev's quirks and fancies. And the normal seventy strings, however sensitive, may not escape a certain weight of tone and movement.

To make, at last, the record: Mr. Meyer succeeded well with the difficult task of informing and ingratiating talk to youngsters about an eighteenth-century Concerto Grosso and a twentieth-century "Classical Symphony;" apropos Bach digressed entertainly to organs; apropos Musorgsky's "Bydlo" to two-wheeled carts; finally came into his and the youngsters' own with the tale of Baba Yaga, the witch, as pictured—glowingly—in Russian fairy books. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted through the pieces from Handel and Prokoffiev; Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Snow went their own sweet way with Bach's air; Mr. Burgin led in the other items, the Viennese waltz included. He took it in straightforward, workmanlike fashion, but at

HERALD MAR. 21

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Perhaps it was due to the charm of the preliminary tales such as children love to hear, which were told by Alfred H. Meyer. It might have been purely because of the melodious and imaginative quality of the music. Whatever the influence, it was plain to see that Mousorgsky's four numbers—excerpts from "Pictures at an Art Exhibition," arranged for the orchestra by the French composer, Ravel, cast a certain spell over the large assemblage of music-loving youngsters gathered in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon for the Young People's concert, quite unequalled by the earlier selections of the program.

It may have been that youth from city apartments could hardly grasp a tonal representation of the heavy-breathing, labored swing of tired oxen and the creaking rumble of wooden carts so vividly described by Mr. Meyer in his interpretation of "Bydlo." But they liked it. And they surely caught the contented barnyard sounds in the "Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells," and the intonations of the two talkative Hebrews in the number, "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," if one might judge by happy chuckles. With a fairy story of an old Russian witch and an ill-treated maiden wandering in the woods haunting their memories, there was nothing for it but to be merry over "The Hut on Fowl's Legs."

The program began with Movements from the Concerto Grosso No. 12, by Handel, Larghetto-Allegro, continuing with the "Classical" Symphony, Opus 25, by Prokofieff and the Arioso by Bach. In the last-named number Jean Bedetti played the violoncello, with Albert W. Snow accompanying at the organ. Mr. Koussevitsky conducted throughout this part of the program. Mr. Burgin was the conductor for the Moussorgsky numbers and the final waltz, "Voices of Spring," by Strauss.

The Boston Symphony orchestra lived up to its high standard of perfection in the performance. Mr. Meyer gave an entertaining and informative account of each composer and the selections which were to be played before each rendition, illustrated with the stereopticon. The program will be repeated this afternoon at 4 o'clock. F. A. B.

THE SYMPHONY AND CHILDREN

To the Editor of The Herald:

It would seem obvious to at least one of the readers of yesterday's editorial that if the Symphony orchestra is to win to it an increasing number of patrons, it must create in the young people now growing up a taste and a demand for the kind of music it provides. To that end were the young people's concerts inaugurated, with the hope that school authorities would appreciate the opportunity offered to students, and encourage attendance as far as possible.

Yet such has not proved to be the case. The first concerts came near to taxing the capacity of the hall, but this year's young patrons have so fallen off in numbers that there are always large numbers of vacant seats, in spite of the fact that the management has offered a block of floor seats to the adult public. Private schools have always been represented in goodly numbers. The indifference can be traced directly to the public schools. In several large public schools in the city proper, these young people's concerts have not been announced at all, or announced perfunctorily only by a notice on the school bulletin board. In some instances the order and purchase of tickets has been made difficult, because this must be done between periods, on the way to classes in more or less distant parts of the building. No one, unless possibly the music director, has urged attendance or encouraged interest in what is probably as fine orchestral music as may be heard anywhere in the world.

The young people themselves are not to blame. Many of them come from families whose taste in music as well as in the other arts, is still unformed and uncultured, and who have never realized their own deficiency. They cannot always recognize an opportunity when it is offered.

It remains for the school to stand in loco parentis. Yet here in Boston we could wish our school administrators more sympathetic to education in appreciation of the arts. We could wish them to remember that, over and beyond all training, education should serve as "the initiation of the mind into ever new and finer types of experience."

Boston should not lag so far behind other parts of the country in this. This week in New York a performance of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" is being given for students and school children, to whom choice seats have been awarded as prizes. The whole undertaking has been wisely planned and wisely executed, with a view to giving to children from families of moderate means an unforgettable vision of a beauty that may be part of their lives, once they have learned to recognize it. . . . that they can recognize . . . that the instinct for great art can be encouraged and fostered to an amazing result is amply proved by Ernest Schelling's "request" program at the last of his New York children's concerts. The children expressed a preference for Wagner's "Tannhauser Overture," MacDowell's "To a Water Lily," Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic," Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Golden Cockerell." Quite a contrast to the adult "request" programs at the Boston "pops"!

ELAINE WESTALL GOULD.

Jamaica Plain, March 19.

The Screen

After Twenty Years Bruckner's Eighth

A Symphony, Like No Other, Returns This Week to Symphony Hall

WHEN has a Symphony suffered the fate that Bruckner's Eighth has endured in Boston? Mr. Fiedler played it (for the first time in America) on March 3, 1909. It was so well liked that it was repeated "by general request," the same spring, on April 24. None the less, it straightway receded to the shelves. Dr. Muck turned to other Bruckner; Mr. Monteux did not touch it; and now Mr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back to the Symphony Concerts as semi-novelty for his first venture with Bruckner. Perhaps its length makes conductors think twice before they place it upon programs; for it requires well over an hour in performance. Only Mr. Hill's shorter Symphony, replayed from last year, stands with it on tomorrow's program. A brief intermission will separate them.

Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, in C minor, was written in the years 1885-86; was revised in the winter of 1889-90; came to first performance in Vienna Dec. 18, 1892, at a Philharmonic Concert led by Hans Richter. Even Hanslick admitted in his bitter review that the concert was a triumph for the composer. "How was the new Symphony received? Boisterous rejoicing, waving of handkerchiefs from those standing, innumerable recalls, laurel wreaths." It is dedicated to "His Imperial and Royal Apostolic Majesty, Franz Josef I., Emperor of Austria and Apostolic King of Hungary, etc., etc., with deepest respect, Anton Bruckner." It is scored for three each of the wood-winds, the third bassoon alternating with a double bassoon; eight horns, four of which alternating with a quartet of tubas; three trumpets, three trombones, contra-bass tuba; three harps, kettle-drums, triangle, cymbals; the usual strings. Bruckner has sometimes been accused of formlessness. In reality no criticism could be wider of the mark. His handling of form is merely different from that of symphonists like Beethoven. Witness the course of this Symphony in C minor. A single note sustained through several measures, serves as introduction. Bases sing the first theme. It comes in low register, at first hesitatingly, then in full melodic contour. It is gloomy, forbidding, of the essence of tragedy. There are several repetitions, there is some development. Then the second theme emerges. It is in G major, a typically Brucknerian theme. Its first motif comprises two quarter-notes followed by a triplet of three-quarters, a formula which Bruckner especially liked. This theme is the brightest in the symphony—a theme of cheerfulness tinged with sentiment. Bruckner uses it persistently in this first movement, often in inversion. That is, in descending form, whereas orginally it is chiefly ascending. An important subdivision of the theme occurs considerably later in horns followed by woodwinds over a pizzicato bass in triplets. Cheerfulness has now gone out of the mood, which is one of quiet solemnity. The development treats these themes by every known contrapuntal and rhythmical device, mainly in the order in which they originally occur, with a repetition of suggestions of the first theme near the end, to lead into the recapitulation. The recapitulation is much less a direct repetition of themes than is the custom of the classical composers. The first theme is now introduced in high woodwinds, where at first it entered in low basses. Not only is the register changed, but it is now heard also in inversion. And it comes not in the direct forthright form of the beginning, but in a more developed state. Further, there is less obvious preparation for the second theme, which enters in a solo trumpet, "ausdrucksvoll" (expressively).

In the symphonies before the Eighth Bruckner followed his first movement with an Adagio. In the Eighth and the Ninth a Scherzo succeeds. The gloom at the end of the first movement is too deep to permit a slow movement to come next. Rightly or wrongly the appellation "Der deutsche Michel" has come to be associated with this Scherzo. To translate the phrase into "The German Michael" is to lose all its significance. It represents the naive stupidity, the ponderous and thick-headed humor which one associates with country bumpkins. The theme of the principal division of the Scherzo well deserves the label, "Der deutsche Michel," for its blunt, awkward, square-toed, or better, square-headedness. But it is cast against a background of fantastic and almost fairy-like delicacy. It receives due portion of repetition and development. Of the Trio Bruckner is reported to have said, "Der deutsche Michel träumt ins Land Hinaus—"The German Michael dreams (or would it be better under the circumstances to translate 'träumt' by 'stumbles'?) his way into the country." The theme, at first in the strings, is beautifully lyrical. The Scherzo is then literally repeated.

The Adagio is one of the longest slow movements in existence, and one of the most lovely. One can best understand it by remembering that it consists of three separate developments, each more extended and more climactic than the preceding, of the two themes of the movement. The first theme is of exceedingly long breath, haunting, pleading, in character. It is introduced by the first violins. The second theme is sung by 'cellos, as if in answer to the pleading of the first. It too is wondrously lyric. Near the height of the third development, brass intone the "Siegfried motiv" from Wagner's "Ring." The coda is given to the first theme.

The Finale is grandiose, a culmination in the truest sense. The figure with which it begins (suggestive of galloping horses) continues throughout the long, war-like first theme. A second theme is in part lyric, in part choral-like and churchly in mood. The development is exceedingly complex contrapuntally, with the choral motif frequently heard throughout. The recapitulation makes a powerful entry with the first theme, while the second enters as a fugato. The main climax of the whole work comes in the coda, which is begun by trombones proclaiming the first theme of the Symphony against the trumpets with the theme of the Scherzo, and ends at the last with a combination of the main themes of the four different movements in a triumphal C major. A. H. M.

Block-Note

A Young Person Attends a Young People's Symphony

STACK your coats in your chairs . . . dears . . . sit on them . . . not your hats . . . just your coats . . . yes, the one in the middle . . . the one waving his arms about . . . yes . . . that's Koussevitzky.

What with beating time on the floor and prodding the velvet flowers on the hat before us while Koussevitzky made whoopee with Prokofiev, we had an immense interesting time. But during the whoopee-making and the flower-prodding we stopped for a moment and wondered.

Of course there was Mr. Meyer (talking as Mr. Meyer thinks one should talk with children) and the strong and noble Larghetto followed by the weak and repetitious Allegro, both from the Concerto Grosso, No. 12, by Handel. There was the "Classical Symphony" and the sad moment when Koussevitzky left us to the less tender hands of Burgin and Bedetti. Bedetti quite as good as always. Burgin as good as could be expected, giving us a diminished version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and a strenuous (for Mr. Burgin only) tussle with Johann Strauss.

Then every one crammed hats onto heads and trolley cars filled. In the poignant north light of Huntington Avenue and violet-venders, some were tempted to sing. . . . At least we were.

JON CHEEVER

Cherubic Bruckner II.

In The Organ-Loft He Rhapsodizes Celestially

Music Aside, The Composer Was Simple-Minded, Devout, Child-Like. The Artist, Boehler, Caught the Fancy of The Viennese by Picturing Him in The Company of Cherubs

Children's Concert, Critic's Excursions

TRANS. — MAR. 20

Young People's Matinee With Side-Glances Toward Other Passing Matters

ANXIOUS, and also irritable, elders should bestir themselves. The children and young people of this town, being born into their own time, are already incipient modernists. In considerable numbers they assembled yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall for their last concert—save only the repetition today—of the current season. Under the present dispensation some three hundred places are reserved for the youngsters whose father, mother or next friend will pay the price and who usually appear accompanied. These are, in the words of a budding cynic of tender age, "the seats of the little rich children." Now on Tuesday afternoon, it was to be observed that almost every one of them was occupied; whereas an appreciable part of the seats distributed among the public schools at a nominal charge stood empty. The upper balcony, for example, was virtually bare; while the center of the parquet yielded hardly a gap. It is regrettable that the pupils in the public schools, their teachers and their parents, are not more receptive of opportunity. There may even be means, as yet unapplied, to incite them to it.

The point, however, to be made at the moment is quite different. A comically passionate voice was lately raised in this town, bidding the Symphony Orchestra give concerts at one dime per head in the vasty depths of the Boston Garden. Then would "the people" receive the "cultural" and "inspirational" impetus believed to proceed from its ministrations. By the cumulative evidence of these children's concerts at Symphony Hall, "the people" remain persistently indifferent to such "privileges"; whereas other social orders more generally and eagerly seek them. Were the trustees of orchestras to compare notes, a like disposition toward any and all symphonic music would probably be disclosed in every American city, with Chicago as the only possible exception. There is ground to believe that for some time to come symphony concerts will remain an aristocratic pleasure, for the excellent reason that the democratic world, customarily called "the people," sedom cares for them. Nor need the thick-waisted wrestlers or the swift-footed hockey-teams take alarm. The Boston Orchestra—it may be said with a smile of re-assurance—has no mind to enter the precincts that they abundantly adorn.

To return to the young modernists. . . . They heard yesterday, for example, an air of Bach played with matched skill and just feeling by Mr. Bedetti upon the violoncello and Mr. Snow upon the organ. As numbers at these concerts go, it was a slow movement, longish, sustained, songful. The assembled youngsters listened patiently and, as it is customary to say of their elders on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening, applauded politely. When, however, the orchestra sounded the rhythms and the sonorities of four of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the rich scoring of Ravel, the youthful audience pricked up ears, set eyes alight, clapped hands with a will. Its shoulders danced to a Viennese waltz out of Johann Strauss, while in the numbers in the ancient style—two divisions of a Concerto Grosso of Handel and Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony"—the quick-paced, light-rhythmed Allegros or the Russian's tapping Gavotte most interested it. Even our children—it is to be feared—are as God made most of us, the creatures of our own time. Nor by that token are they musically unsusceptible. In the northwest corner of the first balcony the children caught more of Musorgsky's humor off the tongues of Goldberg and Schmuyle than do some quarters of the hall at the august subscription concerts.

Though New York is two hundred odd miles away and cares not tuppence ha'penny for us sorry dwellers in the hinterlands, there was reason to marvel at Mr. Koussevitzky's presumption in the placing of Prokofiev's Classical Symphony upon the program. That eminent conductor, the Signor Toscanini, with whose ascent to the podium the performance of symphonic music seemingly began and with whose descent therefrom it will end "eter-nellement" (as they say in French operas) lately played the piece in Manhattan. Forthwith "this writer," as he oftenest calls himself, hastened in The Times to put all and sundry in their places. Said he:

Now, the Prokofiev "Classic Symphony" has been played more than once in New York, and with almost impeccable finish and delicacy by Serge Koussevitzky and the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is hard to imagine the work better performed than it is by these gentlemen. Yet there was in the Toscanini interpretation something nearer and further than even the distinguished Bostonians achieved. At their hands one marveled at Prokofiev's ingenuity, fluency, adaptability in assuming for the nonce the mask of the classic form and style. Mr. Toscanini accomplished something more. He gave the music a vitality and an authenticity that neither Koussevitzky nor Prokofiev had achieved. Thus the symphony, transfigured, became a marvelous, laughing, Italianate inspiration, a modern glorification, as it were, of the spirit of a Scarlatti or Pergolesi, or other son of light and beauty. The Symphony danced. It was mercurial. It was winged. There were nuances, particularly Mr. Toscanini's." There were a dozen miracles a minute. The point is that the music sounded new, and freshly created, and genuinely inspired.

Yet Mr. Koussevitzky—shameless man, as they say in Wagnerian music-drama—continues to play the piece. Possibly he might cloak his shame were he to try it once with an orchestra as few in numbers as he assembles for lighter Mozart or earlier Beethoven. The quicker the pace, the defter the turns, the nimbler the touch, so much the better for Prokofiev's quirks and fancies. And the normal seventy strings, however sensitive, may not escape a certain weight of tone and movement.

To make, at last, the record: Mr. Meyer succeeded well with the difficult task of informing and ingratiating talk to youngsters about an eighteenth-century Concerto Grosso and a twentieth-century "Classical Symphony;" apropos Bach digressed entertainly to organs; apropos Musorgsky's "Bydlo" to two-wheeled carts; finally came into his and the youngsters' own with the tale of Baba Yaga, the witch, as pictured—glowingly—in Russian fairy books. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted through the pieces from Handel and Prokofiev; Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Snow went their own sweet way with Bach's air; Mr. Burgin led in the other items, the Viennese waltz included. He took it in straightforward, workmanlike fashion, but at least once Johann Strauss deserves Mr. Koussevitzky himself. There are those who still remember Dr. Muck's "Blue Danube." His successor should set an equal memory beside it. H. T. P.

HERALD MAR. 21

1929 Herald Mar 20

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Perhaps it was due to the charm of the preliminary tales such as children love to hear, which were told by Alfred H. Meyer. It might have been purely because of the melodious and imaginative quality of the music. Whatever the influence, it was plain to see that Moussorgsky's four numbers—excerpts from "Pictures at an Art Exhibition," arranged for the orchestra by the French composer, Ravel, cast a certain spell over the large assemblage of music-loving youngsters gathered in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon for the Young People's concert, quite unequalled by the earlier selections of the program.

It may have been that youth from city apartments could hardly grasp a tonal representation of the heavy-breathing, labored swing of tired oxen and the creaking rumble of wooden carts so vividly described by Mr. Meyer in his interpretation of "Bydlo." But they liked it. And they surely caught the contented barnyard sounds in the "Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells," and the intonations of the two talkative Hebrews in the number, "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," if one might judge by happy chuckles. With a fairy story of an old Russian witch and an ill-treated maiden wandering in the woods haunting their memories, there was nothing for it but to be merry over "The Hut on Fowl's Legs."

The program began with Movements from the Concerto Grosso No. 12, by Handel, Larghetto-Allegro, continuing with the "Classical" Symphony, Opus 25, by Prokofieff and the Arioso by Bach. In the last-named number Jean Bedetti played the violoncello, with Albert W. Snow accompanying at the organ. Mr. Koussevitsky conducted throughout this part of the program. Mr. Burgin was the conductor for the Moussorgsky numbers and the final waltz, "Voices of Spring," by Strauss.

The Boston Symphony orchestra lived up to its high standard of perfection in the performance. Mr. Meyer gave an entertaining and informative account of each composer and the selections which were to be played before each rendition, illustrated with the stereopticon. The program will be repeated this afternoon at 4 o'clock. F. A. B.

THE SYMPHONY AND CHILDREN

To the Editor of The Herald:

It would seem obvious to at least one of the readers of yesterday's editorial that if the Symphony orchestra is to win to it an increasing number of patrons, it must create in the young people now growing up a taste and a demand for the kind of music it provides. To that end were the young people's concerts inaugurated, with the hope that school authorities would appreciate the opportunity offered to students, and encourage attendance as far as possible.

Yet such has not proved to be the case. The first concerts came near to taxing the capacity of the hall, but this year's young patrons have so fallen off in numbers that there are always large numbers of vacant seats, in spite of the fact that the management has offered a block of floor seats to the adult public. Private schools have always been represented in goodly numbers. The indifference can be traced directly to the public schools. In several large public schools in the city proper, these young people's concerts have not been announced at all, or announced perfunctorily only by a notice on the school bulletin board. In some instances the order and purchase of tickets has been made difficult, because this must be done between periods, on the way to classes in more or less distant parts of the building. No one, unless possibly the music director, has urged attendance or encouraged interest in what is probably as fine orchestral music as may be heard anywhere in the world.

The young people themselves are not to blame. Many of them come from families whose taste in music as well as in the other arts, is still unformed and uncultured, and who have never realized their own deficiency. They cannot always recognize an opportunity when it is offered.

It remains for the school to stand in loco parentis. Yet here in Boston we could wish our school administrators more sympathetic to education in appreciation of the arts. We could wish them to remember that, over and beyond all training, education should serve as "the initiation of the mind into ever new and finer types of experience."

Boston should not lag so far behind other parts of the country in this. This week in New York a performance of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" is being given for students and school children, to whom choice seats have been awarded as prizes. The whole undertaking has been wisely planned and wisely executed, with a view to giving to children from families of moderate means an unforgettable vision of a beauty that may be part of their lives, once they have learned to recognize it.

[illegible] they can recognize [illegible] that the instinct for great art can be encouraged and fostered to an amazing result is amply proved by Ernest Schelling's "request" program at the last of his New York children's concerts. The children expressed a preference for Wagner's "Tannhäuser Overture," MacDowell's "To a Water Lily," Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic," Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Golden Cockerell." Quite a contrast to the adult "request" programs at the Boston "pops"!

ELAINE WESTALL GOULD.

Jamaica Plain, March 19.

MAR 21 29

The Screen

After Twenty Years Bruckner's Eighth

A Symphony, Like No Other, Returns This Week to Symphony Hall

WHEN has a Symphony suffered the fate that Bruckner's Eighth has endured in Boston? Mr. Fiedler played it (for the first time in America) on March 3, 1909. It was so well liked that it was repeated "by general request," the same spring, on April 24. None the less, it straightway receded to the shelves. Dr. Muck turned to other Bruckner; Mr. Monteux did not touch it; and now Mr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back to the Symphony Concerts as semi-novelty for his first venture with Bruckner. Perhaps its length makes conductors think twice before they place it upon programs; for it requires well over an hour in performance. Only Mr. Hill's shorter Symphony, replayed from last year, stands with it on tomorrow's program. A brief intermission will separate them.

Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, in C minor, was written in the years 1885-86; was revised in the winter of 1889-90; came to first performance in Vienna Dec. 18, 1892, at a Philharmonic Concert led by Hans Richter. Even Hanslick admitted in his bitter review that the concert was a triumph for the composer. "How was the new Symphony received? Boisterous rejoicing, waving of handkerchiefs from those standing, innumerable recalls, laurel wreaths." It is dedicated to "His Imperial and Royal Apostolic Majesty, Franz Josef I., Emperor of Austria and Apostolic King of Hungary, etc., etc., with deepest respect, Anton Bruckner." It is scored for three each of the wood-winds, the third bassoon alternating with a double bassoon; eight horns, four of which alternating with a quartet of tubas; three trumpets, three trombones, contra-bass tuba; three harps, kettle-drums, triangle, cymbals; the usual strings.

Bruckner has sometimes been accused of formlessness. In reality no criticism could be wider of the mark. His handling of form is merely different from that of symphonists like Beethoven. Witness the course of this Symphony in C minor. A single note sustained through several measures, serves as introduction. Bases sing the first theme. It comes in low register, at first hesitatingly, then in full melodic contour. It is gloomy, forbidding, of the essence of tragedy. There are several repetitions, there is some development. Then the second theme emerges. It is in G major, a typically Brucknerian theme. Its first motif comprises two quarter-notes followed by a triplet of three-quarters, a formula which Bruckner especially liked. This theme is the brightest in the symphony—a theme of cheerfulness tinged with sentiment. Bruckner uses it persistently in this first movement, often in inversion. That is, in descending form, whereas orginally it is chiefly ascending. An important subdivision of the theme occurs considerably later in horns followed by woodwinds over a pizzicato bass in triplets. Cheerfulness has now gone out of the [illegible]hich is one of quiet solemnity. The development treats these themes by every known contrapuntal and rhythmical device, mainly in the order in which they originally occur, with a repetition of suggestions of the first theme near the end, to lead into the recapitulation. The recapitulation is much less a direct repetition of themes than is the custom of the classical composers. The first theme is now introduced in high woodwinds, where at first it entered in low basses. Not only is the register changed, but it is now heard also in inversion. And it comes not in the direct forthright form of the beginning, but in a more developed state. Further, there is less obvious preparation for the second theme, which enters in a solo trumpet, "ausdrucksvoll" (expressively).

In the symphonies before the Eighth Bruckner followed his first movement with an Adagio. In the Eighth and the Ninth a Scherzo succeeds. The gloom at the end of the first movement is too deep to permit a slow movement to come next. Rightly or wrongly the appellation "Der deutsche Michel" has come to be associated with this Scherzo. To translate the phrase into "The German Michael" is to lose all its significance. It represents the naive stupidity, the ponderous, and thick-headed humor which one associates with country bumpkins. The theme of the principal division of the Scherzo well deserves the label, "Der deutsche Michel," for its blunt, awkward, square-toed, or better, square-headedness. But it is cast against a background of fantastic and almost fairy-like delicacy. It receives due portion of repetition and development. Of the Trio Bruckner is reported to have said, "Der deutsche Michel träumt ins Land Hinaus—"The German Michael dreams (or would it be better under the circumstances to translate 'träumt' by 'stumbles'?) his way into the country." The theme, at first in the strings, is beautifully lyrical. The Scherzo is then literally repeated.

The Adagio is one of the longest slow movements in existence, and one of the most lovely. One can best understand it by remembering that it consists of three separate developments, each more extended and more climactic than the preceding, of the two themes of the movement. The first theme is of exceedingly long breath, haunting, pleading, in character. It is introduced by the first violins. The second theme is sung by 'cellos, as if in answer to the pleading of the first. It too is wondrously lyric. Near the height of the third development, brass intone the "Siegfried motiv" from Wagner's "Ring." The coda is given to the first theme.

The Finale is grandiose, a culmination in the truest sense. The figure with which it begins (suggestive of galloping horses) continues throughout the long, war-like first theme. A second theme is in part lyric, in part choral-like and churchly in mood. The development is exceedingly complex contrapuntally, with the choral motif frequently heard throughout. The recapitulation makes a powerful entry with the first theme, while the second enters as a fugato. The main climax of the whole work comes in the coda, which is begun by trombones proclaiming the first theme of the Symphony against the trumpets with the theme of the Scherzo, and ends at the last with a combination of the main themes of the four different movements in a triumphal C major. A. H. M.

Block-Note

A Young Person Attends a Young People's Symphony

STACK your coats in your chairs . . . dears . . . sit on them . . . not your hats . . . just your coats . . . yes, the one in the middle . . . the one waving his arms about . . . yes . . . that's Koussevitzky.

What with beating time on the floor and prodding the velvet flowers on the hat before us while Koussevitzky made whoopee with Prokofiev, we had an immense interesting time. But during the whoopee-making and the flower-prodding we stopped for a moment and wondered.

Of course there was Mr. Meyer (talking as Mr. Meyer thinks one should talk with children) and the strong and noble Larghetto followed by the weak and repetitious Allegro, both from the Concerto Grosso, No. 12, by Handel. There was the "Classical Symphony" and the sad moment when Koussevitzky left us to the less tender hands of Burgin and Bedetti. Bedetti quite as good as always. Burgin as good as could be expected, giving us a diminished version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and a strenuous (for Mr. Burgin only) tussle with Johann Strauss.

Then every one crammed hats onto heads and trolley cars filled. In the poignant north light of Huntington Avenue and violet-venders, some were tempted to sing. . . . At least we were.

JON CHEEVER

LOCAL STATIONS TUNE

WNAC

[illegible] A.M.—News summary.
[illegible] A.M.—Morning Watch.
[illegible] A.M.—Boston Information Ser
[illegible] A.M.—The Polar Bears.
[illegible] A.M.—Grant's Magic Buyers.
[illegible] A.M.—National Radio Homet
[illegible] A.M.—Concert Orchestra.
[illegible] A.M.—The WNAC Women's [illegible]achusetts Parent-Teacher Assoc
[illegible] A.M.—News Flashes.
[illegible] A.M.—Time Signals and We [illegible] Noon—Radio Household Baz
[illegible] P.M.—Noon Service. Bro
[illegible] King's Chapel.
[illegible] P.M.—Colonial Luncheon Con
[illegible] P.M.—Barclay Orchestra.
[illegible] P.M.—News Flashes.
[illegible] P.M.—Boston Information Ser
[illegible] P.M.—The Dandies of Yester

WEEI

[illegible] A.M.—Tower Health Exercises
[illegible] A.M.—Rastus and his Musica
[illegible] A.M.—E. B. Rideout, meteor
[illegible] A.M.—Looking over the morn
[illegible] A.M.—Cheerio.
[illegible] A.M.—Parnassus Trio.
8.50 A.M.—Concert for shoppers.
9.00 A.M.—National Home Hour.
10.00 A.M.—Stock report by Paine
11.00 A.M.—Yester-thoughts.
11.05 A.M.—Radio Household Insti
11.15 A.M.—The Friendly Five.
11.30 A.M.—News despatches.
11.59 A.M.—Stock report by Paine
12.10 P.M.—Lenten service broadcas
12.15 P.M.—[illegible]nial Theater under the auspices
Boston Federation of Churches.
[illegible]win H. Hughes, D.D., Methodis
Church, Chicago Area. Ben Redc
[illegible] P.M.—Boston Farmers' Prod

[illegible]—Time.
[illegible]—Beacon Hill Symphonette
[illegible]—Esther Dodge Nagel, sop
[illegible]bit, accompanist.
[illegible] P.M.—Neapolitan Dutch Girls.
[illegible] P.M.—Thayer McNeil program.

WBZ-WBZA

9.30 A.M.—Musicale.
9.45—Town Shoppes.
9.55—Musicale.
9.59—Telechron time.
10.00 P.M.—"The Psychology and I Beauty."
10.30—Official agriculture report.
10.40—News bulletins.
10.45—Musicale.
10.57—Financial news.
11.00—R.C.A. Educational Hour—
rosch.
12.01 P.M.—University Extension
American Literature by Prof
Emmons Rogers of M.I.T.
12.30—Chimes.
12.31—Official agriculture report
weatherman.
12.50—Financial news.
12.55—Government bulletins.
2.30—Musicale.
2.50—Beauty and Health.

Cherubic Bruckner I.

In the Elysian Fields He Dances with Mozart

Music Aside, The Composer Was Simple-Hearted, Devout, Child-Like. The Artist, Boehler, Caught the Fancy of The Viennese by Picturing Him in The Company of Cherubs

TRANS. MAR 21

TRANS MAR 21

Incidents and Prospects

For the first time in many years, on Friday and Saturday of next week, Beethoven's Choral Symphony, will be heard at the subscription concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. Hitherto, Mr. Koussevitzky has preferred to keep it occasional—for a centenary Beethoven Festival or a concert to increase the Pension Fund of the band. Now, seemingly, he is harking back to the German custom which sets it apart for Good Friday. Dr. Davison's youth from Harvard and Radcliffe will provide the chorus for the Finale; the assisting quartet will soon be announced. Again, by German precedent, Beethoven's First Symphony will precede his Ninth.

Finding the program over-long for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky has put over to another occasion the revival of Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Besides Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, only Mr. Hill's Symphony, first played a year ago and notably well received, will be heard.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS AGAIN

Trans Mar. 22

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Here's a personal letter which I wrote to a friend, portions of which I quote: "You don't realize the widespread dissatisfaction there is in musical circles about the symphony programs.

"Last Sunday morning I walked the length of Commonwealth avenue. A number of people stopped me, saying that they wanted to thank me for my letters. One person said: 'I will give up my seats if the present conditions continue.' Monday morning I went to Symphony Hall to get my ticket for Rachmaninoff's recital. After a lady had bought her seat, she turned to me and said, 'You are Mr. Johns, and I want to thank you for your letters about the programs.' I then said to the lady, 'I am glad you agree with me.' 'Oh!' said she, 'there are so many who agree with you.' The lady then left and I asked at the box-office the lady's name, which proved to be Mrs. Ginn, the widow of the publisher. Some members of the Tavern Club are violently opposed to the programs. One of the most musical amateurs I know, the other day said, 'I have my regular seats for the concerts, but I have been only once, because I can't stand the programs.'

"My experience of last Sunday and Monday is a sample of other days of the last two or three weeks, when I began to write to the Transcript. Since then, people have come to me in the street, at concerts, in restaurants and everywhere expressing their gratitude."

The performance of Brahms and Berlioz, last Saturday, was magnificent.

CLAYTON JOHNS

Boston, March 21.

Symphony

From Hill To Bruckner with Koussevitzky

TRANS. MAR 23

A Terse American Symphony Is Foil to A Vast Viennese Vision

THROUGH Bruckner's Eighth Symphony yesterday, by the faith and zeal of Mr. Koussevitzky restored—after twenty years—to Symphony Hall, few departed; not too many seemed restless or abstracted. Most heard intent; while enough lingered to return conductor and orchestra two or three rounds of honest applause. Only bare spots in the second balcony suggested a composer remote from current ken, aloof from general admiration. Yet it is hard to imagine a symphony more at odds with the experience and the expectation of current audiences. Only the illustrious and the established — Strauss, Wagner, Beethoven — may risk far-flung lengths in American concert-halls. Even they may not always escape the reproach of tedium. Bruckner's Eighth Symphony turns the hour before the last note has sounded; lays itself open to blame or to indifference that to other music might be doom. Bruckner did not distinguish amongst his musical inventions or meditating them—he was a slow worker—deceived himself. Within him they upsprang clothed with power, garlanded with beauty, aglow with spiritual intensity. They would sweep beyond the earth and there scale the heavens.

Within Bruckner also unfolded other inventions that were platitudes of musical routine, commonplaces of simple, and almost semi-literate, mentality. In his whole life, probably, Bruckner never wrote a measure or spoke a word with tongue in cheek. Therefore these paltry and poverty-stricken expedients were the delusions of a nature too innocent to master the complex, evasive art of self-criticism. Even into his Eighth and Ninth Symphonies, counted his masterpieces, they went, side by side with others that might be as the pure gold of apocalyptic vision or as great winds blowing across the earth. He himself who had made them could not discriminate. Yet any audience, unless it be under the soporific spell permeating Austro-German concert-halls when Bruckner or Mahler is in question, quickly separates the Brucknerian ore from the Brucknerian dross; forgets the unconscious grovelling for the equally unconscious genius. Bruckner's imagination could take superb wing; yet his mind could also plod leaden. Head in air, feet on earth—the one heedless of the other—he walked the cloisters of St. Florian where he was abbey-organist, the garden of the Belvedere in Vienna where he spent his final years. Likewise he sat at his writing table while his fingers traced notes upon the staves.

A like Bruckner developed and fructified these inventions. Sometimes the music so born climbed the heights toward sublimity; filled the surrounding air with glows little short of incandescence; hid the dark and striving effort in the rich mantle of final achievement. In this Eighth Symphony are such pages of nobility and exaltation, pages of ecstasy and awe that, in our mechanistic day, are a treasurable heritage from music. Time and the fates may yet make them perdurable. Yet there are pages as many, and in this same Symphony, in which Bruckner begins, tries, fails, and starts over again—until the waiting ear and the receiving spirit are numb with the balking. There are pages as well in which he takes refuge or gains breathing spell in technical devices and evasions that long before his time were tricks of the classroom in every conservatory.

Or, once more, Bruckner slips into naivétés, and within them paddles about content, that seem the futile pastime of a peasant-mind dowered by inscrutable heaven with the gift of music-making. He can write scherzi that idealize the play of peasants under the stimulus of nature; that in the trios set them to homely dreams and fancies. Into this homeliness, as in the Scherzo of this Eighth Symphony, he can wind beauty—the beauty of old sensations in creation newly remembered. As suddenly his villagers relapse into japing, flat-footed folk unmeet for musical company. Worst of all—scherzi aside—there are moments when Bruckner rises in upswelling climax to the summit of his "great argument"; firm upon that summit sees his solemnities billowing about it, his vision opened and fulfilled. And at the next moment he has toppled over the other side to be lost in scrubby music-making. With harmonies and timbres grant him the imitations and borrowings from Wagner, who to him was the sum of all music. Yet above most composers he has discovered the solemn eloquence of tubas, tenor, bass and double-bass. He is intuitive and imaginative with the string choir; but set him to the woodwinds and too often he is little more than an organist who happens to write music. And so it goes with every facet of his imagination, in every phase of his practice.

Bruckner was born in Austria; lived his years and did his work at Linz and Vienna. He had Austrian qualities and with them his scherzi are imprinted. Yet in the act of composition he was deeper impregnated with vaguer, vastier, more sublimated German moods. Teutonic fashion, he would write, and too often did write a music of grandiose solemnities, of swollen ecstasies, fanning largely a luminous but otherwise empty air. In a Nirvana of platitudes he could swim and believe himself radiant. He needed his Austrian scherzi to recall him to the good, green, sun-kissed earth. The great baroque abbey of St. Florian, near Linz, the more rococo abbey-church, where he played as organist, haunted his spirit—a religious house on the countryside, a house of aspiration, devotion, and illumination. Yet how ornate were—and are—its decorations and how much of that ornament is rococo fustian! Seek out St. Florian's and ever afterward it seems the birth-house of Bruckner's symphonies. Even in Vienna he dwelt over the way from Prince Eugene's baroque Belvedere.

Be the background what it may, there is that in these last symphonies—the Seventh of the Dirge for Wagner, this far-spreading Eighth, the unfinished Ninth, "to the good God" dedicated—to lay hold upon not few that hear; to linger with them in deep impression. The first movement of the Eighth, better sustained than is Bruckner's wont, moves nobly. There are gravities, solemnities, exaltations. The Scherzo touches, gains, holds lightly, the homely, simple, natural beauty that at thought of his native peasant world he could weave into transfiguring tones. The Adagio is music of the visioning Bruckner who saw the heavens opened, the worlds unfolded, the mysteries declared, who in his own imagination experienced the apocalypse and in its reflection wrote black notes on white music-paper. Music of more intensified aspiration, of more rarefied wonder, there can hardly be. Franck pales; Skriabin seems paltry, beside it. In the Finale Bruckner would command majesty and with it encompass the earth. The Lord God descends in His chariot. Bruckner tries, fails; tries and fails again; at turn after turn his faults and his idiosyncrasies mock his purpose, defeat his will. Yet there are moments. And few enough, who can see and would embody such a vision, have even them.

To Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, Bruckner owed much, listening no doubt, from Paradise where the affectionate and witty Viennese liked to fancy him naive and gauche and cherished. To have played Skriabin, as the conductor plays him, is no unserviceable preparation for Bruckner. Here again is a music of aspiration and ecstasy, of solemnities and exaltation. The Austrian, however, is no prey to the Russian's sensuousness, escapes his nervous restlessness. An austerer mind, a firmer spirit had Bruckner. His needs in performance are perception and intensification. Through his mannerisms and faults, recessions and futilities, the conductor must pierce to the core of the musical thought; in spite of them outspread and sustain the musical mood. Bruckner abounds in half-accomplishment, in semi-attainment. The conductor must intensify him into full achievement, wrap him in the tonal glories that he visioned; with him touch the mysteries and draw not too far back with dazzled eyes. These were the works done by Mr. Koussevitzky upon this Eighth Symphony. One side of his temperament—it was easy to foresee—would go out to Bruckner. In the performance of Friday that union stood affirmed. The preparation had been long; once more the orchestra was resolved into the conductor's instrument and the composer's voice. The strings have seldom sung more luminously. The playing of the tenor and the bass tubas—they are treacherous instruments—made skill the servant of imagination.

By fortunate choice Mr. Koussevitzky set before Bruckner's lengthy Symphony from Vienna the briefer Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge, produced and applauded last year, heard yesterday with renewed acclaim that led the composer to the stage. Mr. Hill's music is full-bodied, warm-blooded, free-motioned. From the impetuous sonorities of the first movement; through the second division modernly songful, beginning in lyric warmth, ending in more introspective mood; to the energy, incisiveness and high spirits of the finale, it goes clear-voiced, concentrated, vivid and alive. The invention is choice; the workmanship adept; the atmosphere oftenest sunlit; the desired end without obvious labor or calculation achieved. Out of the Symphony breathe an American vivacity and vitality, here and there by graver New England quality tinged. It deserved repetition; it should join Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" as "standard" American piece. Mr. Koussevitzky might have searched the library of Symphony Hall and found no happy foil to all that is Brucknerian.

H. T. P.

Forty-Fourth Year

The Pops Again from May 1, Mr. Casella Conducting

SIGNS of spring multiply. In yesterday's program-book at the Symphony Concert, the forty-third renewal of the Pop Concerts was announced. This year, contrary to custom, they will not begin on the Monday following the close of the Symphony Concerts. On the succeeding Wednesday, May 1, falls the opening night. Through a third spring, completing his present term, Mr. Casella will be conductor, planning his programs on the broad scale of the past. Eighty men from the Symphony Orchestra will play them. All else as usual. To clubs, colleges and the like that would have their own evening—reserve it now.

113

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bruckner's Eighth, Hill's in B Flat Fill Program

Globe Mar 22

Beethoven's Choral Symphony to Be Heard at Next Week's Concerts

Two symphonies filled the program of yesterday's symphony concert, Bruckner's Eighth, and Prof E. B. Hill's in B flat. Dukas' "Sorceror's Apprentice," announced in advance, was not played. There is unusual interest in the announcement that Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be given at next week's concerts. It has not been played in the regular subscription series since 1910, though there have been numerous performances outside the subscription series. The chorus will as usual be drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society.

Prof Hill's Symphony in B flat was first performed last March at these concerts. In repeating it now Mr Koussevitzky is refuting a common criticism of orchestral conductors to the effect that after once performing a new work especially one by an American composer they leave it to gather dust on the library shelves.

A single performance does not suffice to test the quality of a piece of music. Anything worth playing once is worth playing more than once. He has already repeated this season Bloch's "America," and revived Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, so that this prompt repetition of Mr Hill's symphony is not an isolated instance.

Opinion as to the merit of these works varies, as is always the case with new music, and frequently the case with old. But Mr Koussevitzky is unquestionably right in repeating American and other new works in which he believes. In such matters he must be guided by his own judgment, not by that of reviewers or public.

Composer Appears

One found little reason yesterday to alter the opinion of Prof Hill's symphony expressed in these columns after the first performance. It again seemed well written and fluent music in a manner not offensively modern, but devoid of melodic and thematic invention. The audience applauded it cordially, and the composer came to the stage, in response to the conductor's repeated beckoning gesture, to bow.

Not since Nov 19, 1915, when Dr Muck conducted a performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony that still glows in memory, has a work by Bruckner been heard in Boston. For this neglect the World War was, of course, partly responsible, but the length of Bruckner's symphonies and their lack of immediate popular appeal has had not a little to do with it. The Eighth Symphony, heard yesterday, was last played here in 1909. Its four movements take about an hour to perform. Bruckner's music is profoundly original in substance, though the influence of Wagner and of Beethoven on his style is obvious. His themes are less salient than his development of them. It is said that his ambition was to use in the symphony the methods Wagner employed in his later music dramas. His working out of his musical ideas has often been called diffuse and rambling, because he does not follow the conventional forms of the classic symphony neatly and concisely.

This objection seemed yesterday ill-founded. Bruckner has a great deal to say. He felt deeply and intensely, and expressed himself in an original and powerful manner. The harmonic element in his music is distinctive. His style is not obviously contrapuntal, yet in his way of inverting themes and combining them one feels the influence of his familiarity with counterpoint, which he taught for years, and of the habit of improvising fugues for organ, which so impressed some of his musical contemporaries.

Eloquent Reading

If the circumstances of his life had been more favorable, if he had not been a peasant, musically educated relatively late in life, Bruckner might have been able to express himself more fully in his music. His symphonies suggest massive sculptured groups hacked and hewn from unmalleable material by an artist whose heart and soul were full of emotions and ideas for which he could not find easy and graceful utterance.

Mr Koussevitzky gave an eloquent and painstaking reading. One missed in the adagio the steady mighty flow of rhythm and melody Bruckner demands. It ought to move with the relentless urge of Bach's greatest music, with no hesitancy and no sudden outbursts.

Next week's program includes Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies.

P. R.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Their Places In the Long Creative Line

TRANS MAR 23 27

Mahler and Bruckner Return By Just Right and Title To Symphony Hall

RICHARD Wagner, keen critic as well as inspired conductor, delivered an exceptionally far-sighted judgment when he held that the story of the symphony was a closed book after Beethoven's Ninth. For Beethoven's successors found it impossible to carry his symphony to higher development. Wagner might also have recognized that the Mozartean opera could have—did have—no further evolution. It is another opera, that of Weber and Meyerbeer, which his music-dramas bring to its culmination. Similarly a new type of symphony grew during the course of the nineteenth century, finally to reach the highest point of its development in Gustav Mahler.

"Three groups of musicians stand between Beethoven and Mahler," says Paul Bekker in the opening chapter of his book, "Gustav Mahler's Symphonies," in which the chapter entitled "The Symphonic Style," is the principal basis for this article. The first of these groups includes the romanticists of central Germany—Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms. Beethoven's monumental conceptions they were unable to attain. Their horizon is narrower, Beethoven's vision encompassing all humanity is replaced in part by the tasteful literary interest of cultured circles. A second group is that of the program musicians under the leadership of Liszt. Their view is broader than that of the romantic symphonists; but at its worst their product degenerates into a music merely descriptive.

"While these two groups, fighting for supremacy, were in control of the field, a third is growing up in the quiet that results from a lack of external success, —that of the Austrian symphonists. Franz Schubert is their herald, Anton Bruckner their most powerful elemental force, Gustav Mahler fulfills their alms." They discard programs; like Beethoven, plan monumentally; substitute romantic naturalism and pantheistic religiosity for the strictly ethical humanism of Beethoven.

The Beethovenian symphony, based on Haydn's four-movement scheme, brought with it three problems. The first two concerned the order in which the four highly individualized movements should succeed each other. Originally the scherzo or minuet furnished polite and easy transition between the emotion-laden slow movement and the brisk finale. But when the finale came to assume greater importance with Beethoven, the comparatively trivial scherzo could no longer logically precede it. The scherzo itself grew in importance and in the Ninth was placed earlier in the work. The Adagio was another problem. After the Fifth, Beethoven avoids it, resuming it only in the Ninth. The depth and fullness of emotion which it brings when found in its completely developed form, is with difficulty placed logically into the milieu created by three totally different movements. In the Eighth Beethoven went so far as to use neither a slow movement nor a true scherzo,—one answer to these problems.

The third problem concerns the nature of the introduction to the first movement. In his first two symphonies Beethoven merely follows Haydn; the Eroica has no more than a couple of detached introductory chords; in the Fourth and Seventh Beethoven experiments with completely developed introductory movements; the Fifth and Sixth lack introductions altogether; only in the Ninth is there an ideal union of introduction and first movement. But with the greatest problem of all, that of the character of the finale, Beethoven made no more than scant progress. That the apotheosis-finale of the Third, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Ninth—is correct for his type of symphony—was not a solution, is proved by his struggles with the finale of the Ninth.

The reason why Beethoven did not solve this problem is that its solution involved a recasting of the entire scheme of the symphony. Its solution would also furnish the best answer to the other three problems. The cheerful and light-hearted conclusion of the older symphony had to become the cornerstone of the whole structure. The old scheme of a gradual descent from the heights of the first movement to the gayeties of the last, inevitably had to give way to a scheme of ascent which would reach the last movement as climax and summation of the whole. This was the substance of the symphonic problem as Beethoven bequeathed it to the world.

One can judge the followers of Beethoven by the extent to which they were aware of the existence of this problem. Schumann recognized the dangers of the Adagio and Brahms wisely substituted his Allegretti for the Scherzo. Both these composers also sought for greater thematic and poetical unity between the different movements. But the problem of the finale they all evaded, being content with the unclimactic gay ending or the apotheosis. For them Beethoven remained an ideal, his problem a riddle. Not even progress was made toward a solution. Liszt proceeded differently. Recognizing the four-fold problem, he solved it (in his sonata) by realizing the importance of the first movement, extending it to cover the whole work, and introducing slow movement and scherzo as episodes along the way. But this was evasion rather than solution, for Liszt himself returned to the multiple-movement work in his Faust and Dante symphonies.

Schubert, eldest of the Austrians, shows his symphonic method in his two greatest symphonies, the "Unfinished" and the Seventh in C major. The latter brings no sign of the recognition of a symphonic problem. Schubert simply, almost naively, made music. "The genuality of this work lies . . . in the independence and the boldness with which he storms past Beethoven, thereby proving his power and vitality. Probably the earlier B minor symphony had been similarly planned. The noteworthy consideration is that it was never completed. Here was attempted a series of moods which had been foreign to the expressive powers of the symphony—that mystical, darkening dreaminess which rises from the dull theme of the bases . . . to a piercing premonition of death; then loses itself in the Andante in distant fantasies of celestial visions—finally never to discover the way back. Why did Schubert stop?

We know no answer, we know only that he did stop, and we can and must comprehend the fact. This symphony was here at an end, its continuation would have required a flight of fantasy, a power of imagination, which Schubert was unable to summon. He began a scherzo and left it unfinished. But a finale to this symphony he was unable even to conceive. Here would have been the place to plunge into the great symphonic adventure, to lead the first movements into the finale and there allow them to come to transfigured completion. Inasmuch as Schubert refrained from doing so, he stated for the first time in recognizable form, the problem of the finale, which he admitted his inability to solve even as he admitted the unsuitability of his scherzo. Wise Schubert, to know when to stop.

To the solution of this problem the Austrians addressed themselves. They made no attempt to continue along Beethovenian lines, nor to develop in any of the directions in which Beethoven may here and there have hinted. They recognized that a new poetic concept must replace the human subjectivity of Beethoven, and they found it in a quasi-mystical nature-worship. None of the Germans had been able to discover a new poetical basis. Rather than make the futile attempt of following Beethoven, their cousins the Austrians fished in the same waters as had Beethoven and made their own catch. Thus they found a concept which predicated a new style. "Thus Schubert, after abandonng the torso of his B minor symphony, in the creation of the C major symphony made a mighty (though unconscious) confession of his turning away from Beethovenian paths. Thus Bruckner created his nine symphonies, praying religiously to Beethoven, but avoiding his ways, and only occasionally bringing him an offering. And finally thus wrote Mahler, bringing together Schubert and Bruckner, searching out the secrets of the German romanticists and programmists, creating his mighty synthesis of all that the symphony had experienced since Beethoven."

It is the character of the Haydn-Beethoven symphony to proceed from a fundamental proposition which is stated at the beginning. This is expanded, enlarged, developed, commented upon; it is shown in new lights by means of contrasts as well. It is progress from a terse statement to an increasingly less and less involved presentation of its equivalent. It may be compared to the sermon of the minister whose whole message is contained in the text which is read at the beginning of that sermon. Or it is like the geometrical proposition the whole of which is stated in the first sentence, to be proved in the exposition that is to follow. Says Bekker, "The first movements of the Eroica, the Pastoral, the Ninth are really nothing more than commentaries upon the theme which is heard in the first few measures." Their greatness, their unshakeable power, is a result of the unimpeachable logic with which the exposition of the central thought unfolds, a logic which has the same tang of inevitability as a mathematical formula. In any case, the whole symphony with Beethoven grows out of the highly concise, terrifically concentrated initial theme or motif.

The Austrians know not such predetermined logic. Their symphony is one of induction rather than deduction. It is a symphony which gathers power as it proceeds, a symphony which finds its origins variously along the way-side, which seeks to bind together such origins, swelling gradually into a larger and larger stream which rushes on toward a goal undisclosed at the beginning. It grows not out of an accepted premise, but does grow from vague and indefinite beginnings to a powerful conclusion. It is a symphony of development, of evolution. So that the art of the composer here depends upon the persuasiveness with which he leads up and into his final all-embracing goal.

It follows that the center of gravity of such a symphony is to be found in some movement later than the first, while with Beethoven it consistently is in the first. With these Austrians it centered sometimes in the Adagio, sometimes in the Finale. This process of gradual unfolding was of course the natural solution of the problem of the introduction, which in this type of symphony was merely the tentative beginning to which the first movement followed as a first stage of development. The Adagio became a second stage or indeed the central point for the whole work. The scherzo, forming a new point of contact with folk-dances and their rhythms, gathered up fresh forces on the way to the finale. Thus the new logic of the Austrian symphony offered at least a possibility for the solution of all the problems which the symphony of Beethoven had presented.

It was Anton Bruckner's historic mission, taking his cue from the two preliminary works of Schubert, to be the first to clear new paths pointing in this direction. He was the first to undertake to solve the problems, indeed to offer as tenable solutions as could be expected within the life of one individual. He created the new symphonic introduction, in which, as in the fourth symphony, the birth of the theme takes place." Though thematically well and indeed powerfully developed, its first movements are apt to have a preparatory rather than a definitive character. The terse, flint-like mottos of Beethoven, he replaced with [illegible] his first movements are not the cornerstones of his symphonies.

Thus the middle movements acquired increased significance. Bruckner restores the Adagios of the earlier Beethoven symphonies,—the first Adagios worthy of the name to be written since Beethoven. Except in the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies, he places these Adagios before the Scherzi. The Scherzi, too, have a power not felt since Beethoven. It is not the intoxicating, delirious power of some of the Beethoven scherzi, it is a power with roots firmly imbedded in the soil of peasant music. Folk-dances, square-toed folk rhythms, elementally powerful, are its sources, are the origins of a new contribution to the symphony.

But even more powerful than his Scherzi, are Bruckner's Adagios. Often they form the focal point of his symphonies. His power of extending and heightening and enlarging the sustained emotion of the Adagio to the very point of the limit of the hearer's receptivity is one of the greatest achievements of his particular type of genius. Shrewdly, thus he makes them the third movement in the last two symphonies. But in this achievement he spent himself. To quote Bekker again, "The tragedy in Bruckner's work (if indeed it is fair to speak of tragedy amid such accomplishment) is that while he undertook to solve symphonic problems, while he recognized the need, he was nevertheless unable to offer a final solution. Bruckner made the attempt to solve the problem of the finale. For such solution he ran aground because of the very riches of his Adagios." In them he reached a fullness beyond which he was unable to go. For the finale a Beethovenian concentration would have been in place. But Bruckner remained a rhapsodist. The tentative character of his first movements is felt too much also in his finales. "He desired to place the point of greatest weight into the finale, but he exhausted himself in his Adagios, and the finales remained lying afar off in the distance."

Mahler approached the symphony from the same point of view as Bruckner. He had the advantage, however, of being able to view critically the entire work of Bruckner and of the German symphonists of the romantic period as well. His discipleship of Bruckner rests on a far deeper basis than is furnished by the fact that Bruckner was his teacher. Bruckner pointed the way for Mahler to the type of symphony which should solve all existing problems, the symphony in which the finale is climax and summation and goal of all that has gone before. Mahler attempts such a symphony in his very first work in symphonic form. The success of the first symphony is only a tentative one, but is nevertheless sufficient to prove that the riddle of the symphony can be solved. After this many possibilities within the general scheme presented themselves. "All of Mahler's symphonies are finale-symphonies." In each of his finales one finds the key to the particular work in question, the focal point to which all the already existing lines in the work lead.

The most obvious type of "Finale-symphony" is of course the type which proceeds in a straight ascending line through the preceding movements to the finale. Upon the character of the finale in this type, depends everything—the number of movements, their character, their relation to each other. One of the earliest was the liberation of the symphony from the thraldom of the formalism of the conventionalized four-movement scheme. Mahler's first, sixth and eighth symphonies are of this type. Of course, the weight of the finale has a tendency to dwarf the earlier movements. For the vitality of every portion of these symphonies seems to have sense of direction, urges on irresistibly to the finale.

A second type of this kind of symphony is that which does not proceed in a straight line to the finale, but which seems to circle about it, continually narrowing the circle, and approaching the finale as through a spiral line. Mahler's second, third, fifth and seventh symphonies are of this nature. The number of movements is increased to five in the second, fifth and seventh symphonies, and six in the third. "Besides the scherzo and the slow movement there appear song-like structures of the most fantastic formal richness." The finale in these symphonies is not outwardly the movement of most importance. As far as externals are concerned, the mightiest movement in each is one of the middle movements. The finales of these symphonies are a choral movement, an Adagio, two rondos. These final movements are like the keystone of an arch, giving solution to mightier things which may have gone before, but which for all their might and power have remained inconclusive. To them the finale furnishes conclusion.

A last type is found for the fourth and ninth symponies. They are the most mature of Mahler's symphonies, each completing a cycle within his works. Each is in four movements. Their succession is a matter of pure fancy, defying classification. The ascent is neither by straight line nor by spiral. Their finales are not climactic as in the first type, they are rather solutions as in the second. They furnish a transfiguration, so to speak, of much that has gone before. In the fourth this is accomplished in a plain, unadorned song-form. In the ninth it is through an Adagio. Indeed that ninth symphony furnished almost an inversion of older convention in the order of its movements: 1, Andante; 2, Scherzo; 3, Rondo, of the burlesque type; 4, Adagio. It is as if Mahler, thinking back to Bruckner, and remembring that with Bruckner the Adagio was—though unintentionally—the high point, allows himself again to make the Adagio the movement of chief interest, and then has the courage to place it where it belongs, at the end.

"The skepticism of a never-sated age is disappearing. New generations are reaching out toward light, toward new revelation. They respond to the glowing, passionate art of Mahler; and in its shadow the gentler music of Bruckner is also taking root. In both reposes the future of symphonic art, for where art grows out of inner impulse, it has power over all men."

A. H. M.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Herald Mar 23

MU

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

For yesterday's concert, the 20th of the season, Mr. Koussevitzky devised a curious but, as it proved in the hearing, a thoroughly admirable program: Edward B. Hill's Symphony in B-flat, Op. 34, and Bruckner's eighth symphony, in C minor.

However much some people—people, by the way, neither lacking in a healthy intellectual curiosity nor petrified by age or love of tradition—may deplore Mr. Koussevitzky's fondness for exhibiting the efforts, if only they are new, of the mediocre and the immature, everybody ought to thank him for his wise way with new works which prove worth while. Till Mr. Koussevitzky's time new works, though they pleased their hearers mightily, but seldom were given opportunity to please a second time. Only genuine masterpieces, like, say, Debussy's "Faun," could hope to emerge from the obscurity of the library shelves.

Mr. Koussevitzky, in his wisdom managing more reasonably, has enriched the repertory with much agreeable music. For Mr. Hill's symphony, for instance, he has probably made a permanent place. Why not? The supply of new symphonies with musical ideas of charm behind them, ideas developed with all the skill of the learned, but with the easy readiness of youth itself—the supply is scant. Not every symphony, furthermore, turned out today is furnished with an orchestral vesture of color that fits its every musical twist and turn quite as nature's own cunning hand lays colors on a stretch of sea or land. Lovely indeed are the closing measures of the middle movement.

The symphony, excellently played, was received with hearty applause, which Mr. Hill gracefully acknowledged.

There was Bruckner to follow, Bruckner at whom the knowing section of the public think fit to shrug their shoulders, whom conductors fight shy of tackling. For many a year, nevertheless, not a symphony of his came to hearing in Vienna that failed to raise a riot of approval—not, mind, from a special public, but from the customary audiences at Philharmonic concerts. Here in Boston, for the matter of that, Mr. Gericke more than once stirred Bostonians to enthusiasm with a Bruckner symphony. And history does not record that Dr. Muck brought disaster to Symphony hall when he in his day made bold. No more did Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday.

Bruckner, of course, suffered cruelly from the folly of his friends. Admitting, however, freely, that he never learned to curb his prolixity, that he never acquired the fine art of selection and arrangement; could, his circumstances given and his temperament, so much have been expected? A countryman born and bred, a countryman he remained till the day of his death in the Palais Belvedere, after years of life at the conservatory and the university in Vienna. When he acknowledged applause at a Philharmonic concert, he might, from the cut of the clothes on his back, from the arkward shyness of his bows, have come to the stage direct from the remotest upper Austria of the sixties, the village candlestick-maker. The very look of him, nevertheless, the honesty and kindness that showed in his face, won all hearts except Hanslick's!

In the man you have his music. There is a rugged splendor in it of melody and rhythm, all clothed in a sonority no less than amazing. There is prettiness too, in the form of little engaging tunes, and sentimentality finding expression in song, of the sentimental German type. Violence plays its part, also religious exaltation. All are thrillingly expressed, these many moods, through musical material of rare power and beauty, through musicianship of the finest.

They jostle each other, these many moods, there is no denying; Bruckner acquired no feeling for arrangement in the usual sense. When he felt trivially disposed, he expressed his mood in trivial song; his sense of selection was never keen. Not many, though, are the composers who have written symphonies so free of dull moments as that C minor symphony Mr. Koussevitzky played yesterday. For it is indeed a very transcript of life and life, whatever else it may be is not dull.

Mr. Koussevitzky, to be sure, played it superbly, with a sympathy that does him credit, with a mastery that does him proud. How did he shorten it so materially? When Richter gave the symphony its first performance it constituted the entire program.

The audience showed enthusiasm yesterday. Pray let us hear another symphony by Bruckner. R. R. G.

SYMPHONY RESTORES BRUCKNER

The Eighth Is Played After a Lapse of 20 Years

Boston Post Mar 23

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

From 1899 through 1915 the name of Anton Bruckner was of almost yearly occurrence on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not long after came the sudden termination of the Teutonic regime, and Bruckner's music went unheard in this city until yesterday afternoon, when Mr. Koussevitzky in a notable performance offered, for the first time here in 20 years, the Austrian's Eighth Symphony, in C minor.

ONCE CONSIDERED CRYPTIC

In his entertaining and informative history of the Boston Orchestra, M. A. De Wolfe Howe tells us that when Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was first played here, in 1887, the exodus of the audience was so general that at the end there were more people on the stage than in the auditorium. In 1887, Bruckner was an ultramodern, and no doubt the worthy Bostonians of that day found his music almost incomprehensible.

A quarter of a century later, however, the Bruckner symphonies had become almost popular hereabouts, and when, in 190, Mr. Fiedler introduced to us the Eighth, it was repeated "by general request" the following month. Yet even at that late date, Bruckner's symphonies were considered formidable, somewhat cryptic and enigmatic, and there were learned discussions regarding the validity of their formal structure.

Suggests Wagner

Yesterday, after another two decades, this Eighth Symphony sounded for the most part altogether lucid and straightforward. Hearing it, there was less feeling that Bruckner was a seer of apocalyptic visions, a musical St. John on Patmos, and more that he was a true descendant of Schubert strongly imbued with Wagnerism, particularly in the matter of orchestration. Time and again, his use of the Bayreuth tubas creates the illusion that the music is Wagner's own.

Bruckner has been accused, and not without reason, of "puttering" with his themes, of frittering away his time with contrapuntal ingenuities that move the music forward not a whit. Yet in the first movement of this Eighth Symphony and in the Scherzo, where spiritually Bruckner speaks with the voice of Beethoven, the music seemed yesterday to advance without faltering. The Adagio, on the other hand, once held to be the outstanding portion of the Symphony, seemed now and then to drag, to miss continuity and sustained interest. For one listener at least there was not all the remembered eloquence and exaltation, solemnly beautiful and impressive as this over-long movement undeniably is. For a full 20 minutes this Adagio ran its course yesterday, even though Mr. Koussevitzky had made a liberal cut, incidentally, this cut robbed the music of one of the most alluring pages.

The least individual movement of the four, the least distinguished thematically, the Finale pleased yesterday by reason of its rhythmic vigor, its sonorous orchestration. The applause which followed quite justified the pains Mr. Koussevitzky had expended upon this Symphony and argued, furthermore, for the revival of its immediate predecessor, the general favorite among the nine symphonies bequeathed to us by a composer of remarkable if somewhat uneven powers, one whose music rightly belongs in any symphonic repertory that lays claim to breadth and catholicity.

For beginning yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky proffered the singularly attractive Symphony in B flat major, of Edward Burlingame Hill, which received its initial performance here a year ago. The composer, who was present, was warmly applauded, first at his seat in the hall and finally upon the stage whither Mr. Koussevitzky had bade him come.

[illegible] a precedent. It happens that the performance [illegible] year to mark[illegible] the exact date of the [illegible] ver[illegible] formance.

Mr Koussevitzky has put Beethoven's Choral Symphony on this week's symphony program, pairing it with the First Symphony. Not since the days of Fiedler's conductorship has the Ninth Symphony been given at a pair of regular symphony concerts. The difficulty is to find room on the stage for the chorus, since no seats can be removed from the hall when every place has been sold for the season. Usually the stage is built out into the auditorium for choral concerts in Symphony Hall.

HILL HEARS HIS OWN SYMPHONY

Composer Receives an Ovation at Concert by Orchestra

TRAV. MAR. 23

The beautiful spring weather brought an alertly receptive audience to Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. And the program was given a generous and sincere response. Edward Burlingame Hill's symphony in B flat major was the opening number. It is interesting and delightful.

The composer is said to have attempted here merely the development of musical ideas, rather than description and dramatic effects. Mr. Koussevitzky gave it a most brilliant reading. The score, by the way, is dedicated to him. Mr. Hill was present, and with the generous and modest conductor, received an ovation.

Anton Bruckner's symphony in C minor stirred the audience to rapturous applause. It is a marvelous thing and was marvelously done. It has always been a great favorite and when first produced in the 19th century was received with boisterous rejoicing and waving of handkerchiefs, so the program notes state. One can easily understand emotion possessing an audience privileged to hear that great symphony interpreted by Serge Koussevitzky.

This program will be repeated this evening.

NINTH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give Beethoven's Choral Ninth Symphony as the principal number on the 21st pair of concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be the first time that the Ninth Symphony has been played at the regular concerts. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will assist, together with a quartet of soloists.

The Ninth Symphony will be preceded by the First Symphony of the same master.

HERALD MAR 23

PENSION FUND CONCERT

For the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra Mr. Koussevitzky arranged this Wagner program: Overture to "Rienzi"; Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie"; Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie"; baritone, David Blair McClosky; Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried"; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Since the orchestra had drawn an audience filling Symphony hall in response to their appeal for the pension fund, it was meet and right that they should show their well-wishers what they can do. They rose to the occasion.

Not for years, if ever before, or so it seems to one old listener, has the orchestra reached so high a pitch of technical excellence as in this last month or two. And yesterday it surely attained its crowning hour. The ravishing beauty of tone it let loose in one unbroken flow—where can its like be found? A splendid sonority, of course, many an orchestra can achieve, if smears from strings and blurs from wind are tolerated; mostly they must be, and indeed they do slight actual harm. Beautiful tone, however, and strong, that rejoices in the transparent clarity of a perfect solo instrument, such as we gloried in in Mr. Gricke's day, that is not so frequently come by.

We hearers were treated to it yesterday; the entire band, thundering through Wagner at his fullest scoring, cut clear as Mr. Laurent played his flute alone.

More admirably, even, than their wont, the players shaped melody yesterday. Like the greatest of singers they sang, violins, the flute, horns, trumpets too, and 'cellos. Like the greatest of singers, mind. What could not lesser singers learn from these players, if only they had ears in their heads, of the proper way with melody! Of the quickening power of rhythm they could also learn much, of the contentment, too, that lies in a perfect attack, the charm inherent in a skilful release. Hats off before Mr. Koussevitzky, the restorer of the orchestra, technically and musically both, to its highest estate.

Not a bar did he play yesterday that failed to give, by both sound and sense, delight. Granting him his premises, the afternoon long he offered performances no less than perfect. Those premises, however, with Wagner's work in question, not everybody can grant. So robust a voicing of the Lohengrin prelude ill suggests the supernatural. The Valkyrie ride, if too heavily played, hints at dray horses, not winged steeds. And music of potions and Isolde's love is surely not to be proclaimed too forthrightly.

To the early pages, on the other hand, of the "Rienzi" overture, Mr. Koussevitzky, through sympathy and imagination, gave a touch of Wagner's quality of which the master in his best years might well have felt proud. Meeting the triumphant vulgarity of the military measures—militarism has always expressed itself vulgarly, in the days of the tribunes, no doubt, certainly in Wagner's time and in our own—meeting them at least half way, powerfully Mr. Koussevitzky appealed to the vulgarity that, of one sort or another, lurks in every man and woman, be it admitted or not. This was lofty in its way.

Here was a concert to give great pleasure to a hall-full of enthusiastic listeners. The orchestra showed what it could do. R. R. G.

PENSION CONCERT WAGNER'S

Koussevitzky Inspired in Presenting the List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To the theory that a Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund concert must of necessity be a Wagner concert, Mr. Koussevitzky has been no wholehearted subscriber. Yesterday, however, for the second Pension Fund concert of the season, he bowed to tradition, and his reward was an unusual demonstration of enthusiasm from an audience that filled every seat in Symphony Hall and overflowed into the aisles as well.

HITS STRIDE IN WAGNER

Although each one of Wagner's operas and music-dramas was not represented upon yesterday's list, the various phases and aspects of his music were nevertheless comprehensively set forth. There was the raw, Meyerbeerish Wagner of the "Rienzi" Overture; the romantic Wagner of the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the out-of-doors Wagner of the Valkyries' Ride, the fire-music from "Die Walkure" and the forest music from "Siegfried"; the epic Wagner of Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde and of Isolde's Love-Death; the passionate yet fateful Wagner of the "Tristan" Prelude; the gloriously human Wagner of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers." And had the "Tristan" and "Mastersinger" excerpts been transposed, the several numbers would have been played in the order of their composition.

Mr. Koussevitzky is not the most consistent of conductors, and in interpreting the music of Wagner he has had his "off days." Yesterday, however, he was for the most part not merely happy and discriminating, but inspired. Never before has he so illumined, exalted and transfigured the excerpts from "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger." With the "Siegfried" forest music, too, he was altogether felicitous, and he played the "Rienzi" Overture exactly as it should be

IT MIGHT BE DONE

There has been more or less discussion in town recently of the possibility of several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at reduced prices in the Boston Garden, so that the great public might have the opportunity of hearing fine music at rates they could afford. Several things must be taken into consideration before deciding on such a radical departure.

The acoustics of the immense auditorium would have to be considered. A brass band offers no proof whatever of the way an orchestra would sound. Delicate shadings of the violins and the wood-winds must be taken into consideration. The orchestra cannot play at top voice all the time, nor pieces of tremendous power. That question is all important. Mr. Koussevitzky would never consent to play in the Garden unless he were sure that his orchestra would make its proper effect.

Another thing is the rental. The orchestra, playing at reduced prices, would be making a considerable sacrifice. If the management of the Garden would do the same thing, and donate its use, in the public interest, possibly an arrangement for a concert or two might be made, provided the orchestra has the time to give to them. But no full charge could be considered, we imagine.

Sheldon H. Fairbanks, the Garden's manager, requests a meeting with Judge Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, at which the matter will be discussed. Doubtless such concerts would be greatly enjoyed by the public, and, if things can be satisfactorily arranged, they may be given.

LOWELL PASTOR DIES

LOWELL, March 25 (AP)—The Rev. John R. Chaffee, 59, pastor of the Highland Methodist Episcopal Church here, died in a hospital here today, following an operation. Many of his flock had submitted to blood transfusions in the hope that their pastor's life might be saved.

ABOUT CONCERTS IN BOSTON GARDEN.

HER

ALD, SUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1929

EDITORIALS BY TH

MARK TWAIN MATERIAL

To the Editor of The Herald:

I am writing a biography of my kinsman, Samuel L. Clemens. If any readers of The Herald have letters or information regarding Mark Twain will they please communicate with me.

CYRIL CLEMENS.

May[illegible]d, Cal., March 17.

SYMPHONY BROADCASTS

To the Editor of The Herald:

I read with much interest Dr. Jelalian's letter about broadcasting the Boston Symphony orchestra and agree with him most wholeheartedly about it. The benefits derived from a concert broadcast are far superior to the constant tom-tom jazz. Not only is it true that many can't afford attending the series, but were it not, it would hardly be possible to accommodate the crowd! If we are going to educate ourselves morally, physically, socially and otherwise representative, why not musically? Why doesn't some influential person see to it? New York is far ahead of us! And curiously enough, Boston audiences are more appreciative.

ANNE LEVIN.

Dorchester, March 22.

ENCORE

To the Editor of The Herald:

I agree with Dr. Jelalian in The Herald that the Symphony concerts should be put on the air; for besides there being lots of people who can[illegible] afford to go very often, there are [illegible]ot like myself who can hear very well [illegible]over the radio. They are too deaf t[illegible]hear well in Symphony hall, even [illegible]h a hearing aid, unless they can alwa[illegible] get a seat near the stage.

Before this winter for the last two or three years, the late Mr. Q[illegible]by sponsored the Symphonies every Saturday night when they were in Bos[illegible]n, and I for one enjoyed listening to th[illegible] and I was very sorry when they we[illegible] taken off the air. I hope next seaso[illegible] some one will put them on the rad[illegible] again. New England listeners-in wi[illegible] appreciate it, I am sure.

CASPAR MOTLE[illegible]

Boston, March 22.

IN REPLY

To the Editor [illegible]erald:

I am objecting to M[illegible]sta[illegible]ment that natural beauties are stripp[illegible] from every military camp, that the b[illegible]racks are hideous and that there is [illegible] loveliness in the surroundings, to use h[illegible] own word.

Evidently the lady above has nev[illegible] been in Newport, R. I. If she woul[illegible] take the pleasure of such a trip sh[illegible] would find herself in a beautiful camp[illegible] if she would [illegible] ican Legion, the American Federation of Labor and other such organizations are not entirely composed of native-born Americans and consequently might not agree with Mr. Varney in his solution?

Does Mr. Varney know that immigrants come to this country not only because they lack work in their respective mother country, but also for personal, religious or political freedom, as the Pilgrims did in 1620?

I would let Congress decide this monumental question after some very able men have presented their evidence before the able and efficient committee in charge of immigration.

JOSEPH G. LARKIN.

Medford, March 22.

STATE HOUSE PRAYERS

To the Editor of The Herald:

I regret that the Boston press failed to note that the General Court of the Commonwealth has seen fit to have a rabbi offer prayers at the opening of each session. On Tuesday Rabbi David Alpert of Temple Covenant of Peace, Easton, Pa., rendered the invocation for the House of Representatives. On Wednesday he did similar service for the state Senate. Rabbi Alpert is the first Boston-born rabbi. This was a real demonstration of the fine feeling [illegible]fellowship existing in the [illegible], and I believe is deserving of public notice. MAX [illegible]EN.

Boston, March 22.

SYMPHONY AT GARDEN

To the Editor of The Herald:

I was very much interested in your editorial, "Music for the People," in which you speak of the possibility of holding the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Garden. The Garden was designed with a view to its use as an auditorium and particular attention was paid to its acoustical properties. A concert was given here last fall by Signor Alphonso D'Avino and at that time music critics agreed that the hall was excellently suited for concerts. We believe this will be demonstrated beyond question when the Symphonic Band of the Royal Belgian Guards gives it concert here on April 3.

The management of the Boston Garden would be most willing to co-operate with the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra in any attempt to increase the usefulness of the orchestra to the public. SHELDON H. FAIRBANKS, General Manager.

Boston, March 20.

TRAV. MAR 23

CONCERT CALENDAR

PENSION FUND CONCERT

An all Wagner program will be presented by Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra, tomorrow after in Symphony hall, in the spring pension fund concert of the season. The program will include: Overture to "Rienzi"; prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ride of the Valkyries, Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music, from "The Valkyrie," the part of Wotan to be sung by David Blair McClosky; Forest Murmurs, from "Siegfried"; prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; and prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Herald Mar 25

MU

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

For yesterday's concert, the 20th of the season, Mr. Koussevitzky devised a curious but, as it proved in the hearing, a thoroughly admirable program: Edward B. Hill's Symphony in B-flat, Op. 34, and Bruckner's eighth symphony, in C minor.

However much some people—people, by the way, neither lacking in a healthy intellectual curiosity nor petrified by age or love of tradition—may deplore Mr. Koussevitzky's fondness for exhibiting the efforts, if only they are new, of the mediocre and the immature, everybody ought to thank him for his wise way with new works which prove worth while. Till Mr. Koussevitzky's time new works, though they pleased their hearers mightily, but seldom were given opportunity to please a second time. Only genuine masterpieces, like, say, Debussy's "Faun," could hope to emerge from the obscurity of the library shelves.

Mr. Koussevitzky, in his wisdom managing more reasonably, has enriched the repertory with much agreeable music. For Mr. Hill's symphony, for instance, he has probably made a permanent place. Why not? The supply of new symphonies with musical ideas of charm behind them, ideas developed with all the skill of the learned, but with the easy readiness of youth itself—the supply is scant. Not every symphony, furthermore, turned out today is furnished with an orchestral vesture of color that fits its every musical twist and turn quite as nature's own cunning hand lays colors on a stretch of sea or land. Lovely indeed are the closing measures of the middle movement.

The symphony, excellently played, was received with hearty applause, which Mr. Hill gracefully acknowledged.

There was Bruckner to follow, Bruckner at whom the knowing section of the public think fit to shrug their shoulders, whom conductors fight shy of tackling. For many a year, nevertheless, not a symphony of his came to hearing in Vienna that failed to raise a riot of approval—not, mind, from a special public, but from the customary audiences at Philharmonic concerts. Here in Boston, for the matter of that, Mr. Gericke more than once stirred Bostonians to enthusiasm with a Bruckner symphony. And history does not record that Dr. Muck brought disaster to Symphony hall when he in his day made bold. No more did Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday.

Bruckner, of course, suffered cruelly from the folly of his friends. Admitting, however, freely, that he never learned to curb his prolixity, that he never acquired the fine art of selection and arrangement, could, his circumstances given and his temperament, so much have been expected? A countryman born and bred, a countryman he remained till the day of his death in the Palais Belvedere, after years of life at the conservatory and the university in Vienna. When he acknowledged applause at a Philharmonic concert, he might, from the cut of the clothes on his back, from the arkward shyness of his bows, have come to the stage direct from the remotest upper Austria of the sixties, the village candlestick-maker. The very look of him, nevertheless, the honesty and kindness that showed in his face, won all hearts except Hanslick's!

In the man you have his music. There is a rugged splendor in it of melody and rhythm, all clothed in a sonority no less than amazing. There is prettiness too, in the form of little engaging tunes, and sentimentality finding expression in song, of the sentimental German type. Violence plays its part, also religious exaltation. All are thrillingly expressed, these many moods, through musical material of rare power and beauty, through musicianship of the finest.

They jostle each other, these many moods, there is no denying; Bruckner acquired no feeling for arrangement in the usual sense. When he felt trivially disposed, he expressed his mood in trivial song; his sense of selection was never keen. Not many, though, are the composers who have written symphonies so free of dull moments as that C minor symphony Mr. Koussevitzky played yesterday. For it is indeed a very transcript of life and life, whatever else it may be is not dull.

Mr. Koussevitzky, to be sure, played it superbly, with a sympathy that does him credit, with a mastery that does him proud. How did he shorten it so materially? When Richter gave the symphony its first performance it constituted the entire program.

The audience showed enthusiasm yesterday. Pray let us hear another symphony by Bruckner. R. R. G.

may have r all their ained incon-furnishes fourth and e most ma-

each com-
rks. Each succession ying classi-
r by straight ales are not pe, they are econd. They to speak, of ore. In the
in a plain,
the ninth it
d that ninth an inversion order of its
, Scherzo; 3,
ype; 4, Adagio.
king back to ng that with —though unin-
nt, allows him-
dagio the moved then has the e it belongs, at never-sated age generations are ht, toward new d to the glow-

ahler; and in its c of Bruckner is n reposes the fu-
for where art
lse, it has power
A. H. M

SYMPHONY RESTORES BRUCKNER

The Eighth Is Played After a Lapse of 20 Years

Post Mar 3

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

From 1899 through 1915 the name of Anton Bruckner was of almost yearly occurrence on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not long after came the sudden termination of the Teutonic regime, and Bruckner's music went unheard in this city until yesterday afternoon, when Mr. Koussevitzky in a notable performance offered, for the first time here in 20 years, the Austrian's Eighth Symphony, in C minor.

ONCE CONSIDERED CRYPTIC

In his entertaining and informative history of the Boston Orchestra, M. A. De Wolfe Howe tells us that when Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was first played here, in 1887, the exodus of the audience was so general that at the end there were more people on the stage than in the auditorium. In 1887, Bruckner was an ultramodern, and no doubt the worthy Bostonians of that day found his music almost incomprehensible.

A quarter of a century later, however, the Bruckner symphonies had become almost popular hereabouts, and when, in 190, Mr. Fiedler introduced to us the Eighth, it was repeated "by general request" the following month. Yet even at that late date, Bruckner's symphonies were considered formidable, somewhat cryptic and enigmatic, and there were learned discussions regarding the validity of their formal structure.

Suggests Wagner

Yesterday, after another two decades, this Eighth Symphony sounded for the most part altogether lucid and straightforward. Hearing it, there was less feeling that Bruckner was a seer of apocalyptic visions, a musical St. John on Patmos, and more that he was a true descendant of Schubert strongly imbued with Wagnerism, particularly in the matter of orchestration. Time and again, his use of the Bayreuth tubas creates the illusion that the music is Wagner's own.

Bruckner has been accused, and not without reason, of "puttering" with his themes, of frittering away his time with contrapuntal ingenuities that move the music forward not a whit. Yet in the first movement of this Eighth Symphony and in the Scherzo, where spiritually Bruckner speaks with the voice of Beethoven, the music seemed yesterday to advance without faltering. The Adagio, on the other hand, once held to be the outstanding portion of the Symphony, seemed now and then to drag, to miss continuity and sustained interest. For one listener at least there was not all the remembered eloquence and exaltation, solemnly beautiful and impressive as this over-long movement undeniably is. For a full 20 minutes this Adagio ran its course yesterday, even though Mr. Koussevitzky had made a liberal cut, incidentally, this cut robbed the music of one of the most alluring pages.

The least individual movement of the four, the least distinguished thematically, the Finale pleased yesterday by reason of its rhythmic vigor, its sonorous orchestration. The applause which followed quite justified the pains Mr. Koussevitzky had expended upon this Symphony and argued, furthermore, for the revival of its immediate predecessor, the general favorite among the nine symphonies bequeathed to us by a composer of remarkable if somewhat uneven powers, one whose music rightly belongs in any symphonic repertory that lays claim to breadth and catholicity.

For beginning yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky proffered the singularly attractive Symphony in B flat major, of Edward Burlingame Hill, which received its initial performance here a year ago. The composer, who was present, was warmly applauded, first at his seat in the hall and finally upon the stage whither Mr. Koussevitzky had bade him come.

TRAV. MAR 23

CONCERT CALENDAR

PENSION FUND CONCERT

An all Wagner program will be presented by Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra, tomorrow after in Symphony hall, in the spring pension found concert of the season. The program will include: Overture to "Rienzi"; prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ride of the Valkyries, Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music, from "The Valkyrie," the part of Wotan to be sung by David Blair McClosky; Forest Murmurs, from "Siegfried"; prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; and prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

a precedent. It happens that the performance Friday comes near to marking the exact date of the [illegible] performance.

Mr Koussevitzky has put Beethoven's Choral Symphony on this week's symphony program, pairing it with the First Symphony. Not since the days of Fiedler's conductorship has the Ninth Symphony been given at a pair of regular symphony concerts. The difficulty is to find room on the stage for the chorus, since no seats can be removed from the hall when every place has been sold for the season. Usually the stage is built out into the auditorium for choral concerts in Symphony Hall.

HILL HEARS HIS OWN SYMPHONY

Composer Receives an Ovation at Concert by TRAV. Orchestra MAR. 23

The beautiful spring weather brought an alertly receptive audience to Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. And the program was given a generous and sincere response. Edward Burlingame Hill's symphony in B flat major was the opening number. It is interesting and delightful.

The composer is said to have attempted here merely the development of musical ideas, rather than description and dramatic effects. Mr. Koussevitzky gave it a most brilliant reading. The score, by the way, is dedicated to him. Mr. Hill was present, and with the generous and modest conductor, received an ovation.

Anton Bruckner's symphony in C minor stirred the audience to rapturous applause. It is a marvelous thing and was marvelously done. It has always been a great favorite and when first produced in the 19th century was received with boisterous rejoicing and waving of handkerchiefs, so the program notes state. One can easily understand emotion possessing an audience privileged to hear that great symphony interpreted by Serge Koussevitzky.

This program will be repeated this evening.

NINTH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give Beethoven's Choral Ninth Symphony as the principal number on the 21st pair of concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be the first time that the Ninth Symphony has been played at the regular concerts. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will assist, together with a quartet of soloists.

The Ninth Symphony will be preceded by the First Symphony of the same master.

HERALD MAR 23

PENSION FUND CONCERT

For the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra Mr. Koussevitzky arranged this Wagner program: Overture to "Rienzi"; Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie"; Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie"; baritone, David Blair McClosky; Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried"; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Since the orchestra had drawn an audience filling Symphony hall in response to their appeal for the pension fund, it was meet and right that they should show their well-wishers what they can do. They rose to the occasion.

Not for years, if ever before, or so it seems to one old listener, has the orchestra reached so high a pitch of technical excellence as in this last month or two. And yesterday it surely attained its crowning hour. The ravishing beauty of tone it let loose in one unbroken flow—where can its like be found? A splendid sonority, of course, many an orchestra can achieve, if smears from strings and blurs from wind are tolerated; mostly they must be, and indeed they do slight actual harm. Beautiful tone, however, and strong, that rejoices in the transparent clarity of a perfect solo instrument, such as we gloried in in Mr. Gricke's day, that is not so frequently come by.

We hearers were treated to it yesterday; the entire band, thundering through Wagner at his fullest scoring, cut clear as Mr. Laurent played his flute alone.

More admirably, even, than their wont, the players shaped melody yesterday. Like the greatest of singers they sang, violins, the flute, horns, trumpets too, and 'cellos. Like the greatest of singers, mind. What could not lesser singers learn from these players, if only they had ears in their heads, of the proper way with melody! Of the quickening power of rhythm they could also learn much, of the contentment, too, that lies in a perfect attack, the charm inherent in a skilful release. Hats off before Mr. Koussevitzky, the restorer of the orchestra, technically and musically both, to its highest estate.

Not a bar did he play yesterday that failed to give, by both sound and sense, delight. Granting him his premises, the afternoon long he offered performances no less than perfect. Those premises, however, with Wagner's work in question, not everybody can grant. So robust a voicing of the Lohengrin prelude ill suggests the supernatural. The Valkyrie ride, if too heavily played, hints at dray horses, not winged steeds. And music of potions and Isolde's love is surely not to be proclaimed too forthrightly.

To the early pages, on the other hand, of the "Rienzi" overture, Mr. Koussevitzky, through sympathy and imagination, gave a touch of Wagner's quality of which the master in his best years might well have felt proud. Meeting the triumphant vulgarity of the military measures—militarism has always expressed itself vulgarly, in the days of the tribunes, no doubt, certainly in Wagner's time and in our own—meeting them at least half way, powerfully Mr. Koussevitzky appealed to the vulgarity that, of one sort or another, lurks in every man and woman, be it admitted or not. This was lofty in its way.

Here was a concert to give great pleasure to a hall-full of enthusiastic listeners. The orchestra showed what it could do. R. R. G.

PENSION CONCERT WAGNER'S

Koussevitzky Inspired in Presenting the List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To the theory that a Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund concert must of necessity be a Wagner concert, Mr. Koussevitzky has been no wholehearted subscriber. Yesterday, however, for the second Pension Fund concert of the season, he bowed to tradition, and his reward was an unusual demonstration of enthusiasm from an audience that filled every seat in Symphony Hall and overflowed into the aisles as well.

HITS STRIDE IN WAGNER

Although each one of Wagner's operas and music-dramas was not represented upon yesterday's list, the various phases and aspects of his music were nevertheless comprehensively set forth. There was the raw, Meyerbeerish Wagner of the "Rienzi" Overture; the romantic Wagner of the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; the out-of-doors Wagner of the Valkyries' Ride, the fire-music from "Die Walkure" and the forest music from "Siegfried"; the epic Wagner of Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde and of Isolde's Love-Death; the passionate yet fateful Wagner of the "Tristan" Prelude; the gloriously human Wagner of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers." And had the "Tristan" and "Mastersinger" excerpts been transposed, the several numbers would have been played in the order of their composition.

Mr. Koussevitzky is not the most consistent of conductors, and in interpreting the music of Wagner he has had his "off days." Yesterday, however, he was for the most part not merely happy and discriminating, but inspired. Never before has he so illumined, exalted and transfigured the excerpts from "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger." With the "Siegfried" forest music, too, he was altogether felicitous, and he played the "Rienzi" Overture exactly as it should be

EDITORIALS BY TH

MARK TWAIN MATERIAL

To the Editor of The Herald:

I am writing a biography of my kinsman, Samuel L. Clemens. If any readers of The Herald have letters or information regarding Mark Twain, will they please communicate with me?

CYRIL CLEMENS.

Mayfield, Cal., March 17.

SYMPHONY BROADCASTS

To the Editor of The Herald:

I read with much interest Dr. Jelalian's letter about broadcasting the Boston Symphony orchestra and agree with him most wholeheartedly about it. The benefits derived from a concert broadcast are far superior to the constant tom-tom jazz. Not only is it true that many can't afford attending the series, but were it not, it would hardly be possible to accommodate the crowd! If we are going to educate ourselves morally, physically, socially and otherwise representative, why not musically? Why doesn't some influential person see to it? New York is far ahead of us! And curiously enough, Boston audiences are more appreciative.

ANNE LEVIN.

Dorchester, March 22.

ENCORE

To the Editor of The Herald:

I agree with Dr. Jelalian in The Herald that the Symphony concerts should be put on the air; for besides there being lots of people who can not afford to go very often, there are a lot like myself who can hear very well over the radio. They are too deaf to hear well in Symphony hall, even with a hearing aid, unless they can always get a seat near the stage.

Before this winter for the last two or three years, the late Mr. Quinby sponsored the Symphonies every Saturday night when they were in Boston, and I for one enjoyed listening to them and I was very sorry when they were taken off the air. I hope next season some one will put them on the radio again. New England listeners-in will appreciate it, I am sure.

CASPAR MOTLEY.

Boston, March 22.

IN REPLY

To the Editor of The Herald:

I am objecting to Mr. [illegible]'s statement that natural beauties are stripped from every military camp, that the barracks are hideous and that there is no loveliness in the surroundings, to use his own word.

Evidently the lady above has never been in Newport, R. I. If she would take the pleasure of such a trip she would find herself in a beautiful camp ican Legion, the American Federation of Labor and other such organizations are not entirely composed of native-born Americans and consequently might not agree with Mr. Varney in his solution?

Does Mr. Varney know that immigrants come to this country not only because they lack work in their respective mother country, but also for personal, religious or political freedom, as the Pilgrims did in 1620?

I would let Congress decide this monumental question after some very able men have presented their evidence before the able and efficient committee in charge of immigration.

JOSEPH G. LARKIN.

Medford, March 22.

STATE HOUSE PRAYERS

To the Editor of The Herald:

I regret that the Boston press failed to note that the General Court of the Commonwealth has seen fit to have a rabbi offer prayers at the opening of each session. On Tuesday Rabbi David Alpert of Temple Covenant of Peace, Philadelphia, Pa., rendered the invocation for the House of Representatives. On Wednesday he did similar service for the state Senate. Rabbi Alpert is the first Boston-born rabbi. This was a fitting demonstration of the fine feeling of [illegible]ship existing in the [illegible], and I believe is deserving of public notice.

MAX [illegible]EN.

Boston, March 22.

SYMPHONY AT GARDEN

To the Editor of The Herald:

I was very much interested in your editorial, "Music for the People," in which you speak of the possibility of holding the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Garden. The Garden was designed with a view to its use as an auditorium and particular attention was paid to its acoustical properties. A concert was given here last fall by Signor Alphonso D'Avino and at that time music critics agreed that the hall was excellently suited for concerts. We believe this will be demonstrated beyond question when the Symphonic Band of the Royal Belgian Guards gives it concert here on April 3.

The management of the Boston Garden would be most willing to co-operate with the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra in any attempt to increase the usefulness of the orchestra to the public. SHELDON H. FAIRBANKS,

General Manager.

Boston, March 20.

of the world.

POST MAR. 25

IT MIGHT BE DONE

There has been more or less discussion in town recently of the possibility of several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at reduced prices in the Boston Garden, so that the great public might have the opportunity of hearing fine music at rates they could afford. Several things must be taken into consideration before deciding on such a radical departure.

The acoustics of the immense auditorium would have to be considered. A brass band offers no proof whatever of the way an orchestra would sound. Delicate shadings of the violins and the wood-winds must be taken into consideration. The orchestra cannot play at top voice all the time, nor pieces of tremendous power. That question is all important. Mr. Koussevitzky would never consent to play in the Garden unless he were sure that his orchestra would make its proper effect.

Another thing is the rental. The orchestra, playing at reduced prices, would be making a considerable sacrifice. If the management of the Garden would do the same thing, and donate its use, in the public interest, possibly an arrangement for a concert or two might be made, provided the orchestra has the time to give to them. But no full charge could be considered, we imagine.

Sheldon H. Fairbanks, the Garden's manager, requests a meeting with Judge Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the orchestra, at which the matter will be discussed. Doubtless such concerts would be greatly enjoyed by the public, and, if things can be satisfactorily arranged, they may be given.

LOWELL PASTOR DIES

LOWELL, March 25 (AP)—The Rev. John R. Chaffee, 59, pastor of the Highland Methodist Episcopal Church here, died in a hospital here today, following an operation. Many of his flock had submitted to blood transfusions in the hope that their pastor's life might be saved.

ABOUT CONCERTS IN BOSTON GARDEN.

Sun
Hal et the orches and a ribers
85,000
ssary phon idle nclud n h sist hear
.29
follow
Kouss regist
st tw
e Sym
he b influenc thin h wha
why
n? e he oday.
harkin remer ts cri
g yea an Ca of as M thou reade tle.
M. B

WAGNER PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

GLOBE MAR 25

Capacity Audience Is Enthusiastic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a Wagner program yesterday afternoon for the benefit of the pension fund for retired players. Symphony Hall had been completely sold out far in advance. The capacity audience applauded each number enthusiastically. The program began with the "Rienzi" overture, and included the prelude to "Lohengrin" and to "Die Meistersinger," the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and portions of the closing scene of "Die Walkuere." David Blair McClosky, baritone, assisted the orchestra in the latter number.

There are some who claim these days that Wagner's day is done. It is certainly true that his influence on the younger generations of contemporary composers is slight, though with such elders as Richard Strauss it has been all-pervading. But the numbers and the emotional ferver of yesterday's audience would suffice to prove, were proofs really needed, that Wagner's hold on the public remains as strong as ever.

Mr Koussevitzky began the concert by conducting the finest performance of the "Rienzi" overture one recalls from anyone. He disguised the immaturity of the melodic style, skilfully waving the opening passages from banality. He could not, of course, hope to do as much for the sonorous peroration. But he played the noisy closing passage with fervor and conviction, so that it made the same sort of effect that a march for military band can make if superbly performed.

One wondered whether a sophisticated listener in the 1840s could have detected beneath the seeming triviality and bad taste of much of this overture the greater Wagner to come. It seems now incredible that the man who wrote "Rienzi" was later to write the "Ring," "Tristan," and "Die Meistersinger." The power already is there, but no trace of refinement, the subtlety, the majesty of the best passages in the later Wagner.

One was less well pleased with Mr Koussevitzky's conduct of the rest of the program. Some of it, like the "Magic Fire" music from "Die Walkuere," apparently failed to stir his emotions and fell rather flat by comparison with the effect one remembers this number to have made time out of mind.

In other numbers, such as the excerpts from "Tristan," Mr Koussevitzky's usual way of conducting as he feels the music, rather than as custom dictates, or the printed score directs, annoyed a listener who prefers his Wagner straight, with no interposition of a conductor's personality between listener and composer.

One felt that Mr Koussevitzky's conducting of Wagner too often slighted that composer's melodies. In the "Liebestod," for example, it is the long flowing spirals of melody that bind the whole work together. But the sonority, rhythm, and color often make people overlook the melody, as Mr Koussevitzky appeared to from his awkward way of phrasing the music. It is only just to repeat that the audience applauded the "Liebestod" with great enthusiasm, so that the orchestra was asked to rise to share the plaudits.

P. R.

Week-End of An Orchestra And Conductor

TRANS. MAR. 25

Bruckner Bettered by Cuts—Wagner Variously and Untarnished

THE "ites"—Wagnerites, Brahmsites, Debussyites, what you will—are both help and hindrance to the object of their faith and admiration. Without them, Wagner would have made way more slowly into the world-wide theater; Brahms been longer counted forbidding in the concert-room; Debussy lingered in the purgatory of innovators. None the less, it is the Wagnerites who now split hairs over the turning of a phrase in a busy opera house; shake with qualms lest Brahms sound too songful and romantic; resent a vigorous, full-voiced Debussy, who is not always refining his sensations and shading his colors. Beside all three, here in Boston stand, for the hour, the Brucknerites. They rejoiced eagerly when Mr. Koussevitzky announced the performance of "the master's" Eighth Symphony. They waited with impatience when he deferred it to make more thorough preparation. They heard it at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—and on both days their reproachful outcries rent the surrounding air. Heaven forgive him, he had cut "the master-work." He had indeed. A Symphony that at full length considerably exceeds an hour in performance came and went in almost exactly sixty minutes. The second subject—to risk a technicality—did not return in the first movement, thereby leaving that division rather less than full-rounded. Cherished pages in the Adagio, presumed to be the crown of the whole, went by the board. In the comparatively impotent Finale, the conductor turned over a "fistful" of omitted pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky did make these cuts, though hardly so extensively as the irritated Brucknerites assert. He also made them for the good of the composer, of this particular Symphony, of the two audiences. What had kept the Eighth from Symphony Hall through almost exactly twenty years? What had kept any of Bruckner's Symphonies from that concert-room since 1915? Nothing less than the inordinate length of the best of them and the incredible unevenness—until the hearer comes to know Bruckner—of the matter within them contained. Mr. Monteux contemplated them—and quailed. Mr. Koussevitzky had them in mind when he first set foot in Boston—and postponed the adventure until this, his fifth, season. By that time he had discovered that he must persuade hearers to Bruckner over semi-conscious prepossessions and semi-dormant prejudices. No audience in America has the habit of sustained and exacting musical attention. Strauss's longer tone-poems tax them. It is perilous to risk more than one in a season. Mr. Bloch's "America," multifarious and changeful as it is, was immediately accounted "too long." Outside his slow movements, Bruckner's lengths are also his tediums. To gain the hearing that he deserves they must be reduced. Bruckner is prone to needless repetitions; on many a feeble page he seems all unaware of his impotence. No composer falls away, as does he, from heigths of inspiration to depths of routine, mannerism and futility. Against far-flung visions he sets childish simplicities, turns not a doubting hair. Only German-speaking audiences absorb him unabridged and profess to enjoy the experience.

Not only must Bruckner be shortened; he must be purged so far as possible of his besetting weaknesses. Mr. Koussevitzky set to the cutting with clear mind and honest purpose. Except, possibly, here and there in the slow movement, a Bruckner emerged less diminished and clouded by his own faults than Symphony Hall had hitherto known. Clearly shone the beauty of his melody, as in the Scherzo and the Adagio; the splendor of his brass, the rich depth or the ethereal shimmer of his strings, his power of far-spread and upsurging climax; the instant thrill of his motives re-emerging, of moments like the play of horn and oboe in the first movement or the harp-touches, say upon the Scherzo; the sheer majesty, in the Finale, of his rolling, pounding bass. The plodding Bruckner vanished before the Bruckner who saw the heavens opened, while little less than the divine fire kindled him to music-making. Two audiences listened rapt; in two performances conductor and orchestra outdid themselves. The end crowned the deed. Yet upon the outskirts fanatics for Bruckner fumed over pages for the most part well lost.

Richard the Great

After long interval, the Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday afternoon to a "Wagner-Cconcert" for the profit of its Pension Fund. As of old, the audience filled every seat and overflowed into standing-room; listened coughless; at the end of every number returned long and loud applause. Of old the reviewer took his text from such a company and descanted upon a town seemingly so minded to Wagner, yet content with the performance of only one, two, or three of his operas in a whole musical year. This time, the chronicler may stay his hand, since the Chicago Company, encouraged both at home and abroad, is about to enlarge its Wagnerian repertory and increase its Wagnerian singers; while there is some likelihood that a year hence a German company will again unfold to Boston a cycle of the "Ring" music-dramas. As of old again the orchestra played at the top of its mettle. In few pieces does it more aptly disclose the finesse and the splendor, the beauty of voice and the puissance of expression, which it has now regained, than in the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Die Meistersinger." The ear bathed in the glories of the horns through the orchestral interval that divides "Wotan's Farewell"; in the plangent sonorities of the violoncellos singing of fate at the outset of the Prelude to "Tristan."

Nor is it needful to linger over the qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky as Wagnerian conductor. Between many men of many minds there has been no lack of debate. Yesterday, however, he gave little reason for doubts and scruples. He put by the Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser" and the Prelude to Parsifal" in the performance of which he has been most reproached. If he sped "The Ride of the Valkyrs" beyond the possibilities of the opera house, he was playing it as symphonic piece rather than as music to be co-ordinated with the stage. If the final measures of "Die Walküre"—when Brünnhilde sleeps under the ash-tree and with bent head the god strides gloomily away—sounded tame, be it remembered that the stage-picture is essential part of them. As soon expect from the relatively improvised Wotan of Mr. McCloskey, the operatic eloquence of a Schorr, a Rode or a Bohnen.

On the other hand, Mr. Koussevitzky excelled himself in the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It was not blurred or over-hastened or over-blown or turned restless. It unfolded and ascended in the unbroken, on-sweeping Wagnerian line, diversified yet all-comprehending. The end was not merely climax, it was culmination. Again, in the Prelude the Closing Scene from "Tristan," Koussevitzky opened out a music tha has tended to keep hot-house like stuffy; gave wing to its passion of sire, depth to its under-voice of fate; high and firm and clear that most po ant and beatified of songful ecsta Isolde's Liebestod. And though it blasphemy to say as much, he exerc upon the Overture to "Rienzi" a t Toscaninian ability to make the stuff" sound in glowing voice. To it restored not only its turged thunde roof-lifter that it is—but also its tur magnificence.

A conventional "Wagner-progra with the episodes from the Forest-Sc in "Siegfried" added to the items alre specified. Yet how ageless, how indo itable, how all-conquering, remains t music, stripped in the concert-hall every glamour of the theater—save recollection has impregnated us wi them—not even prelude to a rising cu tain! For the thirtieth, possibly the f tieth, time some heard the closing sce of "Die Walküre": they could foret almost every measure; yet their ears a hearts leapt not less to those wondro horns; their ears and their fancies to t first tonal gleam of the magic fires. T Valkyr clangors remain the music of a heroic world, when a god's virgin-daug ters rode the skies, smiting spear c shield. The forest drowses and smil and Siegfried dreams of her who bo him—the exhaustless beauty of the m sic of the Volsung pair—until the bi bids him to new adventure. Music passion and fate still stands fulfilled i the Prelude to "Tristan." The tona splendor, the romantic lustres, of th Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" still g unsurpassed. To this day there is cele tial magic in the singing strings weavin the pathway of the descending Grai For us elders, even a "Wagner-Concert brings a hundred joys of memory. Fo the youngsters—God save them!—a whol new world is opening.

H. T. P.

Music in Boston

MON. MAR 25

Week-End Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its spring pension fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon with a program of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. The audience filled the seats and a large part of the standing room, and made evident its appreciation of the present high estate of the orchestra by its usually hearty and prolonged applause, which on two occasions justified the conductor in calling the men to their feet. The least successful item was the closing scene from "Walkure," with David Blair McClosky to sing Wotan's Farewell. When Mr. McClosky's voice came through, he appeared to be singing well, but for the most part his tones were almost inaudible in the orchestral tumult. Nor was the conductor's contribution entirely satisfactory. The pace was a little too quick, and the phrasing sometimes inept. For the rest, there can be little but praise. Mr. Koussevitzky always spurs the Valkyrs' winged horses to unexampled speed; but as this is not one of Wagner's most inspired passages, it is perhaps as well to get it over without undue delay. The "Rienzi" Overture was duly theatrical, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" were poetically treated, the Prelude and final scene from "Tristan" were set forth with more than common intensity and breadth, and the "Meistersinger" Prelude was joyfully proclaimed.

Yesterday [illegible]

Letters to the Editor

TRANS. MAR. 26 - 29

IF THEY ONLY WOULD!

To the Editor of the Transcript:

For a third year my name is on the waiting list for tickets to the Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoons. It moves up so slowly that if I ever attain them, I shall probably be rolled into Symphony Hall on a wheel-chair. Yet for the twentieth time I gather—from the epistolary Mr. Clayton Johns—that countless seat-holders are about to surrender their tickets unless Mr. Koussevitzky shapes his programs to suit their prejudice. If they only would! But the waiting lists are tangible evidence that they never do. Instead, they fill up their subscription blanks as though they were protecting family heirlooms. Then they "take it out" in "belly-aching around." (My sophomore brother, home for Sunday from Harvard, who expects the other ticket—if we ever get them—insists that I use the word. You Mr. Editor, will probably strike it out.)

IMPATIENT GRIZZEL

Boston, March 24.

THE YOUNGER GENERATION VIEWS THE SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Apparently one's attitude toward the programs of the Symphony Orchestra is influenced greatly by one's age. Mr Clayton Johns has expressed in your columns a point of view which, for all I know, may be typical of his generation. May I be permitted a few words in which to express a point of view which is, I have good reason to believe, not only my own but that of most of the twenty-five to thirty-five-year-old group to which I belong?

It seems to me that Mr. Koussevitzky's programs have a very fair and reasonable proportion of music by contemporary composers. Mr. Johns believes differently. He inquired some days ago, "Who ever heard of Janin or Dukelsky?" if I remember correctly. I do not know just how old Mr. Johns is, but I should think he might be able to recall a time when elderly Bostonians inquired, "Who is Wagner?" So many great composers have, in the past, been adjudged crazy by the contemporaries that one would suppose that present-day concert-goers would be a little less positive in their harsh opinions of present-day music-makers. Nor may Mr. Johns and his friends say, "But these men do not make music," for that is nothing more nor less than what the anti-Wagnerites said about the "modernist" of their day. Certainly, unless music has become a thoroughly decadent art, some one (or two, or three) of the young composers of the day will be a "great" composer—a "classic" composer—to future generations. Mr. Koussevitzky evidently feels that we should have an opportunity to hear what these young men are doing. We want to hear them, and to have a chance to form our own opinions regarding them. I wish to put the case more strongly. We feel we have a right to hear them (to say nothing of the right of the composer to be heard).

Mr. Johns can remember when Brahms was a "modern," doubtless. I do not know how "radical" the music of Brahms was considered when it was first played in Boston, but I do know that it had to fight against a great deal of misunderstanding before it reached its present high estate. Am I hitting wide of the mark if I suggest that it is probable that when Mr. Johns first heard Brahms—and Wagner—he felt interested? He was younger then. Many of the older persons of the time were bored by the one and greatly irritated by the other, I should like to wager. I assume that Mr Johns now loves Brahms and Wagner and I feel certain that their genius (then unsuspected by most people) plus his long association with them is the reason why he does. When my friends and I are numbered among the older ones we will thank Serge Koussevitzky for having enabled us to live for a long time with—Stravinsky, shall we say?—or perhaps it will be some unknown whose name may appear for the first time on a program next year.

But there is much more to it than this. We are not looking merely to the future—we are enjoying the present. It would be unreasonable to expect that any considerable proportion of the new names appearing from week to week on the Symphony programs will be known after a generation or two. As has been previously suggested in the Transcript columns, the modern number, even though it be in no sense "great" (not all of the German music that Dr. Muck played was great, by any means) serves as spice to the programs—or perhaps I should say, serves as an appetizer. One looks forward with a certain zest toward a new composition which is quite different from the anticipation with which one awaits the playing of a favorite classic. The interest of the program is thereby widened even if the particular piece was not greatly enjoyed. There is always the interesting possibility that it will be enjoyed more the next time it is heard.

I am sure that Mr. Johns will yield to none of us in his devotion to the B. S. O. or in his jealous regard for its reputation. Does it not then mean something to him and to all of us that the programs of our orchestra under Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky have become known throughout the country for their breadth, variety, untrammeled freedom, and indeed for their interest? If we are grateful to Mr. Koussevitzky for bringing the orchestra to its present marvellous pitch of perfection it would seem that we ought at least to allow him that freedom in the choice of his programs without which he would doubtless find it difficult to do his best work.

Would it be unkind, in closing, to suggest to Mr. Johns that his generation has had its day in court, so to speak, that he has attended concerts for many years—that the supporters of the Symphony concerts of the future must be recruited from the young of the present—that, in short, he ought to permit us to have our moderns, at least to the extent of one per concert? And he must not think too badly of us, for we love his (and our) Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms as much as he does—except for his advantage of having been longer acquainted with them.

JAMES B. HOBBS

Brighton, March 23.

WAGNER PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

GLOBE MAR 25

Capacity Audience Is Enthusiastic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a Wagner program yesterday afternoon for the benefit of the pension fund for retired players. Symphony Hall had been completely sold out far in advance. The capacity audience applauded each number enthusiastically. The program began with the "Rienzi" overture, and included the prelude to "Lohengrin" and to "Die Meistersinger," the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and portions of the closing scene of "Die Walkuere." David Blair McClosky, baritone, assisted the orchestra in the latter number.

There are some who claim these days that Wagner's day is done. It is certainly true that his influence on the younger generations of contemporary composers is slight, though with such adders as Richard Strauss it has been all-pervading. But the numbers and the emotional ferver of yesterday's audience would suffice to prove, were proofs really needed, that Wagner's hold on the public remains as strong as ever.

Mr Koussevitzky began the concert by conducting the finest performance of the "Rienzi" overture one recalls from anyone. He disguised the immaturity of the melodic style, skilfully waving the opening passages from banality. He could not, of course, hope to do as much for the sonorous peroration. But he played the noisy closing passage with fervor and conviction, so that it made the same sort of effect that a march for military band can make if superbly performed.

One wondered whether a sophisticated listener in the 1840s could have detected beneath the seeming triviality and bad taste of much of this overture the greater Wagner to come. It seems now incredible that the man who wrote "Rienzi" was later to write the "Ring," "Tristan," and "Die Meistersinger." The power already is there, but no trace of refinement, the subtlety, the majesty of the best passages in the later Wagner.

One was less well pleased with Mr Koussevitzky's conduct of the rest of the program. Some of it, like the "Magic Fire" music from "Die Walkuere," apparently failed to stir his emotions and fell rather flat by comparison with the effect one remembers this number to have made time out of mind.

In other numbers, such as the excerpts from "Tristan," Mr Koussevitzky's usual way of conducting as he feels the music, rather than as custom dictates, or the printed score directs, annoyed a listener who prefers his Wagner straight, with no interposition of a conductor's personality between listener and composer.

One felt that Mr Koussevitzky's conducting of Wagner too often slighted that composer's melodies. In the "Liebestod," for example, it is the long flowing spirals of melody that bind the whole work together. But the sonority, rhythm, and color often make people overlook the melody, as Mr Koussevitzky appeared to from his awkward way of phrasing the music. It is only just to repeat that the audience applauded the "Liebestod" with great enthusiasm, so that the orchestra was asked to rise to share the plaudits.

P. R.

Music in Boston

MON. — MAR 25

Week-End Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its spring pension fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, with a program of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. The audience filled the seats and a large part of the standing room, and made evident its appreciation of the present high estate of the orchestra by unusually hearty and prolonged applause, which on two occasions justified the conductor in calling the men to their feet. The least successful item was the closing scene from "Walküre," with David Blair McClosky to sing Wotan's Farewell. When Mr. McClosky's voice came through, he appeared to be singing well, but for the most part his tones were almost inaudible in the orchestral tumult. Nor was the conductor's contribution entirely satisfactory. The pace was a little too quick, and the phrasing sometimes inept. For the rest, there can be little but praise. Mr. Koussevitzky always spurs the Valkyrs' winged horses to unexampled speed; but as this is not one of Wagner's most inspired passages, it is perhaps as well to get it over without undue delay. The "Rienzi" Overture was duly theatrical, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" were poetically treated, the Prelude and final scene from "Tristan" were set forth with more than common intensity and breadth, and the "Meistersinger" Prelude was joyfully proclaimed.

Yesterday's [illegible] Symphony

Week-End of An Orchestra And Conductor

TRANS. MAR. 25

Bruckner Bettered by Cuts— Wagner Variously and Untarnished

THE "ites"—Wagnerites, Brahmsites, Debussyites, what you will—are both help and hindrance to the object of their faith and admiration. Without them, Wagner would have made way more slowly into the world-wide theater; Brahms been longer counted forbidding in the concert-room; Debussy lingered in the purgatory of innovators. None the less, it is the Wagnerites who now split hairs over the turning of a phrase in a busy opera house; shake with qualms lest Brahms sound too songful and romantic; resent a vigorous, full-voiced Debussy, who is not always refining his sensations and shading his colors. Beside all three, here in Boston stand, for the hour, the Brucknerites. They rejoiced eagerly when Mr. Koussevitzky announced the performance of "the master's" Eighth Symphony. They waited with impatience when he deferred it to make more thorough preparation. They heard it at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—and on both days their reproachful outcries rent the surrounding air. Heaven forgive him, he had cut "the master-work." He had indeed. A Symphony that at full length considerably exceeds an hour in performance came and went in almost exactly sixty minutes. The second subject—to risk a technicality—did not return in the first movement, thereby leaving that division rather less than full-rounded. Cherished pages in the Adagio, presumed to be the crown of the whole, went by the board. In the comparatively impotent Finale, the conductor turned over a "fistful" of omitted pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky did make these cuts, though hardly so extensively as the irritated Brucknerites assert. He also made them for the good of the composer, of this particular Symphony, of the two audiences. What had kept the Eighth from Symphony Hall through almost exactly twenty years? What had kept any of Bruckner's Symphonies from that concert-room since 1915? Nothing less than the inordinate length of the best of them and the incredible unevenness—until the hearer comes to know Bruckner—of the matter within them contained. Mr. Monteux contemplated them—and quailed. Mr. Koussevitzky had them in mind when he first set foot in Boston—and postponed the adventure until this, his fifth, season. By that time he had discovered that he must persuade hearers to Bruckner over semi-conscious prepossessions and semi-dormant prejudices. No audience in America has the habit of sustained and exacting musical attention. Strauss's longer tone-poems tax them. It is perilous to risk more than one in a season. Mr. Bloch's "America," multifarious and changeful as it is, was immediately accounted "too long." Outside his slow movements, Bruckner's lengths are also his tediums. To gain the hearing that he deserves they must be reduced. Bruckner is prone to needless repetitions; on many a feeble page he seems all unaware of his impotence. No composer falls away, as does he, from heigths of inspiration to depths of routine, mannerism and futility. Against far-flung visions he sets childish simplicities, turns not a doubting hair. Only German-speaking audiences absorb him unabridged and profess to enjoy the experience.

Not only must Bruckner be shortened; he must be purged so far as possible of his besetting weaknesses. Mr. Koussevitzky set to the cutting with clear mind and honest purpose. Except, possibly, here and there in the slow movement, a Bruckner emerged less diminished and clouded by his own faults than Symphony Hall had hitherto known. Clearly shone the beauty of his melody, as in the Scherzo and the Adagio; the splendor of his brass, the rich depth or the ethereal shimmer of his strings; his power of far-spread and upsurging climax; the instant thrill of his motivs re-emerging, of moments like the play of horn and oboe in the first movement or the harp-touches, say upon the Scherzo; the sheer majesty, in the Finale, of his rolling, pounding bass. The plodding Bruckner vanished before the Bruckner who saw the heavens opened, while little less than the divine fire kindled him to music-making. Two audiences listened rapt; in two performances conductor and orchestra outdid themselves. The end crowned the deed. Yet upon the outskirts fanatics for Bruckner fumed over pages for the most part well lost.

Richard the Great

After long interval, the Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday afternoon to a "Wagner-Cconcert" for the profit of its Pension Fund. As of old, the audience filled every seat and overflowed into standing-room; listened coughless; at the end of every number returned long and loud applause. Of old the reviewer took his text from such a company and descanted upon a town seemingly so minded to Wagner, yet content with the performance of only one, two, or three of his operas in a whole musical year. This time, the chronicler may stay his hand, since the Chicago Company, encouraged both at home and abroad, is about to enlarge its Wagnerian repertory and increase its Wagnerian singers; while there is some likelihood that a year hence a German company will again unfold to Boston a cycle of the "Ring" music-dramas. As of old again the orchestra played at the top of its mettle. In few pieces does it more aptly disclose the finesse and the splendor, the beauty of voice and the puissance of expression, which it has now regained, than in the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Die Meistersinger." The ear bathed in the glories of the horns through the orchestral interval that divides "Wotan's Farewell"; in the plangent sonorities of the violoncellos singing of fate at the outset of the Prelude to "Tristan."

Nor is it needful to linger over the qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky as Wagnerian conductor. Between many men of many minds there has been no lack of debate. Yesterday, however, he gave little reason for doubts and scruples. He put by the Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser" and the Prelude to Parsifal" in the performance of which he has been most reproached. If he sped "The Ride of the Valkyrs" beyond the possibilities of the opera house, he was playing it as symphonic piece rather than as music to be co-ordinated with the stage. If the final measures of "Die Walküre"—when Brünnhilde sleeps under the ash-tree and with bent head the god strides gloomily away—sounded tame, be it remembered that the stage-picture is essential part of them. As soon expect from the relatively improvised Wotan of Mr. McCloskey, the operatic eloquence of a Schorr, a Rode or a Bohnen.

On the other hand, Mr. Koussevitzky excelled himself in the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It was not blurred or over-hastened or over-blown or turned restless. It unfolded and ascended in the unbroken, on-sweeping Wagnerian line, diversified yet all-comprehending. The end was not merely climax, it was culmination. Again, in the Prelude the Closing Scene from "Tristan," Koussevitzky opened out a music tha has tended to keep hot-house like stuffy; gave wing to its passion of sire, depth to its under-voice of fate; high and firm and clear that most pe ant and beatified of songful ecsta Isolde's Liebestod. And though it blasphemy to say as much, he exerc upon the Overture to "Rienzi" a t Toscaninian ability to make the stuff" sound in glowing voice. To it restored not only its turged thunde roof-lifter that it is—but also its tur magnificence.

A conventional "Wagner-progra with the episodes from the Forest-Sc in "Siegfried" added, to the items alre specified. Yet how ageless, how ind itable, how all-conquering, remains t music, stripped in the concert-hall every glamour of the theater—save recollection has impregnated us wi them—not even prelude to a rising c tain! For the thirtieth, possibly the f tieth, time some heard the closing sce of "Die Walküre"; they could foret almost every measure; yet their ears a hearts leapt not less to those wondro horns; their ears and their fancies to t first tonal gleam of the magic fires. T Valkyr clangors remain the music of heroic world, when a god's virgin-daug ters rode the skies, smiting spear shield. The forest drowses and smil and Siegfried dreams of her who bo him—the exhaustless beauty of the m sic of the Volsung pair—until the bi bids him to new adventure. Music passion and fate still stands fulfilled the Prelude to "Tristan." The tona splendor, the romantic lustres, of th Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" still g unsurpassed. To this day there is cele tial magic in the singing strings weavin the pathway of the descending Grai For us elders, even a "Wagner-Concert brings a hundred joys of memory. Fo the youngsters—God save them!—a whol new world is opening.

H. T. P.

Letters to the Editor

TRANS. MAR. 26 - 29

IF THEY ONLY WOULD!

To the Editor of the Transcript:

For a third year my name is on the waiting list for tickets to the Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoons. It moves up so slowly that if I ever attain them, I shall probably be rolled into Symphony Hall on a wheel-chair. Yet for the twentieth time I gather—from the epistolary Mr. Clayton Johns—that countless seat-holders are about to surrender their tickets unless Mr. Koussevitzky shapes his programs to suit their prejudices. If they only would! But the waiting lists are tangible evidence that they never do. Instead, they fill up their subscription blanks as though they were protecting family heirlooms. Then they "take it out" in "belly-aching around." (My sophomore brother, home for Sunday from Harvard, who expects the other ticket—if we ever get them—insists that I use the word. You Mr. Editor, will probably strike it out.)

IMPATIENT GRIZZEL

Boston, March 24.

THE YOUNGER GENERATION VIEWS THE SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Apparently one's attitude toward the programs of the Symphony Orchestra is influenced greatly by one's age. Mr Clayton Johns has expressed in your columns a point of view which, for all know, may be typical of his generation May I be permitted a few words in which to express a point of view which is, I have good reason to believe, not only my own but that of most of the twenty-five to thirty-five-year-old group to which I belong?

It seems to me that Mr. Koussevitzky's programs have a very fair and reasonable proportion of music by contemporary composers. Mr. Johns believes differently. He inquired some days ago, "Who ever heard of Janin or Dukelsky?" if I remember correctly. I do not know just how old Mr. Johns is, but I should think he might be able to recall a time when elderly Bostonians inquired, "Who is Wagner?" So many great composers have, in the past, been adjudged crazy by the contemporaries that one would suppose that present-day concert-goers would be a little less positive in their harsh opinions of present-day music-makers. Nor may Mr. Johns and his friends say, "But these men do not make music," for that is nothing more nor less than what the anti-Wagnerites said about the "modernist" of their day. Certainly, unless music has become a thoroughly decadent art, some one (or two, or three) of the young composers of the day will be a "great" composer—a "classic" composer—to future generations. Mr. Koussevitzky evidently feels that we should have an opportunity to hear what these young men are doing. We want to hear them, and to have a chance to form our own opinions regarding them. I wish to put the case more strongly. We feel we have a right to hear them (to say nothing of the right of the composer to be heard).

Mr. Johns can remember when Brahms was a "modern," doubtless. I do not know how "radical" the music of Brahms was considered when it was first played in Boston, but I do know that it had to fight against a great deal of misunderstanding before it reached its present high estate. Am I hitting wide of the mark if I suggest that it is probable that when Mr. Johns first heard Brahms—and Wagner—he felt interested? He was younger then. Many of the older persons of the time were bored by the one and greatly irritated by the other, I should like to wager. I assume that Mr Johns now loves Brahms and Wagner and I feel certain that their genius (then unsuspected by most people) plus his long association with them is the reason why he does. When my friends and I are numbered among the older ones we will thank Serge Koussevitzky for having enabled us to live for a long time with—Stravinsky, shall we say?—or perhaps it will be some unknown whose name may appear for the first time on a program next year.

But there is much more to it than this. We are not looking merely to the future—we are enjoying the present. It would be unreasonable to expect that any considerable proportion of the new names appearing from week to week on the Symphony programs will be known after a generation or two. As has been previously suggested in the Transcript columns, the modern number, even though it be in no sense "great" (not all of the German music that Dr. Muck played was great, by any means) serves as spice to the programs—or perhaps I should say, serves as an appetizer. One looks forward with a certain zest toward a new composition which is quite different from the anticipation with which one awaits the playing of a favorite classic. The interest of the program is thereby widened even if the particular piece was not greatly enjoyed. There is always the interesting possibility that it will be enjoyed more the next time it is heard.

I am sure that Mr. Johns will yield to none of us in his devotion to the B. S. O. or in his jealous regard for its reputation. Does it not then mean something to him and to all of us that the program of our orchestra under Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky have become known throughout the country for their breadth, variety, untrammeled freedom, and indeed for their interest? If we are grateful to Mr. Koussevitzky for bringing the orchestra to its present marvellous pitch of perfection it would seem that we ought at least to allow him that freedom in the choice of his programs without which he would doubtless find it difficult to do his best work.

Would it be unkind, in closing, to suggest to Mr. Johns that his generation has had its day in court, so to speak—that he has attended concerts for many years—that the supporters of the Symphony concerts of the future must be recruited from the young of the present—that, in short, he ought to permit us to have our moderns, at least to the extent of one per concert? And he must not think too badly of us, for we love his (and our) Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms as much as he does—except for his advantage of having been longer acquainted with them.

JAMES B. HOBBS

Brighton, March 23.

WAGNER PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

GLOBE MAR 25

Capacity Audience Is Enthusiastic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a Wagner program yesterday afternoon for the benefit of the pension fund for retired players. Symphony Hall had been completely sold out far in advance. The capacity audience applauded each number enthusiastically. The program began with the "Rienzi" overture, and included the prelude to "Lohengrin" and to "Die Meistersinger," the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and portions of the closing scene of "Die Walkuere." David Blair McClosky, baritone, assisted the orchestra in the latter number.

There are some who claim these days that Wagner's day is done. It is certainly true that his influence on the younger generations of contemporary composers is slight, though with such elders as Richard Strauss it has been all-pervading. But the numbers and the emotional ferver of yesterday's audience would suffice to prove, were proofs really needed, that Wagner's hold on the public remains as strong as ever.

Mr Koussevitzky began the concert by conducting the finest performance of the "Rienzi" overture one recalls from anyone. He disguised the immaturity of the melodic style, skilfully waving the opening passages from banality. He could not, of course, hope to do as much for the sonorous peroration. But he played the noisy closing passage with fervor and conviction, so that it made the same sort of effect that a march for military band can make if superbly performed.

One wondered whether a sophisticated listener in the 1840s could have detected beneath the seeming triviality and bad taste of much of this overture the greater Wagner to come. It seems now incredible that the man who wrote "Rienzi" was later to write the "Ring," "Tristan," and "Die Meistersinger." The power already is there, but no trace of refinement, the subtlety, the majesty of the best passages in the later Wagner.

One was less well pleased with Mr Koussevitzky's conduct of the rest of the program. Some of it, like the "Magic Fire" music from "Die Walkuere," apparently failed to stir his emotions and fell rather flat by comparison with the effect one remembers this number to have made time out of mind.

In other numbers, such as the excerpts from "Tristan," Mr Koussevitzky's usual way of conducting as he feels the music, rather than as custom dictates, or the printed score directs, annoyed a listener who prefers his Wagner straight, with no interposition of a conductor's personality between listener and composer.

One felt that Mr Koussevitzky's conducting of Wagner too often slighted that composer's melodies. In the "Liebestod," for example, it is the long flowing spirals of melody that bind the whole work together. But the sonority, rhythm, and color often make people overlook the melody, as Mr Koussevitzky appeared to from his awkward way of phrasing the music. It is only just to repeat that the audience applauded the "Liebestod" with great enthusiasm, so that the orchestra was asked to rise to share the plaudits.

P. R.

Music in Boston

MON. — MAR 25

Week-End Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its spring pension fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon with a program of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. The audience filled the seats and a large part of the standing room, and made evident its appreciation of the present high estate of the orchestra by unusually hearty and prolonged applause, which on two occasions justified the conductor in calling the men to their feet. The least successful item was the closing scene from "Walküre," with David Blair McClosky to sing Wotan's Farewell. When Mr. McClosky's voice came through, he appeared to be singing well, but for the most part his tones were almost inaudible in the orchestral tumult. Nor was the conductor's contribution entirely satisfactory. The pace was a little too quick, and the phrasing sometimes inept. For the rest, there can be little but praise. Mr. Koussevitzky always spurs the Valkyrs' winged horses to unexampled speed; but as this is not one of Wagner's most inspired passages, it is perhaps as well to get it over without undue delay. The "Rienzi" Overture was duly theatrical, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" were poetically treated, the Prelude and final scene from "Tristan" were set forth with more than common intensity and breadth, and the "Meistersinger" Prelude was joyfully proclaimed.

Yesterday's [illegible] Symphony

Week-End of An Orchestra And Conductor

TRANS. MAR. 25

Bruckner Bettered by Cuts—Wagner Variously and Untarnished

THE "ites"—Wagnerites, Brahmsites, Debussyites, what you will—are both help and hindrance to the object of their faith and admiration. Without them, Wagner would have made way more slowly into the world-wide theater; Brahms been longer counted forbidding in the concert-room; Debussy lingered in the purgatory of innovators. None the less, it is the Wagnerites who now split hairs over the turning of a phrase in a busy opera house; shake with qualms lest Brahms sound too songful and romantic; resent a vigorous, full-voiced Debussy, who is not always refining his sensations and shading his colors. Beside all three, here in Boston stand, for the hour, the Brucknerites. They rejoiced eagerly when Mr. Koussevitzky announced the performance of "the master's" Eighth Symphony. They waited with impatience when he deferred it to make more thorough preparation. They heard it at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—and on both days their reproachful outcries rent the surrounding air. Heaven forgive him, he had cut "the master-work." He had indeed. A Symphony that at full length considerably exceeds an hour in performance came and went in almost exactly sixty minutes. The second subject—to risk a technicality—did not return in the first movement, thereby leaving that division rather less than full-rounded. Cherished pages in the Adagio, presumed to be the crown of the whole, went by the board. In the comparatively impotent Finale, the conductor turned over a "fistful" of omitted pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky did make these cuts, though hardly so extensively as the irritated Brucknerites assert. He also made them for the good of the composer, of this particular Symphony, of the two audiences. What had kept the Eighth from Symphony Hall through almost exactly twenty years? What had kept any of Bruckner's Symphonies from that concert-room since 1915? Nothing less than the inordinate length of the best of them and the incredible unevenness—until the hearer comes to know Bruckner—of the matter within them contained. Mr. Monteux contemplated them—and quailed. Mr. Koussevitzky had them in mind when he first set foot in Boston—and postponed the adventure until this, his fifth, season. By that time he had discovered that he must persuade hearers to Bruckner over semi-conscious prepossessions and semi-dormant prejudices. No audience in America has the habit of sustained and exacting musical attention. Strauss's longer tone-poems tax them. It is perilous to risk more than one in a season. Mr. Bloch's "America," multifarious and changeful as it is, was immediately accounted "too long." Outside his slow movements, Bruckner's lengths are also his tediums. To gain the hearing that he deserves they must be reduced. Bruckner is prone to needless repetitions; on many a feeble page he seems all unaware of his impotence. No composer falls away, as does he, from heigths of inspiration to depths of routine, mannerism and futility. Against far-flung visions he sets childish simplicities, turns not a doubting hair. Only German-speaking audiences absorb him unabridged and profess to enjoy the experience.

Not only must Bruckner be shortened; he must be purged so far as possible of his besetting weaknesses. Mr. Koussevitzky set to the cutting with clear mind and honest purpose. Except, possibly, here and there in the slow movement, a Bruckner emerged less diminished and clouded by his own faults than Symphony Hall had hitherto known. Clearly shone the beauty of his melody, as in the Scherzo and the Adagio; the splendor of his brass, the rich depth or the ethereal shimmer of his strings; his power of far-spread and upsurging climax; the instant thrill of his motivs re-emerging, of moments like the play of horn and oboe in the first movement or the harp-touches, say upon the Scherzo; the sheer majesty, in the Finale, of his rolling, pounding bass. The plodding Bruckner vanished before the Bruckner who saw the heavens opened, while little less than the divine fire kindled him to music-making. Two audiences listened rapt; in two performances conductor and orchestra outdid themselves. The end crowned the deed. Yet upon the outskirts fanatics for Bruckner fumed over pages for the most part well lost.

Richard the Great

After long interval, the Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday afternoon to a "Wagner-Cconcert" for the profit of its Pension Fund. As of old, the audience filled every seat and overflowed into standing-room; listened coughless; at the end of every number returned long and loud applause. Of old the reviewer took his text from such a company and descanted upon a town seemingly so minded to Wagner, yet content with the performance of only one, two, or three of his operas in a whole musical year. This time, the chronicler may stay his hand, since the Chicago Company, encouraged both at home and abroad, is about to enlarge its Wagnerian repertory and increase its Wagnerian singers; while there is some likelihood that a year hence a German company will again unfold to Boston a cycle of the "Ring" music-dramas. As of old again the orchestra played at the top of its mettle. In few pieces does it more aptly disclose the finesse and the splendor, the beauty of voice and the puissance of expression, which it has now regained, than in the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Die Meistersinger." The ear bathed in the glories of the horns through the orchestral interval that divides "Wotan's Farewell"; in the plangent sonorities of the violoncellos singing of fate at the outset of the Prelude to "Tristan."

Nor is it needful to linger over the qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky as Wagnerian conductor. Between many men of many minds there has been no lack of debate. Yesterday, however, he gave little reason for doubts and scruples. He put by the Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser" and the Prelude to Parsifal" in the performance of which he has been most reproached. If he sped "The Ride of the Valkyrs" beyond the possibilities of the opera house, he was playing it as symphonic piece rather than as music to be co-ordinated with the stage. If the final measures of "Die Walküre"—when Brünnhilde sleeps under the ash-tree and with bent head the god strides gloomily away—sounded tame, be it remembered that the stage-picture is essential part of them. As soon expect from the relatively improvised Wotan of Mr. McCloskey, the operatic eloquence of a Schorr, a Rode or a Bohnen.

On the other hand, Mr. Koussevitzky excelled himself in the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It was not blurred or over-hastened or over-blown or turned restless. It unfolded and ascended in the unbroken, on-sweeping Wagnerian line, diversified yet all-comprehending. The end was not merely climax, it was culmination. Again, in the Prelude the Closing Scene from "Tristan," Koussevitzky opened out a music tha has tended to keep hot-house like stuffy; gave wing to its passion of sire, depth to its under-voice of fate; high and firm and clear that most po ant and beatified of songful ecsta Isolde's Liebestod. And though it blasphemy to say as much, he exerc upon the Overture to "Rienzi" a t Toscaninian ability to make the stuff" sound in glowing voice. To it restored not only its turged thunde roof-lifter that it is—but also its tur magnificence.

A conventional "Wagner-progra with the episodes from the Forest-Sc in "Siegfried" added to the items alre specified. Yet how ageless, how indo itable, how all-conquering, remains t music, stripped in the concert-hall every glamour of the theater—save recollection has impregnated us wi them—not even prelude to a rising c tain! For the thirtieth, possibly the f tieth, time some heard the closing sce of "Die Walküre": they could foret almost every measure; yet their ears a hearts leapt not less to those wondro horns; their ears and their fancies to t first tonal gleam of the magic fires. T Valkyr clangors remain the music of heroic world, when a god's virgin-daug ters rode the skies, smiting spear shield. The forest drowses and smil and Siegfried dreams of her who bo him—the exhaustless beauty of the m sic of the Volsung pair—until the bi bids him to new adventure. Music passion and fate still stands fulfilled the Prelude to "Tristan." The ton splendor, the romantic lustres, of th Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" still g unsurpassed. To this day there is cele tial magic in the singing strings weavin the pathway of the descending Grai For us elders, even a "Wagner-Concert brings a hundred joys of memory. Fo the youngsters—God save them!—a whol new world is opening.

H. T. P.

Letters to the Editor

TRANS. MAR. 26 - 29

IF THEY ONLY WOULD!

To the Editor of the Transcript:

For a third year my name is on the waiting list for tickets to the Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoons. It moves up so slowly that if I ever attain them, I shall probably be rolled into Symphony Hall on a wheel-chair. Yet for the twentieth time I gather—from the epistolary Mr. Clayton Johns—that countless seat-holders are about to surrender their tickets unless Mr. Koussevitzky shapes his programs to suit their prejudices. If they only would! But the waiting lists are tangible evidence that they never do. Instead, they fill up their subscription blanks as though they were protecting family heirlooms. Then they "take it out" in "belly-aching around." (My sophomore brother, home for Sunday from Harvard, who expects the other ticket—if we ever get them—insists that I use the word. You Mr. Editor, will probably strike it out.)

IMPATIENT GRIZZEL

Boston, March 24.

THE YOUNGER GENERATION VIEWS THE SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Apparently one's attitude toward the programs of the Symphony Orchestra is influenced greatly by one's age. Mr Clayton Johns has expressed in you columns a point of view which, for all know, may be typical of his generation May I be permitted a few words in whic to express a point of view which is, I have good reason to believe, not only my own but that of most of the twenty-five to thirty-five-year-old group to which I belong?

It seems to me that Mr. Koussevitzky's programs have a very fair and reasonable proportion of music by contemporary composers. Mr. Johns believes differently. He inquired some days ago, "Who ever heard of Janin or Dukelsky?" if I remember correctly. I do not know just how old Mr. Johns is, but I should think he might be able to recall a time when elderly Bostonians inquired, "Who is Wagner?" So many great composers have, in the past, been adjudged crazy by the contemporaries that one would suppose that present-day concert-goers would be a little less positive in their harsh opinions of present-day music-makers. Nor may Mr. Johns and his friends say, "But these men do not make music," for that is nothing more nor less than what the anti-Wagnerites said about the "modernist" of their day. Certainly, unless music has become a thoroughly decadent art, some one (or two, or three) of the young composers of the day will be a "great" composer—a "classic" composer—to future generations. Mr. Koussevitzky evidently feels that we should have an opportunity to hear what these young men are doing. We want to hear them, and to have a chance to form our own opinions regarding them. I wish to put the case more strongly. We feel we have a right to hear them (to say nothing of the right of the composer to be heard).

Mr. Johns can remember when Brahms was a "modern," doubtless. I do not know how "radical" the music of Brahms was considered when it was first played in Boston, but I do know that it had to fight against a great deal of misunderstanding before it reached its present high estate. Am I hitting wide of the mark if I suggest that it is probable that when Mr. Johns first heard Brahms—and Wagner—he felt interested? He was younger then. Many of the older persons of the time were bored by the one and greatly irritated by the other, I should like to wager. I assume that Mr Johns now loves Brahms and Wagner and I feel certain that their genius (then unsuspected by most people) plus his long association with them is the reason why he does. When my friends and I are numbered among the older ones we will thank Serge Koussevitzky for having enabled us to live for a long time with—Stravinsky, shall we say?—or perhaps it will be some unknown whose name may appear for the first time on a program next year.

But there is much more to it than this. We are not looking merely to the future—we are enjoying the present. It would be unreasonable to expect that any considerable proportion of the new names appearing from week to week on the Symphony programs will be known after a generation or two. As has been previously suggested in the Transcript columns, the modern number, even though it be in no sense "great" (not all of the German music that Dr. Muck played was great, by any means) serves as spice to the programs—or perhaps I should say, serves as an appetizer. One looks forward with a certain zest toward a new composition which is quite different from the anticipation with which one awaits the playing of a favorite classic. The interest of the program is thereby widened even if the particular piece was not greatly enjoyed. There is always the interesting possibility that it will be enjoyed more the next time it is heard.

I am sure that Mr. Johns will yield to none of us in his devotion to the B. S. O. or in his jealous regard for its reputation. Does it not then mean something to him and to all of us that the programs of our orchestra under Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky have become known throughout the country for their breadth, variety, untrammeled freedom, and indeed for their interest? If we are grateful to Mr. Koussevitzky for bringing the orchestra to its present marvellous pitch of perfection it would seem that we ought at least to allow him that freedom in the choice of his programs without which he would doubtless find it difficult to do his best work.

Would it be unkind, in closing, to suggest to Mr. Johns that his generation has had its day in court, so to speak, that he has attended concerts for many years—that the supporters of the Symphony concerts of the future must be recruited from the young of the present—that, in short, he ought to permit us to have our moderns, at least to the extent of one per concert? And he must not think too badly of us, for we love his (and our) Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms as much as he does—except for his advantage of having been longer acquainted with them.

JAMES B. HOBBS

Brighton, March 23.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

MARCH 26, 1929

As the Metropolis Judges Orchestr

As The Metropolis Judges Orchestras

Bostonians, Philadelphians, New-Yorkers When Compared

WITH A MONTH of orchestral concerts remaining, it is still possible that some unpredictable circumstance [writes Oscar Thompson in the New York Evening Post] will add yet another to the thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen or seventeen symphony conductors who have led orchestras in Manhattan's concert-halls this season, the number depending on whether the Philharmonic's children's concerts, the incidental appearance of a Philharmonic violinist in the part of a conductor at a Honegger concert and a program or two by the orchestras not of established place and reputation are included. Stopping at thirteen, however, it is to be noted that two organizations, the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra, contrived between them to make use of all but three of the total in their regular subscription concerts for adult symphony patrons in Carnegie Hall. The three whose distinction or misfortune it was to be otherwise associated were Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, Nikolai Sokoloff of the Cleveland Orchestra and Georges Zaslawsky of the now impressively silent Beethoven Symphonists who six months ago were announcing largely expanded activities.

There may be some profit in checking the record with a view to corroborating the growing conviction that the guest-system is a bad one for our foremost American orchestras, however much it may please conductors and the friends of conductors and ward off stalemate for listeners more concerned with personalities than with qualities of performance. Undoubtedly the most consistent good playing of the season has been that of the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitzky. At its best it has played no better than the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra at their best. The Philadelphia Orchestra's first concert of the year, that which marked the return of Leopold Stokowski, and the concerts of the Philharmonic under Mr. Toscanini, not to forget several really superb programs by Mr. Mengelberg would leave this commentator without a choice in this dubious matter of what is best among the best. But both the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra have sagged between their peaks of superb playing in a manner and to a degree that most certainly has not been true of the Boston visitors.

Granting the different personalities not only of the conductors but of the orchestras and the purely personal preference that any one listener may have for the Philadelphia or the Philharmonic tone, or for Mr. Toscanini's or Mr. Stokowski's particular results with a particular work, it must be admitted without question that the Koussevitzky-Boston standard has been a higher one than the Mengelberg-Damrosch-Reiner-Honegger-Gabrilowitsch-Toscanini standard of the Philharmonic, or the Stokowski-Gabrilowitsh-Goossens-Kraus standard of the Philadelphians. It is not to be expected that the addition of Mr. Kraus to the Philharmonic list will perceptibly alter the average, for better or worse.

Nothing has been more apparent during the season than that the superior achievements of Mr. Koussevitzky with the Boston band were the result not merely of one-man leadership this season but of one-man leadership in the preceding seasons. He did not accomplish his ends in his first year or his second in Boston, even without the interruptions and distractions of a divided command. Indeed, Mr. Koussevitzky's earlier seasons in Boston may be said, on the basis of the orchestra's playing in New York this year, to have been preparatory. At the close of last season there was a clear indication of what was to be. There were those who felt then that the Boston Symphony had "come back—all the way back"; though with a very different personality from that of the days when it was the basis of comparison for all American orchestras.

Even those who have most admired the Bostonians' performances this year would hesitate to put this orchestra ahead of the Philharmonic or the Philadelphia in basic quality; probably the most discriminating still would favor one or the other of the latter, or both, over Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra, as an orchestra, and it is more than possible that they would in some measure agree that the potentialities of the present Philharmonic under Toscanini or the present Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowsk are greater than those of the present Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. Assuming this as so (and it would be rash not to admit that the assumption is open to attack from those who have become devout partisans of the Boston ensemble) the fact remains that the Boston Orchestra has played more consistently well in New York, this year, than its rivals. If it has done this without being clearly the best orchestra, the reason plainly is to be found in the circumstances surrounding its leadership.

Those who would be ready to argue that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superior conductor to Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski are probably fewer in New York than those who would argue the contrary. This is a hazardous subject, at best, shot through with personal preferences and prejudices that may hinge upon some such insignificant detail as the tempo of a single work or the conductor's particular way of holding the baton. Of the four chief conductors appearing in New York, surface indications of their popularity would appear to rank Mr. Toscanini first, Mr. Stokowski second, Mr. Koussevitzky third and Mr. Mengelberg fourth, but the correctness of this or the justness of it is about as provable as the relative beauty of as many fair women.

Little room for dispute exists, however, over the consistent and remarkable progress the Boston Symphony has made under Mr. Koussevitzky. There was as little for doubt last season with repect to the deterioration of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the absence of Mr. Stokowski. What had been built up there by the same process as that observed more latterly in Boston began to decline when the mainspring of this progress was temporarily detached. Nothing could have been more startling than the superb playing of the Philadelphia Orchestra when Mr. Stokowski returned to it last fall, in view of its inferior performance the year before under Mr. Reiner and Mr. Monteux. Subsequently, it relapsed into much the same condition as a year ago, when Mr. Stowowski passed it on to Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Goossens's single concert was a little better, that of Mr. Kraus was one of the most unsatisfactory New York has known from this orchestra. Given a similar situation in Boston, like results might be taken for granted.

As the superlative playing of the Philadelphia and the Boston Orchestras at their best this year is to be attributed in each instance to the hard work of a conductor in other years quite as much as to anything that conductor may have achieved in the current season, so it is only fair and logical to give Mr. Mengelberg the credit for much that is of the highest order in the playing of the Philharmonic. His was the problem this year of fusing the new blood from the Symphony Society with the old Philharmonic men, and while the task may not have been so formidable a one as was assumed at the first of the season when the orchestra played a little uncouthly (for the Philharmonic) it must be said without equivocation that the ensemble was completely itself before Mr. Mengelberg departed. Such differences as individuals may find between Toscanini's performances and Mengelberg's performances are the differences between the two men. The orchestra has given both what they wanted, without stint and with a superb virtuosity. But the period of guesting between the departure of Mengelberg and the coming of Toscanini was another story. Mr. Reiner and Mr. Gabrilowitsch had much the same difficulties—or perhaps it should be said the orchestra had much the same deficiencies—as were only too evident in the Philadelphia concerts of these same guests.

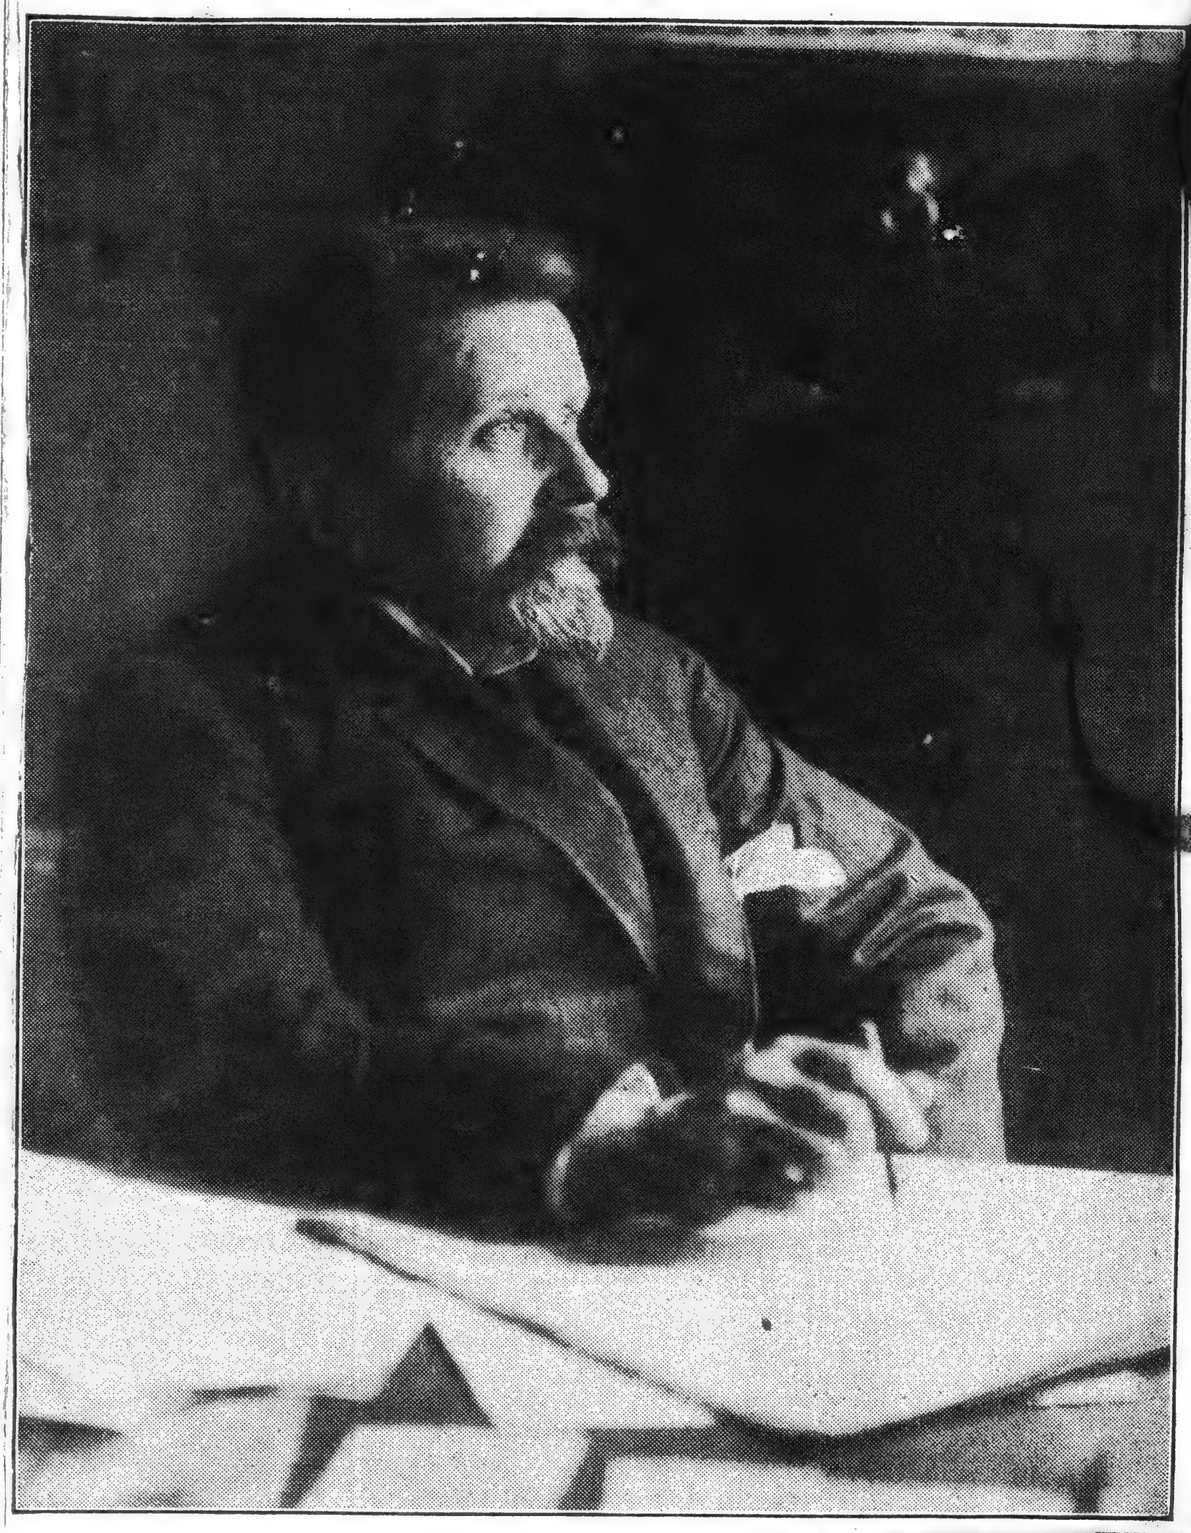
Mr. Toscanini no doubt would give us mervelous concerts with either the Philadelphia of the Boston orchestra. If he were the cole conductor of any one of the three leading ensembles for a number of years he might surpass the present Philharmonic concerts because of an organization as much more responsive to his genius ah the present superb ensemble is when compared to his Ssala orchestra. But such speculation is a little remote from the true situation. New York could consider itself the most fortunate of cities if it could maintain a level not necessarily that of Toscanini's most conflagratory eloquence, but one that can be described as a Mengelberg-Stokowski-Koussevitzky-Toscanini level. It is not likely to be content with less.

116

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, MARCH 29, 1929

sicians --- Plays and Players

Slavs Have Dreams in Their Eyes



Alexander Gretch

Russian Composer of F[illegible] Songs, Making His First Visit to Boston Tomorrow

Home Talent for Cambridge Hearing

EARLY in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last evening, Mr. Koussevitzky presented an interesting contrast of styles. He began with Arensky's "Variations on a Theme of Chaikovsky." This is melodious music of the nineteenth century, combining familiar German and Russian harmonic methods. It is soothing in effect. One may listen to it easily without feeling greatly stimulated. The variations are graceful, if conventional. As far as character goes, Chaikovsky might have devised them himself in the manner of a slow movement to a symphony. The audience at Sanders Theater heard and clapped these variations in an amiable mood. Then came Mr. Randall Thompson's Symphonic Prelude, "The Piper at the Gates of Dawn," in which the composer has written what he imagines was the "music heard down by the river toward early morning," described in Kenneth Grahame's "The Wind in the Willows." Mr. Thompson is professor of music at Wellesley and lecturer in music at Harvard. He studied at Harvard, at the American Academy in Rome and with Ernest Bloch. To say that he is a composer of the twentieth century in spirit as well as in fact is to suggest the character of the contrast which was afforded by the performance of his music immediately after that of Arensky. Lulled into a receptive mood by the nineteenth century variations, the listener sat up quickly at the first pungent pipings of Mr. Thompson's piece. It was stimulating music from the start. The significance of the composer's ideas were not revealed in the first few measures, but they were gradually and impressively developed until their importance was fully disclosed. It was as though the piper had first caught our attention with his eerie notes and then turned master of orchestration to give us a symphonic development of his thoughts. In sum, Mr. Thompson has used individualized choirs and individualized voices to fashion an intricate, close-woven, scholarly and increasingly engrossing composition. Hearing it for the first time, one would like to have it longer.

Having introduced contemporary and one might say, domestic, music (since the composer lives among us) by Mr. Thomson's piece, Mr. Koussevitzky continued the vein more extensively with Mr. Hill's vigorous Symphony in B-flat. From the performances of last year and this, the conductor is thoroughly familiar with Mr. Hill's compact and arresting music. Last evening he impressively announced the opening themes and subhandedly manipulated the development. He discerningly prepared the way for the more serene close of the second movement. With characteristic Koussevitzkian zest, he conducted the brilliant finale. Both Mr. Hill and Mr. Thompson were in the audience and were called to their feet.

For the concluding portion of the evening, Mr. Koussevitzy drew from the all-Wagner program of the preceding Sunday. The excerpts included "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg. It was in the first of these, with its melodies for woodwinds and leafy quiverings of the strings, that the advantages of an orchestra of virtuosi musicians were especially in evidence. What gave the greatest pleasure to the audience, however, was Mr. Koussevitzky's beautiful reading of the Prelude to "Lohengrin." The conductor repressed nothing; he inflated nothing. He merely set a slow, even flowing, most subtly undulating movement which perfectly matched the sublime aspiration of the music. Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled to bow with the orchestra. For conclusion, there was Mr. Koussevitzky's carefully inflected and dramatically expanding interpretation of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers," which has been heard several times before this season, once at Sanders Theater.

Concerts in Prospect

Impending Programs

A GRIST of programs comes to hand. First from Mr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week:

Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" ... Chaikovsky
Symphony in E minor, "Nordic" ..... Hanson
(Conductor: The Composer)
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" ... Strauss

Again from Mr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday next:

Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Forest Scene from the Opera, "Siegfried"— Prelude and Closing Scene from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde"—Prelude to the Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner

tems of the Day

The schedule for the remaining Sunay-afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall now complete. It stands:

rch 31—Mischa Levitzki, pianist.
ril 7—Serge Rakhmaninov, pianist.
April 14—John McCormack, tenor.
[illegible]
April 28—Roland Hayes, tenor.

Subscriptions to the fund to meet the working costs of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season now stand at $89,682.67, pledged by 594 subscribers. To meet the estimated deficit of $135,000 no less than $45,000 more is necessary. "He gives twice who gives quickly."

On the next visit of the Symphony Orchestra to New York at the middle of April, Mr. Koussevitzky will include Beethoven's Choral Symphony in his programs. A resident choir will assist in the finale. New York has never heard him in the piece.

THE MODERNS IN MUSIC

TRANS — MAR 29

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I've been much interested in following the articles concerning Mr. Koussevitzky's programs and I want to register my pleasure in reading the last two Letters to the Editor.

I've been a subscriber to the Symphony concerts almost since the beginning, so my age does not influence my opinion in the way Mr. Hobbs thinks it might. I thoroughly agree with what he says about the moderns, but why restrict it to the younger generation? We older listeners are as anxious as he to hear what is being composed today.

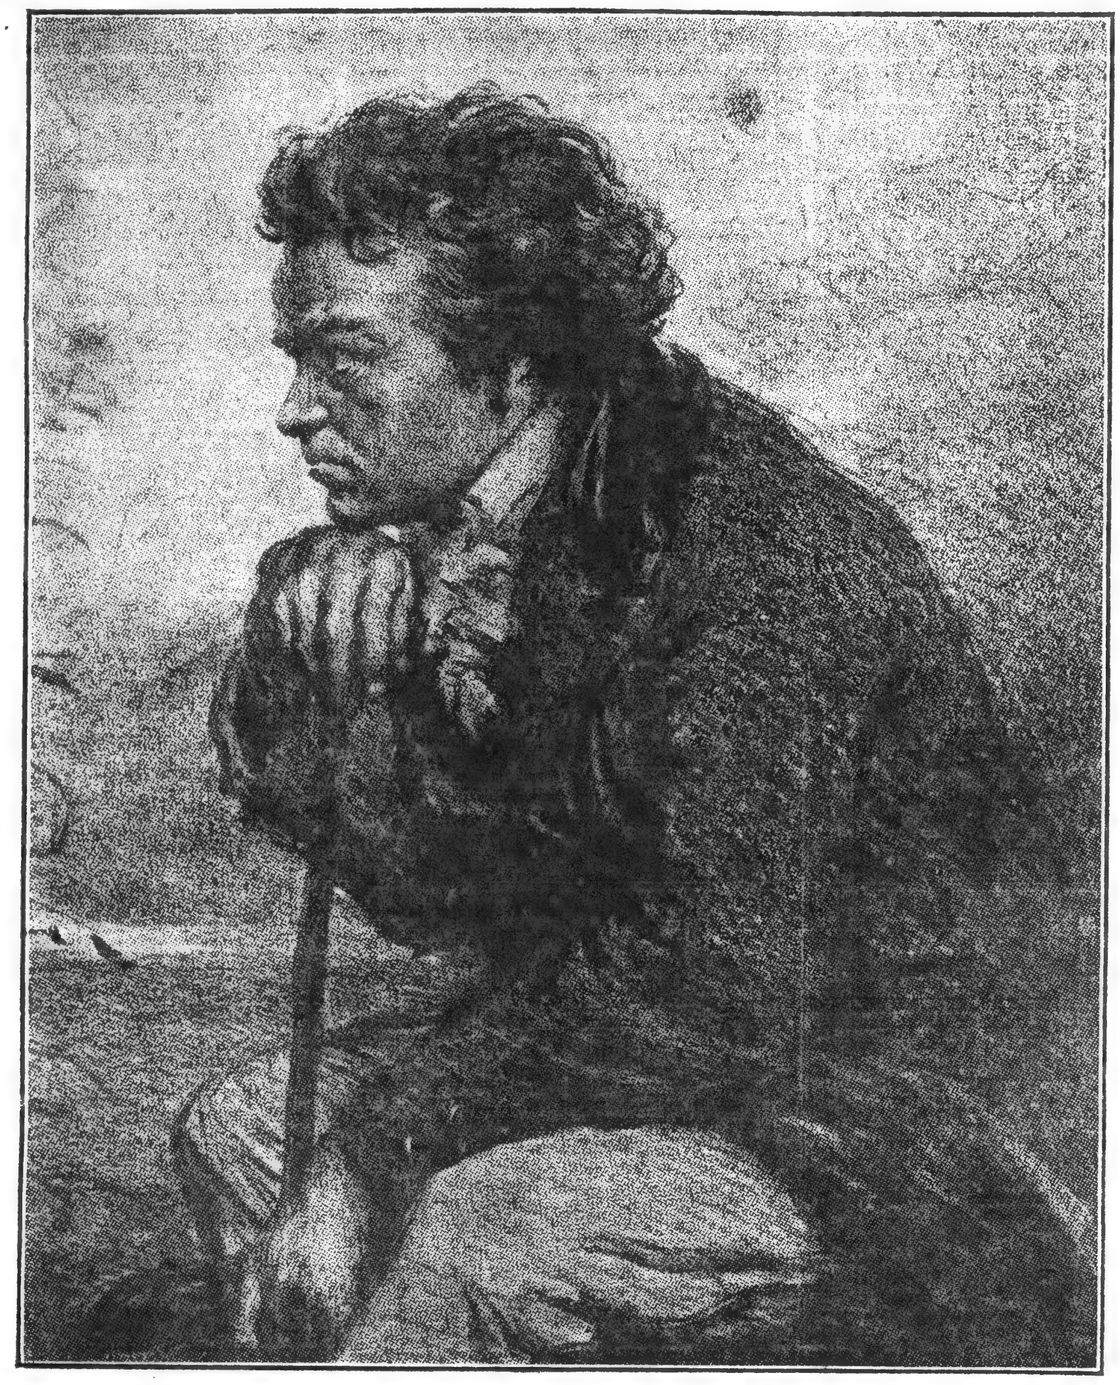
Wouldn't it be well as we are harking back to Brahms and Wagner to remember how harshly Beethoven was criticized? I seem to remember reading years ago that no less a personage than Carl Maria von Weber ridiculed one of his symphonies and spoke of him as a Nobody Composer.

Impatient Grissel is delicious, though I think some of the Transcript readers may have been shocked. I was a little.

F. A. M. B.

Newton Center, March 28.

The Vision of The Strong



Beethoven (Musical America)

From A New Lithograph by S. J. Woolf

Beethoven's Ninth for a Good Friday

TRANS-MAR.30

With the First Symphony and The "Eroica" Funeral March for Foch

FOR the concert of Good Friday Mr. Koussevitzky had assembled two symphonies of Beethoven, the First and the Ninth, in C major and D minor. Once before the symphony concerts heard the same combination, on April 29 and 30, 1910. This, however, did not include a Good Friday, for in 1910 Easter fell upon the twenty-seventh day of March. To add to Beethoven, and to add to the "Charfreitagsstimmung," as Beethoven's countrymen would have said, as well as to do honor to the memory of the late departed Ferdinand Foch, field marshal of France, the orchestra played at the beginning the funeral march from the "Heroic Symphony." Immediately there was speculation in the halls: Would Beethoven, who tore up the dedication of the third symphony to Napoleon, have torn it up had it been dedicated to Marshal Foch? Would Beethoven have approved of Foch? Would Foch have wanted the music of the German Beethoven played in his honor? We hasten to add that we do not know the answer to such questionings, nor would we want to hazard a guess. This can be said, however: So much the better for both of them, were it possible to record full approval of each other. And the march out of the "Eroica" fitted with singular appropriateness into the beginning of this program.

For this concert the aspect of the platform at Symphony Hall was a new one. At a glance one noted the absence of the raised tiers upon which the orchestra usually has its place. Again the orchestra was to sit upon a level platform. Further, double basses were moved to the extreme right, to the rear of 'cellos and violas. The know-it-alls would probably add "where they belong." For this change consolidates the bass section in a manner in which it could not possibly be unified otherwise. Not in a long crescent, as usual, were these basses placed, but in two short rows, immediately in front of each other. In the recitative passages of the Ninth, tone was thus of a remarkable ensemble.

Nor was the contingent from the colleges across the river arrayed in manner entirely similar to that in which we have become acoustomed to see at Pension concerts. At a concert of a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening, subscribers' seats cannot be removed from the front of the hall. In consequence, there is not room for the full choruses from Radcliffe and Harvard. And the chorus of yesterday afternoon numbered no more than a hundred and twenty, not much larger than the orchestra itself. Singers of the solo parts were, with one exception, the alto, such as have become entirely familiar to concerts of choral music in Boston—Ethel Hayden, Devora Nadworney, Charles Stratton, Fraser Gange.

For his first symphony, also, Mr. Koussevitzky broke precedent; substituted for it his clear-headed logic, used the small orchestra which latterly it has been his wont to use for performances of Mozart. Evidently, thus, the conductor takes no stock in the arguments of those Beethovenophiles who see in this work a startling and entirely original mind, springing full-formed and in perfect maturity out of the nowhere. The rest of us of course see that Beethoven, in making this first plunge into symphonic waters, used as his pair of water-wings (to continue the figure) the Jupiter symphony under his right arm and the symphony in G minor under his left, and all with Papa Haydn standing on the farther shore with life-preserver in hand ready to throw to the young learner. But oh! the kick which this young giant used in the waters. The observing Mozart and Haydn must have given it more than approval. And if they were sporting men must have picked its owner at once as a winner. But the small orchestra, to return to terra firma, was the one to give this first symphony its most characteristic voice. Thus one hears best the opening movement of rock strength (not intentionally so, of course) and gay trivialities; a second, of straightforward but pleasing melody, escaping not fugal complications; a minuet which is in reality more scherzo than minuet, which ran along in fleetest manner possible; and a bustling finale which did no more than afford fast-moving conclusion.

Upon this work, which precedes the real symphonic lifework of Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitzky added the great Ninth, which also stands outside of the poetic cycle of his symphonies. For eleven years elapsed between the composition of the Eighth and the Ninth. During these eleven years he busied himself with other matters,—the last piano sonatas, for example. But he made plans also for several symphonies. Did these plannings find their way into the Ninth? Very likely, to a degree. Was the Ninth the beginning of a new poetic cycle? Or was it (is it) the final effort of a man who passes in review the previous things he has done? These are matters which have much been called into question, to which there seems to be no conclusive answer. Much of the symphony is purely contemplative. There is no struggle with fate, no picturing of a hero, no poetised and energised dance as dominating motif. Though some have seen in the text of the finale the joy of brotherhood as philosophic answer to the brooding and questioning of the first movement.

At beginning there is no terse statement of motif for fuller treatment. For once Beethoven builds up his theme before fully announcing it. It is not brought in opposition to another theme, so that there is not struggle but enhancing development. A Scherzo continues from new view-points in the same emotional line. Ghostly is its swift progress, uncanny its course. But its themes of contrast strike the same note as the contrasting themes in the first movement, and its main theme is one that sheds new light upon the poetic subject at the basis of the first theme of the first movement. An Adagio brings new thought. Its two themes are of exceedingly great loveliness. One commentator has been moved to a comparison with the "two female figures in Titian's well-known picture, 'Earthly and Heavenly Love.'" For some of us, at least, the comparison breaks down, for we would indeed have difficulty in knowing which of these two themes was earthly and which heavenly, even granting that both represent love. Too well-mated they seem to justify such interpretation. Possibly both are different aspects of heavenly love, a love that is the love of angels—without sex. As such is it an answer, a tentative one, to the questionings brought in the first movement, and re-stated in the scherzo? And then follows that long introduction to the finale in which the recitatif of the basses interrupts sucessively references to the themes of the three previous movements, in which the composer suggests ever so softly a new theme. And a bass begins, "Not these tones, my friends; more pleasant and more joyous ones let us intone." And there follows with the latest melody, Schiller's "Ode to Joy" for vocal quartet and chorus as well as orchestra, in a climax wide and far flung. This, rather than the Adagio, must be the answer to those first two movements. A program which proceeds not in a straight line, but, as the scientists might say, by the "trial and error" method.

In performance Mr. Koussevitzky and his forces were on their mettle yesterday. With clearness and force he stated his subject in an opening movement. With artistry restated it in the fleet scherzo. While the songs of the Adagio were of purest and noblest voice. As though of speech itself came the forbidding tones of recitatif. And a mere breath was the first intimation of the theme of the finale. While its ending was little short of riot. It seemed as if in anticipation of this performance that the program ist had quoted" . . . . the final Prestissimo, "in which the chorus goes stark mad with joy.'" Of a truth one thought more of Stravinsky and Prokoflev than of Beethoven. And the small chorus of 120 would have been adjudged as doing well had double their number given the same effect.

A. H. M.

Beethoven's Ninth on Boston Program

MAR 30 MON

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was the major item on the twenty-first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The Choral Symphony had been heard several times before from Mr. Koussevitzky—in the Beethoven Festival of two years ago and at Pension Fund concerts; but not at a "regular" subscription concert since long before the Koussevitzkyan protectorate. The orchestra was assisted, as it had been previously, by the Harvard Glee Club, prepared by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Ethyl Hayden, soprano; Devora Nadworney, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

The orchestral performance was of that excellence which we take for granted from this organization, and the choruses again proved that for these difficult tasks their generous devotion guarantees better results than the experience of more mature bodies of singers. The soloists were all of familiar quality except Miss Nadworney, whom we do not remember having heard before. We hope, however, that we shall hear her again, for she is one of the few contraltos in our experience who can hold up their end in a mixed quartet. She could actually be heard when all four were singing. She revealed a voice of fine quality, which she handled admirably.

The audience, which was enthusiastic, had previously bestowed its approval on a performance of Beethoven's First Symphony. The plaudits were well earned. Employing a reduced orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky secured an immaculate utterance of these transparent measures, not forgettting the foreshadowing in the Scherzo of the greater composer.

The concert opened with the Funeral March from the "Eroica" Symphony, played, while orchestra, chorus and audience stood, in memory of Marshal Foch.

L. A. S.

Herald Mar 30

MU

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 21st concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, comprised Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. In the performance of the latter the orchestra was assisted by Ethyl Hayden, soprano; Devora Nadworney, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor; Frazer Gange, bass; the Harvard Glee Club, which had been prepared by its conductor, Dr. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by Mr. Wallace Woodworth, its conductor.

It might be said that the feature of this concert was the beautiful, the incomparably beautiful performance of the First Symphony for which Mr. Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra. We are speaking of performances, not of the two symphonies themselves. That the Ninth Symphony was not so perfectly performed as a whole was the fault of Beethoven, not of Mr. Koussevitzky, not of the players, not of the chorus singers who were valiant in their endeavor to perform a well-nigh impossible task and achieve musical or even musically-dramatic results. The performance of the purely instrumental movements of this Symphony was eloquent in understanding, expression and spirit; mysterious and dramatic in the opening allegro; riotously joyful and inspiring in the scherzo with fine delicacy in the details of the trio; poetic, deeply emotional in the wonderful adagio. Would that Beethoven nad written the finale without the introduction of voices, or if he thought that a chorus could express what instruments could not, had regarded the limitations of human voices.

That the singers at the first performance rebelled against Beethoven's cruelty is an old story—and what soprano today could hope to rival Mme. Sontag famous as singer and musician?

Is it blasphemy to say that the music given to the solo singers is for the most part ugly and inexpressive of the text? Mr. Gange declaimed vigorously his opening recitative; Mme. Nadworney with a fine, rich voice, gave the audience the desire to hear her in music, not in vocal contortions.

And the chorus. There were one or two great moments—by the permission of Beethoven. For the rest of the time there was choppy, hurried hurling out of necessarily unmusical sounds; at times one was reminded of the noises coming from an irritated kennel. Now these singers have naturally good voices, at least the great majority of them are so blessed; they rehearsed diligently, no doubt, under their own conductors; they were probably as sure of their notes as was possible. It was Beethoven that handicapped them in their laudable endeavor.

And it is not sacrilegious to say that the music of this finale, except for one or two sublime moments, falls below that of the movements preceding. There is more frenzied joy in the scherzo; there is greater world-embracing humanity, a loftier, nobler spirit in the adagio. Better to leave the hall with the memory of that adagio than to depart with the vocal hurry-scurry and shouting of the final measures assailing ears and nerves.

Before the first symphony the orchestra played a portion of the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" in honor of Ferdinand Foch, field marshal of France (1852-1929).

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Tchaikovsky, overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (after Shakespeare), Hanson, "Nordic" symphony, E minor (conducted by the composer, first time in Boston); Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration."

FOCH TRIBUTE BY SYMPHONY

Funeral March Opens Program; Choral Clubs Sing

TRAV. MAR 30

As a tribute to the memory of Ferdinand Foch, field marshal of France, the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was performed at the beginning of yesterday's program, while orchestra and audience remained standing.

Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major was beautifully done. It swept the enraptured audience into a mood for the magnificent ninth symphony, with final chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy, which followed. This is probably one of Beethoven's most imposing contributions to music.

It is said that for years Beethoven cherished the dream of putting Schiller's Ode to music. When at last he succeeded in rich realization, he was overjoyed. He dedicated this symphony with chorus to Friedrich Wilhelm III, King of Prussia, and his gesture was graciously received and acknowledged in a flattering manner.

Excellent choral work was done yesterday by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society in the last movement when the Hymn To Joy was sung. The soloists were Ethyl Hayden, soprano; Devora Nadworney, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor; Fraser Ga[illegible] bass.

The concert will be repeated [illegible] evening.

NINTH SYMPHONY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Assist

"Eroica" Funeral March Performed In Memory of Marshal Foch

Globe Mar 30

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was the chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert, to be repeated tonight. The assisting chorus was drawn from the Harvard Glee and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The solo singers were Ethyl Hayden, soprano; Devora Nadworney, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone.

The concert began with a portion of the funeral march from the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, played in memory of Marshal Foch, with orchestra and audience standing. The First Symphony of Beethoven preceded the Ninth.

Mr Koussevitzky, by making the players stand when performing a piece in memory of a dead celebrity, incites the audience to rise likewise to its feet. His predecessors did not impart the same solmen character to these recurring memorial rites. When orchestra and audience remained seated, as they did before the Koussevitzky regime on such occasions, there were always many who failed to notice the little black-bordered slip in the programs, and applauded. But applause for a memorial piece would be as out of place as a musical review of its performance. Here, as in forbidding applause between movements of a symphony, Mr Koussevitzky has made a great and long-needed improvement in the conduct of the Symphony concerts.

Not since 1910 has the Ninth Symphony appeared on the programs of the regular subscription series, though there have been many extra concerts at which it has been heard. The difficulty is to find place on the stage for a chorus as well as the orchestra. For choral concerts in Symphony Hall the stage is usually extended and a number of rows of seats removed. But this cannot be done in the subscription series, with every seat sold for the season.

Yesterday, room was made on the stage for a chorus that seemingly numbered about 150 singers. The orchestra sat on one level, instead of in the usual tiers. The chorus was spread about the rear and side of the stage. Everyone was crowded, but the musical forces needed for the Ninth Symphony were all there.

Mr Koussevitzky's individual and personal interpretation of the Choral Symphony is now so familiar to Boston audiences as not to call for extended comment. Yesterday's performance was less dramatic, less compelling than the one last November at a pension fund concert which stirred a very large audience to prolonged applause. Yet it was curious that there was not more display of enthusiasm at the end. Most of the audience gathered up their belongings and hurried from the hall, as though intent on catching trains for suburbs, stopping only for one or two half-hearted hand claps. Some remained to clap loudly and long.

The chorus of college students again sang their taxing measures as though the difficulties of the music did not exist. The soprano, in particular, seemed able to go on holding high notes indefinitely. All that the conductor exacted of them he received in full measure. One felt that the reserve power of this chorus was immeasurable. Usually in this choral finale the singers sound laboring, almost breathless, as the four professional soloists did yesterday in their quartet.

It ought to be possible to assemble a really first quartet of soloists for the Ninth Symphony, something not achieved here in the past 20 years. It would also be appreciated by some in the audience if the translation of Schiller's Ode to Joy printed in the program were the same as the one used by the singers, and not, as yesterday, a different version.

To play the First Symphony with the Ninth is to put the music of the young Beethoven, still obviously influenced by his predecessors, to the cruel test of comparison with the masterpiece of his mature years. Yet if one compares this early symphony with the early work of other geniuses, such as Wagner's "Rienzi" or the now forgotten early work of Mozart and Haydn, or the early piano sonatas of Brahms, also forgotten, save for the one in F minor, opus 5, one's respect for Beethoven's youthful efforts grows.

The First Symphony has points in common with Haydn and Mozart. It is obviously inferior to Mozart's "Jupiter," which the first movement recalls, and to Mozart's G minor, of which there are suggestions in the slow movement. But well played by a small orchestra, as it was yesterday, this little Beethoven symphony has a charm, a freshness, a distinction of its own, with not a few touches forecasting the greater works to follow.

Next week's program includes Tchaikowsky's "Romeo ond Juliet" overture; Howard Hanson's "Nordic Symphony," to be conducted by the composer, and Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung."

P. R.

119

Post Mar. 30

BEETHOVEN HOUR WITH SYMPHONY

First and Ninth Given as Good Friday Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Holding with the German tradition that Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies make an orchestral programme appropriate to Good Friday, Mr. Koussevitzky has coupled those works on the programme of this week's pair of Symphony Concerts. As in other recent performances the chorus for the final movement of the Ninth Symphony was recruited from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

TRIBUTE TO FOCH

Out of respect to Marshal Foch yesterday's concert began with a performance of the first portion of the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, with orchestra and audience standing.

Not since 1910 has Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in its entirety been heard at the regular subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Subsequent performances of the piece have been confined to special concerts of one sort or another. It may be argued, indeed, that to make of the Ninth Symphony a repertory piece is to run the risk of routine performance. Not that the performance of yesterday was that; nevertheless it was possible to miss in that performance, excellent as it was in so many respects, the electric quality, the rare enthusiasm and high elation present in performances under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction at Pension Fund Concerts and in the cycle of Symphonies that made the Beethoven Centenary.

That the choral Finale made less impression yesterday is readily attributable to the fact that, since an enlarged stage could not be used without dispossessing a considerable company of subscribers, the chorus yesterday was of necessity smaller than that to which we have become accustomed. And with immature voices, especially among the sopranos and contraltos, only through numbers may the requisite volume of tone be attained.

The solo singers yesterday, and Beethoven has set them anything but a grateful task, were Ethel Hayden, Devora Nadworney, Charles Stratton and Fraser Gange. At times these four gave excellent account of themselves. In particular was Mr. Stratton successful with the treatment of his solo in the March-like section, wherein he caught admirably the note of exultation. But the exceedingly difficult quartet toward the end of the movement came off not so well.

Unheard here since the Beethoven Centenary aforementioned, Beethoven's First Symphony, so far removed in spirit and in substance from the mighty Ninth, received yesterday an admirable performance. As before Mr. Koussevitzky reduced the number of strings, thus permitting the wind instruments to sound through, and attaining a balance closer to Beethoven's intentions than would be possible were the entire string choir of the present Boston Symphony to be used. Deserving of especial admiration was the virtuoso playing yesterday of the final movement. For all its outward simplicities Beethoven's First Symphony may here prove an exacting test of orchestral proficiency.

120

Music Notes and Comment

Howard Hanson, a young American composer associated with the Eastman School, Rochester, N Y, will conduct at this week's Symphony concerts his "Nordic Symphony;" another proof of Mr Koussevitzky's wish to give American composers a hearing. Mr Koussevitsky will conduct the rest of the concerts on Friday and Saturday. The Tuesday program is drawn this time from Wagner and Franck, representing the romantic music of the latter part of the 19th century. The last program in this series represented the earlier romantic writers, Schubert, Schumann and Berlioz.

ABOUT SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The Symphony programs of series of subscription concerts like those offered by the Boston Symphony and People's Orchestras offer a perennial topic for discussion. No conductor seems able to choose groups of numbers that will please all tastes. Mr Koussevitzky, in particular, often makes selections that drive subscribers to write to the newspapers to complain that he gives too much modern music, too many symphonies, too many or too few repetitions of new works, particularly by American composers, too heavy or too light programs.

The variety of complaints is probably evidence that the programs, on the whole, include all types of music that should be offered. Too few people really enjoy all types of music, old and modern, light and serious.

Mr Koussevitzky's devotion to modern music is well known, and a frequent source of complaint to conservative listeners, some of whom do not wish to hear any music more recent than that of Tchaikovsky or Brahms.

What should be the rule about putting modern pieces on the Symphony programs? Mr Koussevitzky has more than once said that he intends to give one modern piece at each Boston Symphony concert. The programs for the five seasons he has served as conductor here prove that he has in the main adhered to this idea. Nearly always there is at least one piece by a living composer, or by someone like Debussy, whose music is definitely of the 20th rather than the 19th century.

There should always be one modern piece on the Symphony program. Otherwise how are the audiences to keep up-to-date, to learn to enjoy the best music of our own day? It is true that perhaps nine out of 10 of the new pieces performed at these concerts drop from the repertory after a single performance.

It is true that the pieces played once and then left to gather dust on the library shelves are most of them not to be compared in musical value with the classics that have always formed the bulk of the repertory. But how is the repertory to be increased if new pieces are not tried out?

Selecting Novelties

Sometimes Mr Koussevitzky performs pieces that seem obviously futile. But in most cases only the performance of new compositions can show whether or not they are likely to interest audiences. The interest of the enthusiastic minority that keeps an eager curiosity about new music is of vital importance to the progress of the art of music.

Mr Koussevitzky's selection of new pieces tends to favor French, Russian and American composers to the exclusion of German, English and Italian. He neglects Schoenberg and Holst and Pizzetti, to mention only a few names, and performs the work of lesser men like Dukelsky and Janin. His novelties are chosen less impartially than those of Mr Monteux or Dr Muck among his predecessors. But within th range of his sympathies and knowledge he chooses novelties, many of which are apparently of permanent value, such as, for instance, "Pacific 231."

When as sometimes happens more than one modern piece is on the program there is just cause for complaint. It is too hard to listen intelligently to new music in strange idioms for it to be pleasurable to hear a series of modernist works at a single concert.

Another cause of complaint is this season the repetition of works like Bloch's "America," given at two of the 24 pairs of concerts. This same work was repeated by Mr Stock in Chicago. The two conductors unquestionably believe it to be very important. So believing, they are right to repeat it, although many, including the present writer, do not agree with their estimate of Bloch's rhapsody.

Mr Koussevitzky, when he first came, used to give each season several programs of short pieces with no symphony or other long work on them. This was an objectionable idea, tending to reduce the concerts to "high-brow pops." Now that he has abandoned it, Mr Koussevitzky seems in some danger of going to the opposite extreme of giving programs that are too heavy.

Last week and the week before the Symphony programs contained two symphonies and nothing else.

Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies make an unobjectionable unified program. Both works are familiar from childhood to the subscribers. Both are masterpieces. But to pair the unfamiliar symphonies of Hill and Bruckner is to risk wearying the audience with too much intricate music hard to follow.

Repeating Classics

Another idea is that symphony programs should always be unified by choosing similar or contrasted works grouped to illustrate an idea or depict a mood. Mr Koussevitzky has seldom offered unified programs. His are usually miscellanies chosen rather with reference to getting in everything that ought to be heard during a season than to securing unified programs for single concerts.

Dr Muck used to devote part of each Summer to planning and studying the programs for the next season. When he came back to Boston in the Fall he brought with him the completed programs for the season, which were later changed only in case of necessity. It does not appear that Mr Koussevitzky's program-making is as systematic.

Instead of studying and preparing all his scores before the season begins he is often in doubt until after rehearsing a number whether he will perform it at all. Changes in the programs are frequent, sometimes made too late to permit of altering the program notes, often too late to suit the convenience of the many subscribers who try to study the music they are going to hear. On this rather haphazard system it is plainly impossible to make all programs unified.

The final summaries at the end of each season of Mr Koussevitzky's conductorship have shown a fair division between classic and modern works, with no marked excess of moderns. The complaints come about largely because the modern works are not judiciously scattered, and because the classics are not repeated year after year on any particular system.

We may hear all the Brahms symphonies in a single season, for example, and wait five years for Mozart's "Jupiter." Such standard symphonies should each be played in every other season, so that one goes the round of the great classic symphonies in the course of two years. This Dr Muck and his predecessors did. Since the war it has not been done as a matter of routine, so that some classics have been overlooked, and others overplayed.

All in all, however, there is not much fault to be found with Mr Koussevitzky's programs. He may group pieces injudiciously, thus boring or annoying all of his subscribers for a single concert. But, taking each season as a whole, he offers a wide variety of old and new music, chosen with a reasonable amount of regard both for conservative and for modernist taste.

It is, finally, especially to his credit that Mr Koussevitzky does not neglect American music, but plays a good deal of it, ranging from such conservative elders as Chadwick to such moderns as Copland and Sessions.

POST MAR 31

Pops Will Start in on May Day--- Musical Notes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

May Day is to be the occasion, this year, of the opening of the Pops. Although the final Symphony Concerts of the season fall on April 26 and 27, the opening night of the Pops will be deferred from the following Monday to Wednesday evening, May 1. Alfredo Casella will, for the third season, be the conductor of an orchestra 80 strong. And it may not be amiss to remind those who, yearning to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are suggesting concerts in the vast spaces of the Boston Garden, that in one more month a substantial portion of that orchestra, under a conductor of international reputation, may be heard nightly in its own auditorium at a price that is surely far from exorbitant, while Mr. Casella's programmes are by no means lacking in worth while music.

* * * *

Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester and American composer not unknown to audiences of orchestral concerts, will himself conduct his Nordic Symphony at the Symphony Concerts of this week. The work received its premiere in New York during the earlier part of the present season.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 20 1929

Boston Symphony

The season's third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in the Albee Theatre consisted of Bloch's "America," an Epic Rhapsody; for the music of the "Unfinished" Symphony and the Terpsichorean travesty of Ravel served merely to arouse expectations and stimulate interest—to warm up the ear for the reception of newer and more significant guests. The program:

Schubert .....
Symphony in B-minor ("Unfinished")
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
Ravel .....
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem

Bloch .....
"America," an Epic Rhapsody in Three parts
I. Poco lento (....-1620)
The Soil—The Indians—(England)—The Mayflower
The Landing of the Pilgrims
II. Allegretto (1861-1865)
Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow
III. Allegro con spirito (1926-....)
The Present—The Future

The greatest rhapsody the world ever saw, Homer wrote on a theme as narrow as "The Wrath of Achilles;" and this narrow theme furnished material enough for 24 books. Ernest Bloch's "America," in three movements, discovers a new world, peoples it, develops it, tears it with civil war and internal discord, shreds it with the sharp cacophony of a sound-mad age, synthetizes it with a hymn, and then turns it over to Faith and Hope, who are to be the guardians of its future.

The composer dedicated his composition to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, which may account in a measure for its inequality. If it suggests in places quite strongly the sentiment, the poise and the logic of the great liberator, all too often it wallows in the reek of a frothy, flamboyant Whitmania at its very worst—which is bad enough. There is, to be sure, a nexus, a sort of unity—the "Anthem Theme," that serves its purpose well. It is the golden cord on which the composer suspends quite carefully his garlands of various hues and sometimes dubious perfumes, the various "calls" being on occasion surprisingly pungent.

The Musical Reminiscences

The various musical reminiscences—folk songs, old tunes, hymn tunes, national airs, etc., are clearly overdone; or else, if it was the purpose to make that sort of music really significant, a greater variety should have been introduced, to give the whole country a chance, calling for the services of a sort of rustic Polyhymnia, or maid of all kinds and conditions of song.

More of the old dance tunes might have been utilized —"Money Musk," "Arkansas Traveller," "Turkey in the Straw," "Billy in the Low Grounds," "The Ring-Tailed Roarer," or any of what the old timer under the inspiration of Apple Jack would have called "hell benders." Such music added to the merriment and hilarity that had a week-end vogue in the old days over wide and extensive territory; and even today it sometimes makes itself heard from under the cryptic foliage of the jazz flower, poison ivy, that is steadily choking to death the true ivy as well as the bay and the laurel and the myrtle and other weeds of the muses.

Some philosopher has said that if he could make a nation's songs he cared little who made the laws. America's songs were not written by such a philosopher; they are a hap-hazard, hit and miss lot, deserving little place in a great symphony such as Mr. Bloch has shown by his best passages that he can write. The Marseillaise and the Russian hymn come face to face in Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812," and fight until the French song is exterminated; and Brahms interpolated student songs into his "Festival Overture;" but the composers of these two numbers did not claim for them the profound national significance that Mr. Bloch claims for "America."

He outlines the nation's birth, growth, struggles, aims and ideals, and then himself writes a national song of songs to be its inspiration and its support. It may be that some time a national anthem may be written under such conditions, in the heat of the composition of a more extensive work; but it is not very probable.

Outdoing the Conception.

Mr. Bloch's music is far superior to the fabric of his dream of the future. It is rich in texture, its fibre is well knit and strong, its sheen is as multi-colored as the rainbow, and its movement is often as sinuous as a serpent. But while chanting the demagogue optimism of Whitman he is often so carried away by the torrents of his verbiage that he cannot, for all his knowledge of music and his skill in composition, save himself from the insignificant and the ridiculous ideas that often seem to exude from the pages of that "magnificent Idler."

Dr. Koussevitzky played the composition with true loving kindness, and doubtless his interpretation added much to its intrinsic worth. If the composer had called the first movement the voyage of the Mayflower, he would have hit close to the mark. The ground swell, the big clouds, the sea gulls, fair weather, the dolphins, were all there, followed by lovely viola effects, suggesting music. Perhaps one of the most striking passages in the composition was the "Old Hundred" phrase followed immediately by the challenge of the Indian pipe.

Disaster and desolation seemed to be the significance of the English horn at the opening of the second movement. The rapid succession of song after song was interesting principally because of the instrumentation. "Pop goes the weasel" was tame because Dr. Koussevitzky evidently had never heard it played with its pristine "pop" by a country fiddler at a cross-road store. But the discord of preparations for war was magnificently done—one of the finest passages in the whole composition. The spirit of interminable desolation following the quartet was also extremely realistic.

Superlative Jazz

The jazz playing in the third movement would have made Mr. Whiteman green with envy. Such stuff seems fated to be the end of every orchestra's desire. Mr. Bloch did more than make a parody, he made innovations and improvements, from which jazz will doubtless profit. The Boston Symphony showed itself past master at playing the stuff; but then it has played a lot of dance music of late.

"The anthem, pure and simple, was sounded proudly, the people singing with deep fervor and enthusiasm." The chorus, after its long wait in the aisles filled the hall with its volume, all the more easily because it was between the audience and the orchestra, somewhat unusual position.

Ravel's "Waltz" was particularly interesting as a piece of ultra-sophistication. We have been told that it suggested whirling clouds through which the dancers at a court ball could be seen; but the unsophisticated might readily hear in it the sound of mill wheels, frogs, early morning noises from the canebrake and animals waiting for their breakfast. The composer gives rein to a cynical satisfaction at being able to outdo the emotionalists with his strange sounds and joyous rhythms, all struggling to be born. The close was suggestive of the ignobile vulgus, senselessly shouting and sweating and pushing itself along.

The Schubert Symphony was remarkable for the finish of its performance. Perhaps the extreme pianissimo of the introduction robbed it of its vigor, as it did the song of the 'cellos later; and in the second movement there was some angular and seemingly unnecessary bowing in the violin section, but the passionless beauty of the performance as a whole was quite unusual.

Dr. Koussevitzky's work was extremely gratifying to the audience, which overflo aga
n

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
MAR 2 - 1929

VIENNESE CONDUCTOR TO GIVE CONCERT IN CARNEGIE HALL

Clemens Krauss Latest of Notable Foreign Musicians to Visit America—Will Direct Philadelphia Orchestra.

By PITTS SANBORN

STILL the conductors come a-visiting. Clemens Krauss, the latest of the line to reach our shores, will be observed with close interest.

He is to direct in Philadelphia four pairs of concerts for the Philadelphia Orchestra and also in New York the Carnegie Hall concert of that organization on March 19.

He was born in Vienna in 1893, is said to look like a torero, and seems to be an authentic kinsman of the House of Hapsburg. He has filled important conductorial posts at Vienna and at Frankfurt-on-the-Main and soon will return to Vienna to become director of the State Opera. The New York program of this promising batonist has not yet been divulged.

THE current Philadelphian guest, Eugene Goossens, is to guide next Tuesday evening's Carnegie Hall concert of the Quaker Band. The Belgo-British musician is by no means unfamiliar to local audiences, whether as conductor or as composer. At present his steady job is the leadership of the Rochester Philharmonic.

The program which he will offer on Tuesday includes the fourth symphony of Brahms, three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," a suite from "The Triumph of Neptune" by Lord Berners, and the orchestral version, by Alfred Casella, of Balakireff's "Islamey."

The Berners music was recently played in Philadelphia for the first time in this country. "The Triumph of Neptune," from which it is taken, is described as "an English pantomime in ten tableaux."

It was produced in London by the Diaghleff Russian Ballet on December 3, 1926, with Mr. Goosens conducting. Lord Berners (Gerald Hugh Tyrwhitt) is a diplomat as well as a composer. When he was attached to the British Embassy in Rome he studied with Casella, and he has also studied with Stravinsky.

ARTURO TOSCANINI and the Philharmonic Symphony will go on tour after the Carnegie Hall concert of next Sunday afternoon, appearing in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Rochester and Pittsburgh. On their return to New York Sunday, March 10, they will give another Carnegie Hall matinee of Mozart's "Haffner" symphony, Respighi's "Roman Festivals," Debussy's "Iberia" and Wagner's "Tannhäeusser" overture.

Ernest Schelling is to be the soloist of the concerts of March 14 and 15, playing the piano part in his own "Impressions of an Artist's Life."

FREDERICK THE GREAT, whose musical compositions include several orchestral scores as well as pieces for the flute, will be represented by a symphony on the program which Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to present at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 9.

The symphony in question is the royal gentleman's third, for two two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, in addition to strings, though its three fellows are written for strings only.

It seems that this symphony of the Prussian King is the only one of his four which was not substantially altered by Quantz, the King's master of the flute. The work was performed at Berlin on May 4, 1928, and was introduced to this country at Boston yesterday.

Symphony by Sibelius.

ON the same program with this product of royal genius will be the comparatively unfamiliar third symphony of Sibelius and the tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," of Richard Strauss.

The preceding Carnegie Hall concert of the Bostonians on Thursday evening will be devoted to Arthur Foote's E minor suite for strings, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (in the orchestral version of Maurice Ravel).

AMUSEMENTS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EVE. TRIBUNE
MAR 1 - 1929

New York Writer Eulogizes the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The following tribute to the Boston Symphony orchestra written by Richard L. Stokes, appeared in a recent issue of the New York Evening World:

"With at least equal and presumably superior financial resources, the Philharmonic Symphony has functioned this season like a willing subordinate of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as it did in previous years—save for Mr. Toscanini's transfigurations—in relation to the Philadelphia orchestra before Mr. Stokowski's indisposition.

"This decline into a second-rate status on the part of the single rcohesra of the greatest American city may be attributed unhesitatingly, I think, to the vicious guest-conductor system which has fastened itself upon the enterprise. The motive, of course, is the sale of tickets, to a populace notoriously fickle and greedy of novelty. But any business that changed its principal executive six times in as many months would be regarded as on the thoroughfare of insolvency. Similarly, an orchestra tossed in giddy succession from one conductor to another must lose its continuity as an organism.

"That the Boston orchestra is now the reigning symphonic body of the east is an assertion that will not be contraverted. Save for the brief respites, it passes the entire season under the rule of on ladr. The Philadelphia Symphony, until last year, was justly known as the greatest orchestra in the world. It was then under the autocratic and uninterrupted sway of Mr. Stokowski. Its decline began when it, too, was subjected to guest conductors. The Chicago Symphony orchestra, one of the country's prime ensembles, has attained that distinction under the constant direction of Frederick Stock. The moral appears too obvious to require elaboration."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 3 - 1929

Programs This Week Of Boston Orchestra

Programs in New York this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky:

Saturday Afternoon

Suite in E Minor for Strings..Foote
"Also Sprach Zarathustra"..Strauss
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky

Thursday Evening

Symphony.....Frederick the Great
Symphony No. 5.....Sibelius
"Also Sprach Zarathustra"..Strauss

Koussevitzky to Revive Sibelius

Symphony by Frederick the Great Listed for Saturday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 7 and 9.

On the first program Serge Koussevitzy has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the suite of descriptive piano pieces arranged for orchestra especially for this conductor by Maurice Ravel. At the Thursday evening concert Mr. Koussevitzky also will play the Suite for String Orchestra, in E Minor, by Arthur Foote, the American composer, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also Spake Zarathustra."

At the Saturday afternoon concert, Mr. Koussevitzky will revive the third symphony of Sibelius. This symphony, practically unknown in America, was revived in Boston by Koussevitzky on Nov. 9 and 10 and repeated there Dec. 28 and 29. Another novelty will be the third symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia. This eighteenth century piece had its first American performance in Boston last Friday and Saturday.

Frederick Wrote Four Symphonies

Frederick the Great wrote a number of orchestral scores as well as compositions for the flute. Among these were four symphonies. The third, which Koussevitzky is to play here, is the only one of these which is not for strings only. It is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, in addition to strings. This is the only symphony which was not substantially changed by Quantz, the King's master of the flute. The symphony was performed in Berlin May 4, 1928. It had its first American performances in Boston, in Symphony Hall, on Friday and Saturday, March 1 and 2.

The third symphony of Sibelius, although well known in Europe, is unfamiliar in this country, records on hand showing only one performance previous to this season, at a New York concert of the Russian Symphony Society, Modest Altschuler, conductor, Jan. 16, 1906. Two previous conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra planned to perform the score, and even rehearsed it, but withdrew it without a public performance. Koussevitzky performed the symphony at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Nov. 9 and 10, and repeated the work on Dec. 28 and 29.

Four Composers Transcribed Moussorgsky's "Pictures"

Moussorgsky's piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition," has been transcribed for orchestra by four composers—Toushmalov in 1891, and in recent years Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi and Maurice Ravel. Ravel's orchestration was performed in Paris by Koussevitzky, and in America in this conductor's first season here.

When Moussorgsky wrote his "Tableaux d'une Exposition" in memory of his painter friend, Victor Hartmann, the composer described in these piano pieces his impressions of the following pictures at a posthumous exhibition of the artist's work. The subtitles are: "Promenade," "Gnomus," "Tuileries," "Bydlo," "Ballet des Poussins dans leur coques," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," "Catacombs," and "La Cabane sur des paites de Poule" and "La Grands Porte de Kiev."

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 3 - 1929

A Boston Symphony program includes [illegible] attributed to Frederick the Great. Not to be confused, of course, with Alexander the Great and his ragtime band.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 2 - 1929

WITH the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, led by Arturo Toscanini, on tour next week, the Boston, Philadelphia and Curtis Institute Orchestras will come to town. Before departing, the local orchestra will give a concert tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall, giving the same program as yesterday and Thursday, consisting of the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," Beethoven's Second Symphony, Pizetti's "Concerto dell 'Estate" and Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The last pair of concerts but one this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition," Arthur Foote's Suite for string orchestra in E minor and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra," will be the first program. Saturday; Frederick the Great's Symphony in D major, Sibelius's Third Symphony and "Also Sprach Zarathustra" will be played.

Eugene Goossens will direct the Philadelphia Orchestra Tuesday evening in Carnegie Hall and will offer a program containing the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat"; a Suite from "The Triumph of Neptune" by Lord Bernays and "Islamey" by Balakiron-Casella. The Bernays Suite is from an English pantomime in ten scenes produced in 1926 in London by the Diaghileff Ballet. Goossens conducted the orchestra on that occasion.

The Curtis Institute of Music Orchestra, composed of 100 students augmented by sixteen professionals, six of whom are faculty members in woodwind, brass and double-bass, will be heard in concert Friday evening in Carnegie Hall. The program will consist of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Franck's Symphony in D minor, Lalo's 'cello concerto in D minor, with Tibor de Machula as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "La Grand Paque Russe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
MAR [illegible] 1929

Ernest Bloch's "America."

"AMERICA," Ernest Bloch's "epic rhapsody," the new prize-winning composition which has been played in New York and Boston with great success, will be brought to Washington by Serge Koussevitzky when the Russian conductor comes here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give his second concert of the season in Poli's Theater Wednesday afternoon.

The performance of "America" will quite fittingly take place just after the inauguration. Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges in the contest in which the score won. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities last December.

Bloch divides his rhapsody into three parts, the first depicting the America of the Indians and early Puritan settlers. The second movement portrays the old South, with its gay romance and the tragedy and sorrow brought by the Civil War. The last movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," sets forth our own jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the composition, magnificently prepared, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. The culminating hymn will be sung by the National Capital Oratorio Association, Dr. Albert W. Harned, director.

One other score stands upon Koussevitzky's program—Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Moussorgsky's score is a vivid and descriptive piano concerto, in which he characterizes a series of pictures in an exhibition by his artist friend, Hartman. This suite has been orchestrated by three different composers, but Ravel's [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
MAR 2 - 1929

Koussevitzky in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will play in Brooklyn on Friday evening, March 8, the following programme:

Little Symphony (Frederick II, King of Prussia), Concerto in D minor, for Violin with Orchestra (Sibelius), Fifth Symphony (Tschaikowsky). Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

Frederick the Great composed his little symphony in 1743 and although he wrote others too, this score was not corrected by his music and flute master, Johann Joachim Quantz, but left exactly as it was written. Frederick, whose proficiency as flute virtuoso is historical, uses two flutes in his symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
(1) MAR 2 1929

New York Writer Eulogizes the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The following tribute to the Boston Symphony orchestra written by Richard L. Stokes, appeared in a recent issue of the New York Evening World:

"With at least equal and presumably superior financial resources, the Philharmonic Symphony has functioned this season like a willing subordinate of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as it did in previous years—save for Mr. Toscanini's transfigurations—in relation to the Philadelphia orchestra before Mr. Stokowski's indisposition.

"This decline into a second-rate status on the part of the single rcohesra of the greatest American city may be attributed unhesitatingly, I think, to the vicious guest-conductor system which has fastened itself upon the enterprise. The motive, of course, is the sale of tickets, to a populace notoriously fickle and greedy of novelty. But any business that changed its principal executive six times in as many months would be regarded as on the thoroughfare of insolvency. Similarly, an orchestra tossed in giddy succession from one conductor to another must lose its continuity as an organism.

"That the Boston orchestra is now the reigning symphonic body of the east is an assertion that will not be contraverted. Save for the brief respites, it passes the entire season under the rule of on ladr. The Philadelphia Symphony, until last year, was justly known as the greatest orchestra in the world. It was then under the autocratic and uninterrupted sway of Mr. Stokowski. Its decline began when it, too, was subjected to guest conductors. The Chicago Symphony orchestra, one of the country's prime ensembles, has attained that distinction under the constant direction of Frederick Stock. The moral appears too obvious to require elaboration."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
MAR 2 - 1929

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 7 and 9.

On the Thursday Serge Koussevitzky has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"—the suite of descriptive piano pieces which have been arranged for orchestra especially by this conductor by Maurice Ravel—Suite in E minor for string orchestra by Arthur Foote, and Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

At the Saturday afternoon concert "Also Sprach Zarathustra" will be repeated. Koussevitzky will revive the Third Symphony of Sibelius. This symphony, practically unknown in America, was revived in Boston by Koussevitzky in November. Another novelty will be the Third Symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia. This eighteenth century piece had its first American performance in Boston a few days ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 3 - 1929

Special interest attaches to two of the three numbers that will be played at the concert of Boston Symphony in the Academy of Music next Friday evening—the last visit but one of this organization to Brooklyn this season. Serge Koussewitzky will open the program with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, which he gave its first American performances in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The Eighteenth Century monarch, known to have been a skilled flutist, writes two flute parts into this score, giving them prominence in the slow movement. The Symphony was revived in Berlin last May.

As soloist of the evening, Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the seldom heard Violin Concerto of Sibelius. The concert will conclude with Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor.

* * *

Goossens and Koussevitzky To Conduct Here This Week

Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, after repeating the program first offered last Thursday and Friday this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, will spend this week on tour, visiting Philadelphia to-morrow, Washington Tuesday, Baltimore Wednesday, Rochester Thursday and Pittsburgh Friday and Saturday. Returning, the orchestra will repeat next Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Hall Mr. Toscanini's first program of the season, consisting of Mozart's "Haffner" symphony, Respighi's "Feste Romane," Debussy's "Iberia" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist of the Carnegie Hall concerts of Thursday night and Friday afternoon, March 14 and 15, playing the piano parts of his "Impressions of an Artist's Life." The following morning he will conduct the last of this season's children's concerts, at which the prize winners for the best note books will be announced and a program played of numbers chosen by ballot.

Despite the Philharmonic-Symphony's absence, we will not have a shortage of orchestral music this week, as the Philadelphia Orchestra gives its seventh Carnegie Hall concert of the season Tuesday night, and George Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony pay their fourth New York visit of 1928-'29 in the latter part of the week. The orchestra of the Curtis Institute of Music, in Philadelphia, also will contribute to the week's concert quota, making its New York debut at Carnegie Hall next Friday evening.

Eugene Goossens, regular conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, will conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra next Tuesday, presenting among more familiar numbers the first New York performance of Lord Berners's suite from "The Triumph of Neptune," which had its American premiere last week in Philadelphia. The original Berners ballet from which the suite is drawn, a pantomime in ten tableaux, was produced in London by the Diaghileff ballet on December 3, 1926, with Mr. Goossens conducting. Lord Berners (Gerald Hugh Tyrwhitt, ninth Baron Berners) is both a musician and a diplomat, and studied with Casella while attached to the British Embassy in Rome. He also [illegible] from Stravinsky.

Mr. Koussevitzky has made some changes in the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall programs announced last week. As the list now stands, next Thursday night's program begins with the E major suite for strings, Op. 63, of Arthur Foote (1853-) a prominent member of the elder generation of Boston musicians. The other numbers will be Strauss's "Thus spake Zarathustra" and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano suite "Pictures at an Exhibition," which had its premiere under Mr. Koussevitzky at Paris in 1926.

Saturday afternoon's program will open with the third of the four symphonies of Frederick the Great (King Frederick II of Prussia, 1740-1786). This work of the noted Prussian monarch, who is more generally known as a warrior than a composer, is the only one of the symphonies not for strings alone and the only one not substantially revised by Quantz, the King's flute teacher. The symphony was played in Berlin on May 4, 1928, and introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony in Boston last week.

The next number is the third symphony of Jan Sibelius, in C major (1907). The Boston Symphony's management, having looked up the records, reports that the only American performance of the symphony prior to this season was given by the Russian Symphony under Modeste Altschuler at Carnegie Hall on January 16, 1908. Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony planned to play the work and even rehearsed it, but withdrew it without public performances. Mr. Koussevitzky gave it in Boston in two pairs of concerts earlier this season, November 9-10, December 28-29. The Strauss tone-poem will close the program.

Friday night's Brooklyn program will include the Sibelius violin concerto with Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, soloist.

N.Y. HER. & TRI.
MAR 3.1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 3 - 1929

In Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of New York concerts. Mr. Koussewitsky, who will conduct, has arranged the following programs:

Thursday evening:

Foote.....Suite in E Minor for strings
Strauss.....Also Sprach Zarathustra
Moussorgsky.....Pictures at an Exhibition

Saturday afternoon:

Frederick the Great.....Symphony
Sibelius.....Third Symphony
Strauss.....Also Sprach Zarathustra

Both the Foote Suite and the Symphony by Frederick the Great will have their first New York performances at these concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 3 - 1929

Answer, Echo—

CLEMENT KRAUSS of Vienna and Frankfurt-am-Main arrived in town last Wednesday. * * * Among his comments was none on the skyline. * * * Countrymen and colleagues of Herr Krauss predict for him a series of triumphs as guest-conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. His figure, they tell us, will be his fortune. * * * And what's this we hear of cerulean blood flowing in his veins? * * * Herr Krauss' hair is graying, and he has become somewhat broader of recent years, but his waistline—more important to a conductor than a sense of rhythm—is still elegant enough to rival Mr. Koussevitsky's profile on the podium. * * * And speaking of conductors, what do we hear concerning the indefatigable Georges Zaslawsky! Little short of the rumor that he is busy these days securing the cash and the credit for the resumption of Beethoven Symphony activities. * * * Nothing daunted by this fall's debacle, Mr. Zaslawsky still believes himself a great conductor. Maybe he is. Confidence, we read, is an indication of talent.

* * *

The Opera House these days is not as fertile in gossip as it might be. We might tell you that Mme. Karin Branzell is to sing Kundry in a Philadelphia performance of "Parsifal," and that Lauritz Melchior will do his first "Tristan und Isolde" in the same city, under Metropolitan auspices. Or we might ask, Where is Marion Talley? Should we remind you that it was in The Eagle you read last winter that the wonder child of Kansas City would not be re-engaged, except possibly for a very few "guest" appearances? The prophecy, denied at the time, seems to have come true. * * * Six weeks of the season remain and no sign of Marion. * * * Courage, friend! She will sing either "Rigoletto" or "Mignon" on the 11th of April. * * * Which brings to mind the strange ways of the Met. One of the musical papers last winter congratulated Marie Sundelius on her "11th and best" season with Mr. Gatti-Casazza's company. The fact was that Mme. Sundelius had not appeared in opera at the Metropolitan for a number of years. * * * There will be no "Fidelio" and no "Verkaufte Braut" this season. The loss of the former should break no hearts, but Smetana's charming musical comedy was one of the brightest jewels in New York's operatic crown.

* * *

Both Mr. Stokowski and his Philadelphians and Mr. Koussewitsky and his Bostonians are recording for a phonograph company, as you know. Well, Mr. Koussewitsky had it much on his mind to do Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony until Mr. Stokowski was apprised of his design, and without asking anyone's advice promptly recorded that opus himself. * * * So at least runs the tale, though for its accuracy we are the last to vouch. * * * Still speaking of conductors, we hear that Toscanini is much upset over the profile written of him by Samuel Chotzinoff and duly published in the New Yorker. * * * Mr. Toscanini believes that Samuel gave him too neurasthenic a character.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 3 - 1929

Programs This Week Of Boston Orchestra

Programs in New York this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky:

Saturday Afternoon

Suite in E Minor for Strings..Foote
"Also Sprach Zarathustra"..Strauss
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky

Thursday Evening

Symphony.....Frederick the Great
Symphony No. 3.....Sibelius
"Also Sprach Zarathustra"..Strauss

Koussevitzky to Revive Sibelius

Symphony by Frederick the Great Listed for Saturday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 7 and 9.

On the first program Serge Koussevitzy has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the suite of descriptive piano pieces arranged for orchestra especially for this conductor by Maurice Ravel. At the Thursday evening concert Mr. Koussevitzky also will play the Suite for String Orchestra, in E Minor, by Arthur Foote, the American composer, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also Spake Zarathustra."

At the Saturday afternoon concert, Mr. Koussevitzky will revive the third symphony of Sibelius. This symphony, practically unknown in America, was revived in Boston by Koussevitzky on Nov. 9 and 10 and repeated there Dec. 28 and 29. Another novelty will be the third symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia. This eighteenth century piece had its first American performance in Boston last Friday and Saturday.

Frederick Wrote Four Symphonies

Frederick the Great wrote a number of orchestral scores as well as compositions for the flute. Among these were four symphonies. The third, which Koussevitzky is to play here, is the only one of these which is not for strings only. It is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, in addition to strings. This is the only symphony which was not substantially changed by Quantz, the King's master of the flute. The symphony was performed in Berlin May 4, 1928. It had its first American performances in Boston, in Symphony Hall, on Friday and Saturday, March 1 and 2.

The third symphony of Sibelius, although well known in Europe, is unfamiliar in this country, records on hand showing only one performance previous to this season, at a New York concert of the Russian Symphony Society, Modest Altschuler, conductor, Jan. 16, 1908. Two previous conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra planned to perform the score, and even rehearsed it, but withdrew it without a public performance. Koussevitzky performed the symphony at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Nov. 9 and 10, and repeated the work on Dec. 28 and 29.

Four Composers Transcribed Moussorgsky's "Pictures"

Moussorgsky's piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition," has been transcribed for orchestra by four composers—Toushmalov in 1891, and in recent years Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi and Maurice Ravel. Ravel's orchestration was performed in Paris by Koussevitzky, and in America in this conductor's first season here.

When Moussorgsky wrote his "Tableaux d'une Exposition" in memory of his painter friend, Victor Hartmann, the composer described in these piano pieces his impressions of the following pictures at a posthumous exhibition of the artist's work. The subtitles are: "Promenade," "Gnomus," "Tuileries," "Bydlo," "Ballet des Poussins dans leur coques," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," "Catacombs," and "La Cabane sur des paites de Poule" and "La Grande Porte de Kiev."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 2 - 1929

WITH the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, led by Arturo Toscanini, on tour next week, the Boston, Philadelphia and Curtis Institute Orchestras will come to town. Before departing, the local orchestra will give a concert tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall, giving the same program as yesterday and Thursday, consisting of the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," Beethoven's Second Symphony, Pizetti's "Concerto dell 'Estate" and Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The last pair of concerts but one this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition," Arthur Foote's Suite for string orchestra in E minor and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra," will be the first program. Saturday, Frederick the Great's Symphony in D major, Sibelius's Third Symphony and "Also Sprach Zarathustra" will be played.

Eugene Goossens will direct the Philadelphia Orchestra Tuesday evening in Carnegie Hall and will offer a program containing the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, the dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat"; a Suite from "The Triumph of Neptune" by Lord Bernays and "Islamey" by Balakiron-Casella. The Bernays Suite is from an English pantomime in ten scenes produced in 1926 in London by the Diaghileff Ballet. Goossens conducted the orchestra on that occasion.

The Curtis Institute of Music Orchestra, composed of 100 students augmented by sixteen professionals, six of whom are faculty members in woodwind, brass and double-bass, will be heard in concert Friday evening in Carnegie Hall. The program will consist of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Franck's Symphony in D minor, Lalo's 'cello concerto in D minor, with Tibor de Machula as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "La Grand Paque Russe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
MAR

Ernest Bloch's "America."

"AMERICA," Ernest Bloch's "epic rhapsody," the new prize-winning composition which has been played in New York and Boston with great success, will be brought to Washington by Serge Koussevitzky when the Russian conductor comes here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give his second concert of the season in Poli's Theater Wednesday afternoon.

The performance of "America" will quite fittingly take place just after the inauguration. Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges in the contest in which the score won. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities last December.

Bloch divides his rhapsody into three parts, the first depicting the America of the Indians and early Puritan settlers. The second movement portrays the old South, with its gay romance and the tragedy and sorrow brought by the Civil War. The last movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," sets forth our own jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the composition, magnificently prepared, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. The culminating hymn will be sung by the National Capital Oratorio Association, Dr. Albert W. Harned, director.

One other score stands upon Koussevitzky's program—Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Moussorgsky's score is a vivid and descriptive piano concerto, in which he characterizes a series of pictures in an exhibition by his artist friend, Hartman. This suite has been orchestrated by three different composers, but Ravel's arrangement is the favorite. Koussevitzky introduced this score to Europe and America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 3 - 1929

A Boston Symphony program includes [illegible] attributed to Frederick the Great. Not to be confused, of course, with Alexander the Great and his ragtime band.

Koussevitzky in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will play in Brooklyn on Friday evening, March 8, the following programme:

Little Symphony (Frederick II, King of Prussia), Concerto in D minor, for Violin with Orchestra (Sibelius), Fifth Symphony (Tschaikowsky). Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

Frederick the Great composed his little symphony in 1743 and although he wrote others too, this score was not corrected by his music and flute master, Johann Joachim Quantz, but left exactly as it was written. Frederick, whose proficiency as flute virtuoso is historical, uses two flutes in his symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
1 MAR 2 1929

New York Writer Eulogizes the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The following tribute to the Boston Symphony orchestra written by Richard L. Stokes, appeared in a recent issue of the New York Evening World:

"With at least equal and presumably superior financial resources, the Philharmonic Symphony has functioned this season like a willing subordinate of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as it did in previous years—save for Mr. Toscanini's transfigurations—in relation to the Philadelphia orchestra before Mr. Stokowski's indisposition.

"This decline into a second-rate status on the part of the single rcohesra of the greatest American city may be attributed unhesitatingly, I think, to the vicious guest-conductor system which has fastened itself upon the enterprise. The motive, of course, is the sale of tickets, to a populace notoriously fickle and greedy of novelty. But any business that changed its principal executive six times in as many months would be regarded as on the thoroughfare of insolvency. Similarly, an orchestra tossed in giddy succession from one conductor to another must lose its continuity as an organism.

"That the Boston orchestra is now the reigning symphonic body of the east is an assertion that will not be contraverted. Save for the brief respites, it passes the entire season under the rule of on ladr. The Philadelphia Symphony, until last year, was justly known as the greatest orchestra in the world. It was then under the autocratic and uninterrupted sway of Mr. Stokowski. Its decline began when it, too, was subjected to guest conductors. The Chicago Symphony orchestra, one of the country's prime ensembles, has attained that distinction under the constant direction of Frederick Stock. The moral appears too obvious to require elaboration."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
MAR 2 - 1929

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 7 and 9.

On the Thursday Serge Koussevitzky has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"—the suite of descriptive piano pieces which have been arranged for orchestra especially for this conductor by Maurice Ravel—the Suite in E minor for string orchestra, by Arthur Foote, and Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

At the Saturday afternoon concert "Also Sprach Zarathustra" will be repeated. Koussevitzky will revive the Third Symphony of Sibelius. This symphony, practically unknown in America, was revived in Boston by Koussevitzky in November. Another novelty will be the Third Symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia. This eighteenth century piece had its first American performance in Boston a few days ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 3 - 1929

Special interest attaches to two of the three numbers that will be played at the concert of Boston Symphony in the Academy of Music next Friday evening—the last visit but one of this organization to Brooklyn this season. Serge Koussewitzky will open the program with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, which he gave its first American performances in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The Eighteenth Century monarch, known to have been a skilled flutist, writes two flute parts into this score, giving them prominence in the slow movement. The Symphony was revived in Berlin last May.

As soloist of the evening, Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the seldom heard Violin Concerto of Sibelius. The concert will conclude with Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor.

* * *

Goossens and Koussevitzky To Conduct Here This Week

Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, after repeating the program first offered last Thursday and Friday this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, will spend this week on tour, visiting Philadelphia to-morrow, Washington Tuesday, Baltimore Wednesday, Rochester Thursday and Pittsburgh Friday and Saturday. Returning, the orchestra will repeat next Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Hall Mr. Toscanini's first program of the season, consisting of Mozart's "Haffner" symphony, Respighi's "Feste Romane," Debussy's "Iberia" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist of the Carnegie Hall concerts of Thursday night and Friday afternoon, March 14 and 15, playing the piano parts of his "Impressions of an Artist's Life." The following morning he will conduct the last of this season's children's concerts, at which the prize winners for the best note books will be announced and a program played of numbers chosen by ballot.

Despite the Philharmonic-Symphony's absence, we will not have a shortage of orchestral music this week, as the Philadelphia Orchestra gives its seventh Carnegie Hall concert of the season Tuesday night, and George Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony pay their fourth New York visit of 1928-'29 in the latter part of the week. The orchestra of the Curtis Institute of Music, in Philadelphia, also will contribute to the week's concert quota, making its New York debut at Carnegie Hall next Friday evening.

Eugene Goossens, regular conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, will conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra next Tuesday, presenting among more familiar numbers the first New York performance of Lord Berners's suite from "The Triumph of Neptune," which had its American premiere last week in Philadelphia. The original Berners ballet from which the suite is drawn, a pantomime in ten tableaux, was produced in London by the Diaghileff ballet on December 3, 1926, with Goossens conducting. Lord Berners (Gerald Hugh Tyrwhitt, ninth Baron Berners) is both a musician and diplomat, and studied with Casella attached to the British Embassy [illegible]. He also [illegible] Stravinsky.

Koussevitzky has made some [illegible] in the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall programs announced last [illegible]. As the list now stands, next [illegible] night's program begins with [illegible] major suite for strings, Op. 63, of [illegible] Foote (1853-) a prominent member of the elder generation of Boston [illegible]. The other numbers will be [illegible] "Thus spake Zarathustra" and [illegible] orchestration of Moussorgsky's [illegible] "Pictures at an Exhibition," [illegible] had its premiere under Mr. [illegible]tzky at Paris in 1926.

[illegible] afternoon's program will [illegible] the third of the four symphonies of Frederick the Great (King [illegible]rick II of Prussia, 1740-1786). This work of the noted Prussian monarch, who is more generally known as a warrior than a composer, is the only one of the symphonies not for strings alone and the only one not substantially revised by Quantz, the King's flute teacher. The symphony was played in Berlin on May 4, 1928, and introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony in Boston last week.

The next number is the third symphony of Jan Sibelius, in C major

N.Y. HER. & TRI.
MAR 3.1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 3 - 1929

In Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of New York concerts. Mr. Koussewitsky, who will conduct, has arranged the following programme:

Thursday evening:

Foote.....Suite in E Minor for Strings
Strauss......"Also Sprach Zarathustra"
Moussorgsky.....Pictures at an Exhibition

Saturday afternoon:

Frederick the Great.....Symphony
Sibelius..... Third Symphony
Strauss....."Also Sprach Zarathustra"

Both the Foote Suite and the Symphony by Frederick the Great will have their first New York performances at these concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR

Answer, Echo—

CLEMENT KRAUSS of Vienna and Frankurt-am-Main arrived in town last Wednesday. * * * Among his comments was none on the skyline. * * * Countrymen and colleagues of Herr Krauss predict for him a series of triumphs as guest-conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. His figure, they tell us, will be his fortune. * * * And what's this we hear of cerulean blood flowing in his veins? * * * Herr Krauss' hair is graying, and he has become somewhat broader of recent years, but his waistline — more important to a conductor than a sense of rhythm—is still elegant enough to rival Mr. Koussevitsky's profile on the podium. * * * And speaking of conductors, what do we hear concerning the indefatigable Georges Zaslawsky! Little short of the rumor that he is busy these days securing the cash and the credit for the resumption of Beethoven Symphony activities. * * * Nothing daunted by this fall's debacle, Mr. Zaslawsky still believes himself a great conductor. Maybe he is. Confidence, we read, is an indication of talent.

* * *

The Opera House these days is not as fertile in gossip as it might be. We might tell you that Mme. Karin Branzell is to sing Kundry in a Philadelphia performance of "Parsifal," and that Lauritz Melchior will do his first "Tristan und Isolde" in the same city, under Metropolitan auspices. Or we might ask, Where is Marion Talley? Should we remind you that it was in The Eagle you read last winter that the wonder child of Kansas City would not be re-engaged, except possibly for a very few "guest" appearances? The prophecy, denied at the time, seems to have come true. * * * Six weeks of the season remain and no sign of Marion. * * * Courage, friend! She will sing either "Rigoletto" or "Mignon" on the 11th of April. * * * Which brings to mind the strange ways of the Met. One of the musical papers last winter congratulated Marie Sundelius on her "11th and best" season with Mr. Gatti-Casazza's company. The fact was that Mme. Sundelius had not appeared in opera at the Metropolitan for a number of years. * * * There will be no "Fidelio" and no "Verkaufte Braut" this season. The loss of the former should break no hearts, but Smetana's charming musical comedy was one of the brightest jewels in New York's operatic crown.

* * *

Both Mr. Stokowski and his Philadelphians and Mr. Koussewitsky and his Bostonians are recording for a phonograph company, as you know. Well, Mr. Koussewitsky had it much on his mind to do Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony until Mr. Stokowski was apprised of his design, and without asking anyone's advice promptly recorded that opus himself. * * * So at least runs the tale, though for its accuracy we are the last to vouch. * * * Still speaking of conductors, we hear that Toscanini is much upset over the profile written of him by Samuel Chotzinoff and duly published in the New Yorker. * * * Mr. Toscanini believes that Samuel gave him too neurasthenic a character.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAR 3 - 1929

Orchestras, Pianist And Chor Coming

Boston An Philharmonic Musicia Will Give Concerts At The Lyric This Wee

Gitta Grado To Appear In Recital nd Dayton Westminst Chorus To Sing Frida

By VIRGINIA PO ELL HARRISS

THE coming week has an outstanding array of musical events to brighten the days of Lent. Two important orchestral v tors, the Boston and the Philharmon , a gifted young pianist, Gitta Grad a, and the Dayton Westminster C oir, one of the great choral organi of America, are among the major events which will grace the next seven days.

Sergei Koussevitsky will offer a program of unusual variety and musical interest, two numbers hitherto unheard in Baltimore, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its second and final appearance here this season on Tuesday at the Lyric. He will open with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, which has lately been discovered in Berlin.

Frederick composed this symphony in 1743 and, although he wrote others, too, this score was not corrected by his music and flute master, Quantz, but left exactly as the King wrote it. Frederick, whose proficiency as flute virtuoso is historical, uses two flutes in this score. Koussevitsky gave the opus its first American performance in Boston last week and will also introduce it to New York.

Another score of special interest will be the Third Symphony of Sibelius. Of the seven symphonics of the great Finnish composer, this one alone has been surprisingly neglected in this country, although it is in high favor in Europe. Koussevitsky revived the symphony in Boston this season and such was the success of this melodious and characteristic score that it was repeated at later concerts.

The last piece on the program will be the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky in E Minor, which is known as one of the finest and most moving interpretations in the repertory of the great Russian conductor. The program will be:

Symphony in D major, No. 3, Frederick the Great Allegro.
Andante.
Allegro scherzando.
Symphony No. 3, Opus 52.....Sibelius
Allegro moderato.
Andantino con moto, quasi allegretto.
Allegro.
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64, Tchaikowsky
Andante.
Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
Valse (Allegro moderato).
Finale: Andante maestoso; allegro vivace.

TEACHERS' RECITAL

A recital of song and piano compositions will comprise the [illegible] recital of the series tomorrow by teachers of the Peabody Conservatory Preparatory Department on Thursday evening. The soloists will be Josephine [illegible]cLaughlin, soprano; Mary Stone, [illegible]anist, and Sarah Stulman, pianist. The singer will be accompanied by [illegible]hillip Jeffreys. A varied and at[illegible]ctive program has been planned [illegible]th the following works:

Aria from Der Freischütz.....Weber
Allerseelen.....Strauss
Schlagende Herzen.....Strauss
Miss McLaughl[illegible]
Prelude and Fugue in E [illegible]nor, [illegible]endelssohn
Intermezzo in A.....Brahms
Ballade in B minor.....Brahms
Miss Stone.
Vogel als Prophet.....Schumann
Jagdlied.....Schumann
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Miss Stulma[illegible]
Carmela.....Ross
(Spanish California [illegible]olk-song.)
El Majo Discreto.....Grandados
Jota.....De Falla
Miss McLaug[illegible]in.
Berceuse.....Chopin
Waltz in C sharp minor.....Chopin
Two Etudes.....Chopin
Miss Stulma[illegible]
Prelude.....[illegible]aul Hodgson
Spring Song.....Reger
Humoreske.....Reger
Two Preludes.....Scriabin
Polonaise in C minor.....Chopin
Miss Stone.
Love Has Eyes.....Bishop
I Hold Her Hands.....Russell
Pan.....Sabin
Three Policemen.....Mannes
The Python.....Couper
When I Love You.....Cole
Miss McLaughlin.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT

The Philharmonic Orchestra comes for its fourth and final concert here this season on Wednesday at the Lyric with Arturo Toscanini, the famous Italian maestro, conducting. The program has as its symphonic offering the Mozart Symphony in D Major. Other numbers will be the Festa Romana, by Respighi; Debussy's Iberia and the Overture to Tannhauser.

Toscanini was scheduled to have directed the previous concert by the Philharmonic, but was unavoidably detained abroad, and as his appearance here is one of the important events of the season, he is sure to be greeted by a capacity audience of musical devotees.

In addition, the program offered is one sure to attract widespread attention, for whatever Mr. Toscanini essays is sure to be revivified, given new and greater values. His interpretations of Mozart as well as that of Debussy, his own countryman, Respighi, and the Wagner music is sure to be brilliant and illuminating.

GRADOVA RECITAL

Gitta Gradova, pianist, will appear Friday afternoon at the Peabody Conservatory of Music as recitalist in the Artist Recital series.

Born in Chicago of Russian parentage, Miss Gradova's training has been American throughout. Her only teacher has been Djane Lavoie-Herz, of Chicago, a disciple of Scriabin, with whom she has been studying for the last eight years, and it was from Mme. Lavoie-Herz that Miss Gradova derived her knowledge and interpretation of the works of the great Russian.

Miss Gradova is regarded by many critics as an authoritative exponent of that master's difficult music, though her repertoire is an eclectic and extensive one, ranging from Bach to the moderns. Miss Gradova's musical training, as has been the case with so many artists, began in the home, where, in the artistic atmosphere which characterized the lives of her parents, first began her study of the piano.

Her elder sister directed these early studies and, far from resembling the envious older brother of the immortal Bach, did everything in her power to improve her sister's pianistic skill and musical instinct. Today Miss Gradova has four seasons of triumphs behind her and is an artist of whom America is justly proud.

Those who were fortunate enough to hear her stunning performance of the Rachmaninoff Concerto with the Baltimore Symphony a few years ago will recall it with the greatest pleasure and look forward with even more pleasure to hearing this talented young artist in an entire recital of her own. This will be especially true upon seeing the program she has arranged for Friday, which is as follows:

Chaconne in G major.....Handel
Sonata.....Scarlatti
Capriccio.
Fantasie quasi Sonate.....Liszt
Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2.....Chopin
Two Mazurkas.
Etude, Op. 25, No. 12.
Sonata No. 4.....Scriabin
Polichinelle.....Edna Bentz Woods
La Cathedrale engloutie.....Debussy
Ruth Hour in Hongkong.....Chasins
Danse Rituelle du Feu.....De Falla

DAYTON CHOIR

The Dayton Westminster Choir, whose pioneering achievements make it unique among the choirs of the world, for its coming European tour, in addition to being an unprecedented feature among choirs, is an epochal event in the musical life of America. It will be heard at the Lyric Friday night.

To understand the reason for the increasing demand for the Westminster Choir and choir leaders trained in the Westminster Choir School—that unusual institution in Dayton, Ohio, established primarily for the training of church music leaders—one must know something of John Finely Williamson, the man who conceived the idea and whose genius is carrying it on.

Dr. Williamson—the son of a minister—was born in Ohio and grew up in the shadow of the church. After graduation from Otterbein College, he became a teacher of public speech and church music in Dayton. It was while in this work he organized and directed several choirs in Dayton, which finally led to the organization of his present singing group, and to the establishment of the Dayton Westminster Choir School, which has as its chief interest the teaching of church music.

PIONEER IN FIELD

Dr. Williamson may truly be called a pioneer in this far-reaching field of music and religious endeavor. A more recent development is the establishment of a summer choir school at Winston-Salem, N. C., where, for six weeks, leaders and directors of some of the largest and best-known church choirs in America attend daily classes and rehearsals—a living evidence to the real need for such a school.

"We are attempting," says Dr. Williamson, "to recreate an interest in the art of hymnology—which has been too long neglected. In our musical training we have wandered too far from the church. Our great musicians of the past—Bach, Schubert, Haydn, Mendelssohn and the rest—were trained in the church. Music as a child of the church must be brought back to the church—to work for it and not against it. We should never lose sight of the fact that the one and only purpose of church music is worship. Music in itself is not religious, but if it is to serve its purpose in the church it must arouse emotions that are religious."

INTEREST MANIFEST

Interest from a variety of angles is being manifested in the visit of this famous singing group. There are the friends of Mrs. H. E. Talbott, president of the Westminster Choir Association, who are acting as patronesses of the concert, among whom are Mrs. Charles Rieman, Mrs. John Gill, Mrs. P. Lea Thom, Mrs. De Courcy Thom, Mrs. Robert Garrett, Mrs. Lewellys F. Barker, Mrs. E. H. Bouton, Mrs. Harrison Cassard, Miss Jane Cook, Mrs. George Colston, Mrs. Frank H. Hambleton, Mrs. David McIntosh, Jr., Mrs. Theodore Miller, Mrs. Richard H. Pleasants and Mrs. Tunstall Smith.

Musicians are showing their interest in the matter by organization of a committee, which include Miss Catherine Luck, Mrs. Imogene Matthews, Miss Clara Groppel, Howard Thatcher, Franz Bornschein, E. S. Enders, J. W. Lewis, J. Norris Hering, Herbert J. Austin and Miss Ida Ermold, to further interest in the choir's appearance.

Organizations cooperating in furthering the concert are the Baltimore Music Club, Treble Clef Club, the Young Women's Interdenominational Union and the Federation of Churches.

Following is the program:

I
Hodie Christus natus est. G. P. da Palestrina
Crucifixus.....Antonio Lotti
Sing Ye the Lord. Johann Sebastian Bach
a. Poco Allegro.
b. Allegro Vivace.

II
Jesus, Friend of Sinners..Edvard Grieg
Offer Thanksgiving. F. Melius Christiansen
Psalm Fifty-One, Opus 29. Johannes Brahms

III
*God is a Spirit.....David Hugh Jones
Alleluia! Christ is Risen....Kopolyoff
(Arranged by Harvey Gaul.)
Going Home.....Anton Dvorak
(From Largo of New World Symphony.)
(Arranged by William Arms Fisher.)

IV
What Christ Said. Peter Christian Lutkin
In dulci jubilo (Fourteenth Century).
(Arranged by F. Melius Christiansen.)
Father Most Holy. F. Melius Christiansen
*The Shepherd's Story. Clarence Dickinson

*Dedicated to Mr. Williamson and the Westminster Choir.

BALTIMORE SYMPHONY

Seats are now on sale for the fifth concert of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Lyric Sunday evening. For this concert has been secured the violinist, Kathleen Parlow.

Madame Parlow's appearance will mark her first engagement in this city for many years and her first appearance with the municipally controlled musical organization. A native of Calgary, Alberta, Canada, she was taken by her parents to California at the age of 5 and began her violin studies in that State under Conrad and Henry Holmes, making her first public appearance at the age of 6.

Her adult debut occurred at Bechstein Hall, in London, in 1905, following which she went to St. Petersburg and continued her studies under Leopold Auer. She appeared in London with the Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall, and received a signal distinction when she played a command performance before the late dowager Queen Alexandra.

AT OSTEND FESTIVAL

Madame Parlow appeared at the International Musical Festival held at Ostend in 1907, and subsequently toured extensively and with great success throughout Europe and the British Isles. She had appeared as soloist with all the important orchestras of Europe before she came to America for the first time in 1910, and was engaged as soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Madame Parlow's home is at Meldreth, Cambridgeshire, England. Her American appearances are, consequently, limited to the larger cities.

AT MARYLAND CASUALTY

The program to be given this afternoon at the Maryland Casualty Auditorium will be by the Maryland Casualty Chorus, Ruth V. A. Spicer, A. A. G. O., organist, and the Gypsy Violins, also play important parts in the excellent presentation that is to be offered.

The program is as follows:

Chorus—
Merrily I Roam.....Schleiffarth
Two old slave songs—
a. Heaven.
b. Go Down, Moses.
Organ—
Grand March from "Tannhauser." Wagner
Tenor Solo—
Ah! So Pure (from the opera "Martha").....Flotow
Chorus—
March of the Puppets..Tschaikowsky
Longing (O Sole Mio). Eduardo di Capua
Serenade.....Schubert
Sympathy (from "The Firefly"). Friml
Gypsy Violins—
Waltz, Wedding of the Winds..Hall
Mother Machree.....Ernest Ball
Frieda Etelson, soloist.
Chorus—
Glory to Isis (from the grand opera "Aida").....Verdi
Festival Octet—
Barcarolle (Contes d' Hoffman). Offenbach
Sweet Birds of Night.....Bailey
Solo and Chorus—
The Sweetest Hour.....Glover
J. Blaine Diven, Jr. tenor.
The Weaver of Dreams (an Indian Fantasie)—
Prologue adapted from "Hiawatha," by Longfellow.
Frederick W. Pilgrim, the Indian Chief.
Music, "By the Waters of Minnetonka" (Indian Love Song). Lieurance
Muted violin, Dora Sohffer.
Harp accompaniment (organ), Miss Spicer.
Tableau, Doris Penn.
Music, "Pale Moon." Frederick Knight Logan
Maryland Casualty Women's Chorus.

RICHARD GOODMAN RECITAL

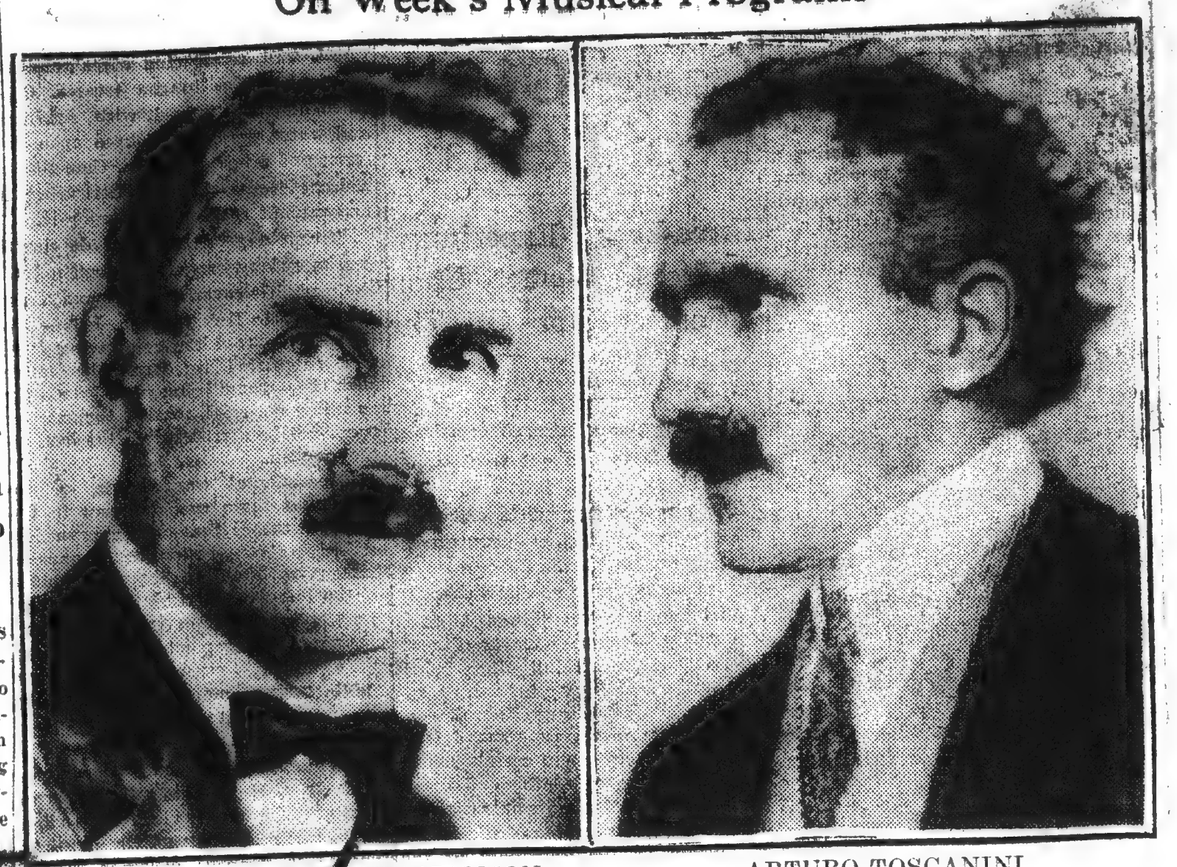
Richard Goodman, one of Baltimore's younger generation of pianists, will present a recital at the Lord Baltimore Hotel March 19. Mr. Goodman is a Baltimorean by birth and education, having been a student at the Peabody Conservatory, where he obtained both a teacher's certificate and an artist's diploma.

Mr. Goodman's training has been obtained in Baltimore under Charles Cooper and Howard Thatcher. In June he will go to Europe for an indefinite stay and further study.

TO GIVE RECITAL

This evening at 1911 Eutaw Place the Castelle Studios are presenting a program of vocal and instrumental numbers by the advanced students, many of whom are well known in local musical circles as well as on the concert and operatic stage.

On Week's Musical Programs



DR. JOHN FINLEY WILLIAMSON ARTURO TOSCANINI

Dr. Williamson is director of the Dayton Westminster Choir, which will be heard at the Lyric on Friday night, and Toscanini will direct the Philharmonic Orchestra at its concert at the Lyric on Wednesday evening

128

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAR 3 - 1929

Orchestras, Pianist And Choir Coming

Boston And Philharmonic Musicians Will Give Concerts At The Lyric This Week

Gitta Gradova To Appear In Recital And Dayton Westminster Chorus To Sing Friday

By VIRGINIA POWELL HARRISS

THE coming week has an outstanding array of musical events to brighten the days of Lent. Two important orchestral visitors, the Boston and the Philharmonic, a gifted young pianist, Gitta Gradova, and the Dayton Westminster Choir, one of the great choral organizations of America, are among the major events which will grace the next seven days.

Sergei Koussevitsky will offer a program of unusual variety and musical interest, two numbers hitherto unheard in Baltimore, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its second and final appearance here this season on Tuesday at the Lyric. He will open with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, which has lately been discovered in Berlin.

Frederick composed this symphony in 1743 and, although he wrote others, too, this score was not corrected by his music and flute master, Quantz, but left exactly as the King wrote it. Frederick, whose proficiency as flute virtuoso is historical, uses two flutes in this score. Koussevitsky gave the opus its first American performance in Boston last week and will also introduce it to New York.

Another score of special interest will be the Third Symphony of Sibelius. Of the seven symphonies of the great Finnish composer, this one alone has been surprisingly neglected in this country, although it is in high favor in Europe. Koussevitsky revived the symphony in Boston this season and such was the success of this melodious and characteristic score that it was repeated at later concerts.

The last piece on the program will be the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky in E Minor, which is known as one of the finest and most moving interpretations in the repertory of the great Russian conductor. The program will be:

Symphony in D major, No. 3. Frederick the Great
- Allegro.
- Andante.
- Allegro scherzando.

Symphony No. 3, Opus 52.....Sibelius
- Allegro moderato.
- Andantino con moto, quasi allegretto.
- Allegro.

Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64, Tchaikowsky
- Andante.
- Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
- Valse (Allegro moderato).
- Finale: Andante maestoso; allegro vivace.

TEACHERS' RECITAL

A recital of song and piano compositions will comprise the recital of the series of twelve by teachers of the Peabody Conservatory Preparatory Department on Thursday evening. The soloists will be Josephine McLaughlin, soprano; Mary Stone, pianist, and Sarah Stulman, pianist. The singer will be accompanied by Phillip Jeffreys. A varied and attractive program has been planned with the following works:

Aria from Der Freischütz.....Weber
Allerseelen.....Strauss
Schlagende Herzen.....Strauss
Miss McLaughlin.
Prelude and Fugue in E minor. Mendelssohn
Intermezzo in A.....Brahms
Ballade in B minor.....Brahms
Miss Stone.
Vogel als Prophet.....Schumann
Jagdlied.....Schumann
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Miss Stulman.
Carmela.....Ross
(Spanish California folk-song.)
El Majo Discreto.....Grandados
Jota.....De Falla
Miss McLaughlin.
Berceuse.....Chopin
Waltz in C sharp minor.....Chopin
Two Etudes.....Chopin
Miss Stulman.
Prelude.....Paul Hodgson
Spring Song.....Reger
Humoreske.....Reger
Two Preludes.....Scriabin
Polonaise in C minor.....Chopin
Miss Stone.
Love Has Eyes.....Bishop
I Hold Her Hands.....Russell
Pan.....Sabin
Three Policemen.....Mannes
The Python.....Couper
When I Love You.....Cole
Miss McLaughlin.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT

The Philharmonic Orchestra comes for its fourth and final concert here this season on Wednesday at the Lyric with Arturo Toscanini, the famous Italian maestro, conducting. The program has as its symphonic offering the Mozart Symphony in D Major. Other numbers will be the Festa Romana, by Respighi; Debussy's Iberia and the Overture to Tannhauser.

Toscanini was scheduled to have directed the previous concert by the Philharmonic, but was unavoidably detained abroad, and as his appearance here is one of the important events of the season, he is sure to be greeted by a capacity audience of musical devotees.

In addition, the program offered is one sure to attract widespread attention, for whatever Mr. Toscanini essays is sure to be revivified, given new and greater values. His interpretations of Mozart as well as that of Debussy, his own countryman, Respighi, and the Wagner music is sure to be brilliant and illuminating.

GRADOVA RECITAL

Gitta Gradova, pianist, will appear Friday afternoon at the Peabody Conservatory of Music as recitalist in the Artist Recital series.

Born in Chicago of Russian parentage, Miss Gradova's training has been American throughout. Her only teacher has been Djane Lavoie-Herz, of Chicago, a disciple of Scriabin, with whom she has been studying for the last eight years, and it was from Mme. Lavoie-Herz that Miss Gradova derived her knowledge and interpretation of the works of the great Russian.

Miss Gradova is regarded by many critics as an authoritative exponent of that master's difficult music, though her repertoire is an eclectic and extensive one, ranging from Bach to the moderns. Miss Gradova's musical training, as has been the case with so many artists, began in the home, where, in the artistic atmosphere which characterized the lives of her parents, first began her study of the piano.

Her elder sister directed these early studies and, far from resembling the envious older brother of the immortal Bach, did everything in her power to improve her sister's pianistic skill and musical instinct. Today Miss Gradova has four seasons of triumphs behind her and is an artist of whom America is justly proud.

Those who were fortunate enough to hear her stunning performance of the Rachmaninoff Concerto with the Baltimore Symphony a few years ago will recall it with the greatest pleasure and look forward with even more pleasure to hearing this talented young artist in an entire recital of her own. This will be especially true upon seeing the program she has arranged for Friday, which is as follows:

Chaconne in G major.....Handel
Sonata.....Scarlatti
Capriccio.
Fantasie quasi Sonate.....Liszt
Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2.....Chopin
Two Mazurkas.
Etude, Op. 25, No. 12.
Sonata No. 4.....Scriabin
Polichinelle.....Edna Bentz Woods
La Cathedrale engloutie.....Debussy
Ruth Hour in Hongkong.....Chasins
Danse Rituelle du Feu.....De Falla

DAYTON CHOIR

The Dayton Westminster Choir, whose pioneering achievements make it unique among the choirs of the world, for its coming European tour, in addition to being an unprecedented feature among choirs, is an epochal event in the musical life of America. It will be heard at the Lyric Friday night.

To understand the reason for the increasing demand for the Westminster Choir and choir leaders trained in the Westminster Choir School—that unusual institution in Dayton, Ohio, established primarily for the training of church music leaders—one must know something of John Finely Williamson, the man who conceived the idea and whose genius is carrying it on.

Dr. Williamson—the son of a minister—was born in Ohio and grew up in the shadow of the church. After graduation from Otterbein College, he became a teacher of public speech and church music in Dayton. It was while in this work he organized and directed several choirs in Dayton, which finally led to the organization of his present singing group, and to the establishment of the Dayton Westminster Choir School, which has as its chief interest the teaching of church music.

PIONEER IN FIELD

Dr. Williamson may truly be called a pioneer in this far-reaching field of music and religious endeavor. A more recent development is the establishment of a summer choir school at Winston-Salem, N. C., where, for six weeks, leaders and directors of some of the largest and best-known church choirs in America attend daily classes and rehearsals—a living evidence to the real need for such a school.

"We are attempting," says Dr. Williamson, "to recreate an interest in the art of hymnology—which has been too long neglected. In our musical training we have wandered too far from the church. Our great musicians of the past—Bach, Schubert, Haydn, Mendelssohn and the rest, were trained in the church. Music as a child of the church must be brought back to the church—to work for it and not against it. We should never lose sight of the fact that the one and only purpose of church music is worship. Music in itself is not religious, but if it is to serve its purpose in the church it must arouse emotions that are religious."

INTEREST MANIFEST

Interest from a variety of angles is being manifested in the visit of this famous singing group. There are the friends of Mrs. H. E. Talbott, president of the Westminster Choir Association, who are acting as patronesses of the concert, among whom are Mrs. Charles Rieman, Mrs. John Gill, Mrs. P. Lea Thom, Mrs. De Courcy Thom, Mrs. Robert Garrett, Mrs. Lewellys F. Barker, Mrs. E. H. Bouton, Mrs. Harrison Cassard, Miss Jane Cook, Mrs. George Colston, Mrs. Frank H. Hambleton, Mrs. David McIntosh, Jr., Mrs. Theodore Miller, Mrs. Richard H. Pleasants and Mrs. Tunstall Smith.

Musicians are showing their interest in the matter by organization of a committee, which include Miss Catherine Luck, Mrs. Imogene Matthews, Miss Clara Groppel, Howard Thatcher, Franz Bornschein, E. S. Enders, J. W. Lewis, J. Norris Hering, Herbert J. Austin and Miss Ida Ermold, to further interest in the choir's appearance.

Organizations cooperating in furthering the concert are the Baltimore Music Club, Treble Clef Club, the Young Women's Interdenominational Union and the Federation of Churches.

Following is the program:

I

Hodie Christus natus est. G. P. da Palestrina
Crucifixus.....Antonio Lotti
Sing Ye the Lord. Johann Sebastian Bach
a. Poco Allegro.
b. Allegro Vivace.

II

Jesus, Friend of Sinners..Edvard Grieg
Offer Thanksgiving. F. Melius Christiansen
Psalm Fifty-One, Opus 29. Johannes Brahms

III

*God is a Spirit.....David Hugh Jones
Alleluia! Christ is Risen....Kopolyoff
(Arranged by Harvey Gaul.)
Going Home.....Anton Dvorak
(From Largo of New World Symphony.)
(Arranged by William Arms Fisher.)

IV

What Christ Said. Peter Christian Lutkin
In dulci jubilo (Fourteenth Century),
(Arranged by F. Melius Christiansen.)
Father Most Holy, F. Melius Christiansen
*The Shepherd's Story. Clarence Dickinson

*Dedicated to Mr. Williamson and the Westminster Choir.

BALTIMORE SYMPHONY

Seats are now on sale for the fifth concert of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Lyric Sunday evening. For this concert has been secured the violinist, Kathleen Parlow.

Madame Parlow's appearance will mark her first engagement in this city for many years and her first appearance with the municipally controlled musical organization. A native of Calgary, Alberta, Canada, she was taken by her parents to California at the age of 5 and began her violin studies in that State under Conrad and Henry Holmes, making her first public appearance at the age of 6.

Her adult debut occurred at Bechstein Hall, in London, in 1905, following which she went to St. Petersburg and continued her studies under Leopold Auer. She appeared in London with the Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall, and received a signal distinction when she played a command performance before the late dowager Queen Alexandra.

AT OSTEND FESTIVAL

Madame Parlow appeared at the International Musical Festival held at Ostend in 1907, and subsequently toured extensively and with great success throughout Europe and the British Isles. She had appeared as soloist with all the important orchestras of Europe before she came to America for the first time in 1910, and was engaged as soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Madame Parlow's home is at Meldreth, Cambridgeshire, England. Her American appearances are, consequently, limited to the larger cities.

AT MARYLAND CASUALTY

The program to be given this afternoon at the Maryland Casualty Auditorium will be by the Maryland Casualty Chorus, Ruth V. A. Spicer, A. A. G. O., organist, and the Gypsy Violins, also play important parts in the excellent presentation that is to be offered.

The program is as follows:

Chorus—
Merrily I Roam.....Schleiffarth
Two old slave songs—
a. Heaven.
b. Go Down, Moses.
Organ—
Grand March from "Tannhauser." Wagner
Tenor Solo—
Ah! So Pure (from the opera "Martha").....Flotow
Chorus—
March of the Puppets..Tschaikowsky
Longing (O Sole Mio). Eduardo di Capua
Serenade.....Schubert
Sympathy (from "The Firefly"). Friml
Gypsy Violins—
Waltz, Wedding of the Winds..Hall
Mother Machree.....Ernest Ball
Frieda Etelson, soloist.
Chorus—
Glory to Isis (from the grand opera "Aida").....Verdi
Festival Octet—
Barcarolle (Contes d' Hoffman). Offenbach
Sweet Birds of Night.....Bailey
Solo and Chorus—
The Sweetest Hour.....Glover
J. Blaine Diven, Jr. tenor.
The Weaver of Dreams (an Indian Fantasie)—
Prologue adapted from "Hiawatha," by Longfellow.
Frederick W. Pilgrim, the Indian Chief.
Music, "By the Waters of Minnetonka" (Indian Love Song). Lieurance
Muted violin, Dora Sohiffer.
Harp accompaniment (organ), Miss Spicer.
Tableau, Doris Penn.
Music, "Pale Moon." Frederick Knight Logan
Maryland Casualty Women's Chorus.

RICHARD GOODMAN RECITAL

Richard Goodman, one of Baltimore's younger generation of pianists, will present a recital at the Lord Baltimore Hotel March 19. Mr. Goodman is a Baltimorean by birth and education, having been a student at the Peabody Conservatory, where he obtained both a teacher's certificate and an artist's diploma.

Mr. Goodman's training has been obtained in Baltimore under Charles Cooper and Howard Thatcher. In June he will go to Europe for an indefinite stay and further study.

TO GIVE RECITAL

This evening at 1911 Eutaw Place the Castelle Studios are presenting a program of vocal and instrumental numbers by the advanced students, many of whom are well known in local musical circles as well as on the concert and operatic stage.

On Week's Musical Programs

DR. JOHN FINLEY WILLIAMSON — ARTURO TOSCANINI

Dr. Williamson is director of the Dayton Westminster Choir, which will be heard at the Lyric on Friday night, and Toscanini will direct the Philharmonic Orchestra at its concert at the Lyric on Wednesday evening

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
MAR 3 - 1929

* * *

POLI'S—

Boston Symphony

ONE of the musical highlights of Inauguration Week will be the final 1928-29 concert in Washington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Poli's Theater, Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, which closes the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present for the first time in this city, Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which was unanimously selected by a jury of five famous conductors, including Mr. Koussevitzky, as the prize-winning entry in Musical America's contest. The anthem, which constitutes an outstanding feature of Bloch's composition, will be sung by a chorus of 125 Washington singers.

Bloch's first number, based upon Indian tribal melodies and Puritan hymns, depicts the life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the Old South, suddenly broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war. The third movement, "The Present—the Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and pounding machinery.

Another interesting feature of this concert will be Koussevitzky's introduction of Moussorgsky's humorous suite of piano pieces by Maurice Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 3 - 1929

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Special interest attaches to each of the three numbers on the program of the coming Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, which will be the last visit but one of Boston's Orchestra in Brooklyn this season.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, which this conductor gave its first American performance in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The eighteenth century king, known in history to have been a skilled flutist, writes two flute parts into this score, giving them prominence in the slow movement. This symphony was revived in Berlin last May, and it is also being played by Koussevitsky in New York.

As soloist of the evening, Richard Burgin, the talented young Russian concertmaster of the orchestra, will appear in the Violin Concerto of Sibelius, the Finnish composer. Burgin is well known by his appearance as soloist, also by his recitals and the string quartet which bears his name.

The concert will close with Tschaikowsky's Symphony in E Minor, No. 5, which Koussevitsky is considered to give one of his finest and most moving interpretations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
MAR 3 - 1929

BOSTONIAN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Sympyony, at Poli's Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
MAR 3 - 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA—Wednesday.

One of the outstanding musical events of inauguration week in Washington will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Poli's Theater Wednesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present for the first time in Washington Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," which Mr. Koussevitzky, with four other distinguished American conductors, unanimously selected in Musical America's prize contest. The anthem which constitutes the climax of "America" will be sung by a mixed choir of 125 Washington singers, the National Capital Oratorio Association, Dr. Harned, conductor.

The program also will include Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated especially for the Boston Symphony by Maurice Ravel, which has been a feature of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Boston and New York.

Seats are on sale at the concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 3 - 1929

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra pay their last visit but one to New York this season in the coming week. On the first of his three programs here the Russian leader has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition" in an arrangement made for Koussevitzky in Paris by Maurice Ravel. Next Thursday's concert in Carnegie Hall opens with a suite for strings, Op. 63, by the American composer Arthur Foote.

Sibelius's Third Symphony, to be heard Saturday afternoon, was once performed in New York, on Jan. 16, 1908, by the former Russian Symphony Orchestra under Modest Altschuler. Two of Koussevitzky's predecessors announced the work, but left it unperformed until he revived it on Nov. 9 last and thrice since in Boston. Another matinee "novelty" is a symphony credited to Frederick the Great.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
POST
MAR 3 - 1929

IN ITS THEME, EPIC RHAPSODY LAUDS AMERICA

"America," Ernest Bloch's "Epic Rhapsody," the new prize-winning composition which has been played all over the United States with great success, will be brought to Washington by Serge Koussevitzky, when the Russian conductor comes here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give his second concert of the season in Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, March 6. The performance of "America" will thus fittingly take place just after the inauguration. Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges in the contest in which the score won. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities last December.

Bloch divides his rhapsody into three parts, the first depicting the America of the Indians and early Puritan settlers. The second movement portrays the old South, with its gay romance and the tragedy and sorrow brought by the Civil War. The last movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," sets forth our own jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the composition, magnificently prepared, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. The culminating hymn will be sung by a mixed chorus of Washington, trained by Albert W. Harned.

One other score stands upon Koussevitzky's program—Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which has been arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Moussorgsky's score is a vivid and descriptive piano concerto, in which he characterizes a series of pictures in an exhibition by his artist friend, Hartmann. This suite has been orchestrated by three different composers but Ravel's arrangement, needless to say, is far superior to the others.

Koussevitzky has introduced this score to Europe and America.

This concert will bring to a close the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
MAR 3 - 1929

FREDERICH THE FIRST, King of Prussia, was a composer. His Third Symphony will be given its first New York hearing on Saturday.

At that time it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, who will also revive the Second Symphony of Sibylius and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustia." The last named will have previously been played Thursday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York. On Thursday's program Serge Koussevitzky has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"—the suite of descriptive piano pieces which have been arranged for orchestra especially for this conductor by Maurice Ravel. He will also play the Suite for String Orchestra in E minor by Arthur Foote, the American composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 4 - 1929

In a leaflet inclosed in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently, [illegible] director, Serge Koussevitsky, invited subscriptions for a monument to Claude Debussy which is being projected in France, and suggested that if everyone would give 25 cents the result would be gratifying. Next week the appeal was repeated, but the two-bit reference had been blue penciled. The phrase was changed to "a contribution, however small."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
MAR 7 - 1929

WASHINGTON SOCIETY

Washington, D. C., March 6.—[Special.]—Mrs. Hoover made her first public appearance as first lady of the land this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She had with her the President's sister, Mrs. Leavitt, of California; her uncle, Maj. W. D. Henry of North Dakota; her sister, Mrs. Large, and the latter's daughter, Miss Janet Large.

Mrs. Hoover wore black, a dress of black velvet and black hat, with a coat of black broadtail lamb trimmed with sable. A secret service man escorted the party to their box and returned for them during the last number on the program.

The President's wife has appointed Miss Mary Randolph, who was secretary to Mrs. Coolidge, as her social secretary with two aides, Miss Ruth Fessler, who accompanied her on the Hoover trip to Latin American countries, and Mildred Hall, both [illegible] ford univer-

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CALL
MAR 5 - 1929

Bloch's 'America' Featured Tonight At Hoover Recital

Two great Californians, Herbert Hoover and Ernest Bloch, will be honored simultaneously tonight at the traditional inaugural concert to be held in Washington, D. C.

Bloch received word from Washington today that the epic rhapsody, "America," prize winning symphony composition, has been chosen as the work to be played at the concert tonight.

O. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra playing "America."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
MAR 6 - 1929

MUSIC

By F. W. Strehlau.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony Features Last Concert Of Season By Boston Orchestra Under Baton Of Serge Koussevitzky — Two Other Works Given

THE Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64, is perhaps the most self-revealing of all this composer's works. In it the great Russian, so reticent at other times and in the spoken word, discloses all of his longing, his passion, his despair, his exaltation, his hopes, his gayety verging on gloom, his almost hysterical ebullience. The symphony, in a way, is autobiographical.

Its poignance, its nobility, its restlessness, its richness of tonal coloring, its beauty were painted last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky with bold strokes and with a broad sweep that voiced to the full the surcharged emotions which have been put into the work.

Always an arresting interpreter of Russian music, Koussevitzky perhaps surpassed himself in depicting the intensity of this close-knit Fifth, drawing a picture that moved the audience to a demonstration. In the presentation of this music he is probably unapproached and in it he attains his highest eloquence. It was an inspiring feature of the farewell visit of the Bostonians for this season and made an impression that will linger long in the memory. It was notable for various things apart from the massed effect, among them the mellifluous horn notes in the andante.

There were other things in the concert to hold the attention closely, one of these being the introductory number, the Symphony in D major No. 3, by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, for small orchestra. It is generally known that this royal personage busied himself with various things besides statecraft, that he composed extensively and also played the flute with skill. In this work he has given expression to his fondness for the instrument by including a two-flute slow movement. The piece is very simple in its structure and carries swinging melodies, though it lacks Mozartian grace and is not at all spiritual in its essence. It was played with smoothness and a careful preservation of its atmosphere.

As for the Sibelius Symphony No. 3, opus 52, the only other number, its reiterations might give a sense of monotony but for its peculiar idiomatic structure, its unusual progressions, its use of an irregular figure to produce quaint rhythms and its employment of what might be called folk tunes. It carries a forceful suggestion of forests and lakes and of northern psychology, and there is about it a persistency of utterance that does not let one wander. The opening is striking with its unison passages.

Above all, the work is not somber, but [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAR 6 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitsky Conducts Unusual Program Of Three Symphonies, By Frederick The Great, Sibelius And Tschaikowsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the season last night at the Lyric Theater, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting. As a program maker, Mr. Koussevitsky has achieved a reputation for the unusual and last night's was no exception, for three symphonies were presented, two of which never had been heard in Baltimore before.

In the first instance there was the Symphony in D major by Frederick the Great, who was a performer on the flute and a composer of no mean ability. He was an amateur in the real sense of the word, his love for music being so great that although his father considered its study effeminate and declined to allow [illegible] studied in secret, engaging musical servants.

Not serious in content, his opus is courtly, gay music, typical of the period, very pleasant to hear and easy of comprehension and which the orchestra disposed of in a very happy and graceful fashion.

The music of Sibelius' Third Symphony was neither happy nor so easily disposed of. It is neither deliberately modern nor studiedly archaic, but has most characteristic manifestations. He uses the traditional symphonic form with which to hold his ideas together, which are short motives of a mosaic style with folk flavor. Meticulously written, there are times when the very thin orchestration seems sombre and spare.

After the Finnish music, the kaleidoscopic tonal hues of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony provided a rich contrast. The masterly first movement—every note a telling one—the impassioned romance of the French horns in the second, the perfectly proportioned passages in the conversation between the oboe and the horn, the slow valse of the third—sorrowfully jesting in the Russian style—and the tremendous swirl of the finale were in direct contrast with the music which preceded it.

If any conductor can vitalize the contemporary works, it is Mr. Koussevitsky, and although he lavished much care and skill upon the Sibelius Symphony, bringing out with finesse the fine points of the opus—even that failed to make it wholly convincing music.

With Russian music Mr. Koussevitsky is unsurpassed. His native music, he brings to it a sympathetic insight and grasp of the inner meaning which revivifies and gives it new life.

V. P. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
MAR 7 - 1929

MUSIC

ERNEST BLOCH'S "AMERICA."

That admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, who has many friends and ad[illegible] Washington, made its second and final appearance of the season at Poli's Theater, yesterday afternoon, when the feature was the local premiere of Ernest Bloch's prize-winning epic rhapsody, "America."

A large audience, led by Mrs. Herbert Hoover in the presidential box, showed unusually alert anticipation of the epic rhapsody. In fact, so anxious had a group of sincere Washington music lovers become to hear this prize-winning work that, when they found it was liable to be canceled due to the extra cost of erecting a platform for the 125 singers in Dr. Albert Harned's National Capital Oratorio Association chorus they went into their own pockets and raised the amount. It was a highly laudable gesture, and it is to be hoped that they felt the result merited the expense. Certainly no fault could be found with the work of the chorus. The majority of Mr. Bloch's very common-place phrases were clearly audible, with admirable enunciation and tone. There seemed no room for worry about the life of "The Star Spangled Banner" being threatened by this rather banal verse and its setting.

As for the epic rhapsody as a whole, one felt a decided gratification to hear a work considered sufficiently important for five famous conductors to have awarded it the first prize of $3,000 and to have burst forth practically simultaneously with first performances of it by their respective orchestras. Mr. Koussevitzky was one of the five. Ordinarily, but for the interest and initiative of the above-mentioned music lovers, Washington, in the natural course of indifferent events, would not have heard this work, which the whole country is animatedly discussing—except perhaps via radio—for several seasons to come, perhaps never.

It was Reginald de Koven, an American born in Middletown, Conn., who had a song in his popular work, "Robin Hood," entitled "It Takes Nine Tailors to Make a Man." Similarly, it would seem that it takes more than a dozen years to make an American composer. Superficially and even patriotically, perhaps that length of time is sufficient. But not spiritually or emotionally. Mr. Bloch's sincerity and industry are quite as unquestioned as his European point of view. He obviously loves his adopted land and is intrigued by its folk tunes, an accumulated assortment of a trio of racial backgrounds, and also by the ballads of Stephen Collins Foster, America's greatest song writer.

